ELECTION OF CEANN COMHAIRLE.

THE PRESIDENT: Cuirim-se os comhair na Dála go dtoghfar Mícheál O h-Aodha mar Ceann Comhairle. The first business on the Agenda is the election of Speaker, and it is with very great pleasure I propose Mícheál O h-Aodha be appointed Ceann Comhairle.

When the third Dáil reached the end of its labours practically unanimous appreciation of the work of the Ceann Comhairle was made by the various members constituting the third Dáil, and tributes were paid to the dignity, harmony, and ability which he had displayed in that very high office. He conducted the business of the Dáil with very conspicuous ability during an exceedingly trying and strenuous time. He had mastered the rules of debate and the orders of the Dáil, and he gave very general and complete satisfaction to all the various parties constituting the Dáil. I think it will be admitted that a very able Chairman may not get the opportunity of showing his ability, but there is no doubt that the great ability which the Ceann Comhairle showed during the third Dáil won for him such appreciation and co-operation from all sections of the Dáil that a more popular selection could not have been made or a more satisfactory one from the point of view of the business of the Dáil.

It is, I think, unnecessary to go into the very many qualifications which the Ceann Comhairle possesses, not the least of which was his complete mastery of the Irish language and the fact that he was enabled to conduct the business of the Dáil in that language at all times and that he gave it its rightful place in this, the first Assembly of the Nation. I am convinced, personally, and I believe the view is shared generally and generously by the other members of the Dáil that it would not be possible to secure a more capable and efficient Ceann Comhairle. I do feel a very great personal pleasure in moving that he be elected Chairman of this Dáil. I do not believe that it would be possible to get a member of the Dáil more capable of getting contributions from all sides towards the conduct of its business in a manner befitting a dignified Assembly, such as we all hope the fourth Dáil will be. I therefore formally propose that the Dáil do elect Mícheál O h-Aodha as Ceann Comhairle.

Mr. THOMAS JOHNSON: Fellow-Deputies, I have the greatest pleasure in seconding the nomination of Professor Michael Hayes as Ceann Comhairle for the fourth Dáil. I said on the closing days of the last Session of the last Dáil that it would be impossible to get a more capable Ceann Comhairle, and it would be very difficult indeed to find one who would equal him. I can add nothing to that. Nothing that has happened in the meantime has altered that opinion. I think I may without very many words advise the new Deputies to follow the advice of those who went to the last Dáil and support this motion unanimously, not in his interest, but in our interest. We will need an efficient Chairman, and it is in our interest alone that I urge the Dáil to approve of this motion with unanimity.

There were no other nominations and the Clerk declared the motion carried.

An CEANN COMHAIRLE, having taken the chair, said:

Is mór an onóir liom gur tógadh arís mé mar Cheann Comhairle na Dála. Ní gádh dom níos mó a rádh ach go ndeunfadh mo dhícheall chun obair na Dála do stuifriú i gceart agus chun an dualgas a bheidh orm do choimhliónadh. Má fhaghaim-se an chabhair agus an congnamh ó gach aon teachta agus ó gach dream agus a fuair eas ins an Dáil eile, ní baoghal ná go mbeidh gach ráth ar an obair. Pé sgéul é déanfadh mo dhícheall mar Cheann Comhairle. Táim an-bhuidheach díbh.

I am deeply sensible of the honour which the Deputies have conferred on me by electing me as Ceann Comhairle of this Dáil. I think there is no need for me to say any more than that I shall do my best to fulfil the duties of that office. If I receive, as I am confident I shall receive, from every Party and every Deputy of this Dáil, the same loyal co-operation with regard to the procedure that I received in the last Dáil, then my task will not be by any means a difficult one. I thank the Deputies very sincerely.

NOMINATION OF PRESIDENT.

AN t-AIRE UM CHOSAINT (Risteárd Ó Maolcatha): A Chinn Chomhairle agus a Theachtaí na Dála, deirim-se Liam T. Mac Cosgair d-ainmniú chun bheith 'na Uachtarán arís. Timpeall bliadhain ó shoin, thánamar, annso. Bhí cúram na tíre orainn agus brón mór orainn mar gheall ar thrioblóid na h-aimsire sin. Bhí orainn duine do thogha a bhéadh mar Cheann ar na Teachtaí annso agus ar an tír leis. Dheineamar fear do thogha do dhein an obair go maith. Níor fhéadamar a rádh fé go raibh a ainm 'nár geluasaibh le bliadhanta nó go raibh sé mar stuirthéoir agus Múinteoir duinn i bhfad roimis sin fé mar a bhí Art Ó

Gríobhtha. Níor fhéadamar a rádh go raibh sé mar sgéul 'nár measg, dár ngriósú chun oibre, fé mar a bhí Mícheál O Coileáin. Twelve months ago we found ourselves meeting here, a Parliament of the Irish people, in days of very great sorrow and very great stress. We had to elect from amongst ourselves a man who would take on himself the highest and supremest responsibility for directing our work here along proper lines and for shouldering the great responsibilities of the Government of our people. We had lost the two leaders that we had been depending on for a very long time, the two leaders that we had hoped would be our strength and our guidance in shouldering the great responsibilities that came on the shoulders of the Irish people, the responsibilities of their own government. Deprived, by the will of the Lord, of the services of those men, we had to find from among the members that were elected here by the people, somebody to take their place. At that time or some time later in calling for National discipline, I did feel it necessary to suggest, as we had not then a national party, that perhaps we had not then a national leader, and although we were not able to say, or we could not have said, of Liam T. MacCosgair then that, like Arthur Griffith, he had been a light and a guidance and a teacher to us for many years, or that like Michael Collins he had been, as it were, a legend among us, helping us to rise to our work and our duties; we could say that he had been for years a very faithful servant of those who were foremost in the work of building up our country and in fighting for its liberty. We did ask one who was to us then a faithful servant of others to take on the responsibilities of leadership. Any doubts that were in our hearts at that time as to whether we had or had not amongst us a national leader have passed.

The person who followed up where Michael Collins and Arthur Griffith had perforce to leave off, has shown himself to be a worthy successor of them in the energy and ability of his mind and in his conscientious application to his duties. The man who entered Michael Collins' room and took his place, as hard and as vigorous a worker as Michael Collins was in giving to us of his best—the man who entered his room here in Merrion Street in succession to him has not been one whit behind Michael Collins in his great energy and great labour and devotion to his duty. There is not a single man whose privilege it was to sit in the last Dáil, who has had, as an individual, some vision of our President doing his ordinary work and going about his own personal work as President and as a man, who has not as a result found strength in carrying out his individual work.

There is no person here who has standing among his own sectional group and who has responsibilities greater than the responsibilities of an ordinary member, who has not some vision of the President acting as a leader among his own people and acting as a leader among the people of Ireland, and who does not in consequence find strength in carrying out his smaller sectional duties in being a leader of a group or a party. Personally, in the peculiar responsibility that did come to me during the term of the last Dáil, the President has been a source of help without which I did not feel that I would have been able to shoulder the responsibilities that came my way. His help, his understanding, his insight, and the way even in which he acted as a corrective, have made very much lighter than they would have ordinarily been, responsibilities of a peculiar nature that were very great.

To-day when the President of our Nation treads a wider and a more wide-flung field than we have been used to considering or thinking of, it is a very great pleasure and a gratification for us to know that everywhere he went recently on the Continent, whether among Statesmen or among Churchmen or among the ordinary people of those nations that he travelled through, everyone of them was struck with the way in which he devoted himself to the different duties that came his way and by the simple and proud dignity with which he appeared before them as the President of our country. Everyone of you, such is the nature of our President, not only knows him as a public man, but his spirit and his simplicity are such that you practically all know him as a private man, talking as friend to friend, or meeting him in his house, and you do not want any elaboration of that state of things to recommend him to you as your President here.

Now, on the threshold of another period in our National life, in peculiar difficulties we have the joy and we can have the confidence here that we have among us a man whom we can recommend to one another and to our people as a President of a character that has been tested sorely but that has shown itself to be eminently equal to bearing the responsibilities that are the responsibilities of our President.

Professor WILLIAM MAGENNIS:

It has been said that a speech is a long narrow passage to a broad conclusion. On this occasion my broad conclusion must be very obvious and my passage to it shall not be long. We recommend—the mover and seconder of this Resolution—that the Dáil re-appoint Liam T. MacCosgair because we are so thoroughly convinced that the position is his by that great title, the right divine of superior fitness. It was said by an historian of an infamous Roman Emperor, that by the common consent of all he was the man fittest to rule and that would have been the general verdict were it not for the fact that he had ruled. We may reverse the witticism and declare that it is precisely because Liam T. MacCosgair has ruled us in the Dáil with such eminent proficiency and with such complete satisfaction to every party in the Dáil that we should feel it a dereliction of duty on our part were we not to acclaim him for a repetition of the same office. He has one element of outstanding unmistakable character as befitting him for leadership. Politics, though so frequently despised by cynics and condemned by flippant writers, is one of the great arts of life, and the good politician should be a practised artist. What we demand of the great artist is a knowledge of the material in which he works and a mastery over it, exercised through an exhaustive knowledge of its capabilities, and more especially of its limitations. The material in which our artist-politician works is human nature—his fellow-man. A knowledge of his fellowman, how far he can be led, to what extent he can be influenced, and what he can be induced to do, is one of the necessary elements in the equipment of a leader. To my critical vision the one quality of his many great qualities that stood out in the exercise of the President's office in the late Dáil was the manly suavity that he invariably displayed. It was not the genial weakness of a man pandering to others to create an artificial majority and to maintain it, and that is why I characterise it as a suavity that was manly. He had unfailing patience, as many of us are in a position to testify, and he had a very rare gift of not being impatient of criticism. I think we shall all agree that success in the leadership of this Dáil will depend largely upon an infinite capacity for patience. There is another quality which he possessed in large measure, and that is a sense of the right moment for a just and wise compromise. The power of compromise, the disposition for it, and the wisdom to know when to exercise it, are unfortunately wanting in too many Irishmen. Irishmen as a rule are possessed of such strong convictions, they are so ardent in the pursuit of the things they hold sacred and to which they have consecrated their lives, that they must regard, or seem as if they must regard, everyone opposed to them as a public enemy and to be dealt with in summary fashion. Our President—for I may call him so already by anticipation—has that proper sense of compromise, not in the cowardly form of weak concession, but in the wiser form, which is a sort of political navigation of a ship through difficult waters in tempestuous weather. I promised my speech would not be long. I feel I have already broken my promise, and lest I should fail still further in my undertaking I confine myself now to saying that I have never made any pronouncement with more genuine conviction and with a sincerer sense of pleasure than that I am going to make now: while I recognise that Ireland has displayed her marvellous resourcefulness in throwing up great men at the moment when they are most needed—and we have seen in the old Dáil a manifestation of greatness in many of our colleagues—yet I regard the present candidate for the office of President as the man of men amongst all these. With that I leave it.

Motion put and agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: I have much pleasure in acknowledging the great honour which has been conferred upon me by this Dáil. I do not think that in the ordinary acceptance of our procedure here that it is assumed that I should make any pronouncement now. I do undertake to discharge the duties of this office with the help of God to the best of my ability. I gave that undertaking last year and I am repeating it now. I think that on more than one occasion I have stated that the success of most of the offices of the State, including that of the office to which I have been elected, depends upon the amount of assistance and co-operation rendered by the other institutions of the State. During the past year I have had no cause for complaint in that respect. I and the other members of the Executive Council with me have received that co-operation and assistance from all the institutions of the State, and from both Houses of the Oireachtas. We have been very much heartened by that support, cordial co-operation, and assistance. It has made a year of hard work and of strenuous effort a pleasure. It was a great satisfaction to us then, and I hope that the same satisfaction awaits us in this, the fourth, Dáil. The general principles of the policy which I intend to recommend for acceptance in the first place to the Executive Council and then to the Dáil have been already outlined. Within a short period a more complete outline of them will be disclosed here in the Dáil. We have passed through a strenuous and a hard time and I think I may say that I echo the hope of every member in saying that I hope that happier times await us in the future.

Mr. GOREY: Before the next item on the agenda is proceeded with, I beg to give notice that on the adjournment I shall move the following motion:—

“That reasonable facilities be accorded to the Deputies returned at the recent election in the Sinn Féin interests to meet.”

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy cannot move a motion but can only raise a matter on the adjournment motion, under the standing orders.

Mr. GOREY: Then I beg to give notice that I shall raise this matter on the motion for adjournment..

JOURNALS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRESIDENT: I beg to move: “That the proceedings of the Dáil be prepared under the supervision of the Clerk, and be printed, after being perused and signed by the Ceann Comhairle.”

“That the proceedings so printed constitute the Journals of the House.”

Mr. DUGGAN: I second the motion. Motion put and agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE DAIL.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Before the adjournment motion be taken may one enquire exactly what will be the procedure for the next few days, and what business shall be taken? If a statement could be made to that effect by the President, now that he is elected, I think it would be for the convenience of Deputies.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Order paper for to-morrow, as at present drawn up, is:—“(1) Nomination of the Executive Council by the President.” That is in accordance with the Constitution. “(2) Motion by the President with regard to Ministries, the holders of which shall not be members of the Executive Council. (3) Motion by the President for the appointment of a Committee in accordance with Article 55 of the Constitution.” That is to say for the appointment of a Committee to recommend to the Dáil the names of Deputies who shall be Ministers but not members of the Executive Council. The Committee under the Constitution must be appointed so as to be representative of all parties and it was appointed on the last occasion on the principle of the single transferable vote.

Mr. JOHNSON: Will An Ceann Comhairle say whether the terms of these motions will be on the Order Paper?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It will be impossible for the terms of the second motion with regard to Ministries to be on the Order Paper until the names of the members of the Executive Council are disclosed, and also the name of the Ministry which each member of the Executive Council shall hold. In so far as that information is not available the names of the External Ministries will not be on the Order Paper.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Are you in a position to inform us when we may expect to have the Governor-General's speech?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I have no information on that matter.

The PRESIDENT: It might be information for the Deputies if I say that it will not be taken earlier than Tuesday week. I may announce that it is our intention in the event of that resolution passing to accept nominations up to 12 o'clock on Saturday, and we would require another meeting of the Dáil for the election on Tuesday.

Mr. A. BYRNE: Will the Dáil sit on Friday? .

The PRESIDENT: It is not intended at present.

Mr. A. BYRNE: Would you allow me, a Chinn Chomhairle, to raise a matter on the adjournment in connection with a circular which emanated from Mountjoy Prison on Friday evening as regards the conditions which are stated to prevail there, and to ask whether an enquiry would be held at once into the contents of that circular for the purpose of either repudiating it or altering the conditions which the circular states exist. I would like to get a few words in on the motion for the adjournment when the leader of the Farmers' Party raises the other question.

Mr. GOREY: Allow me to correct the Deputy. I am not in that position.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It has been our practice to allow only one matter to be raised on the motion for adjournment, and notice has already been given by Deputy Gorey.

Mr. A. BYRNE: In view of the great urgency of this matter and the sensational statements in this circular which is going broadcast over the country may I ask now whether the Ministry would take immediate steps to hold an enquiry? There were two statements submitted to me by a deputation which called on me in connection with another public position which I occupy. If the statement in the circular is not true I think, in the interests of the Government and of the Dáil, it should be repudiated, and the only way to settle the matter is to have an enquiry. If it is true I should say that those who are in authority in the prison, and have been named, should be removed from their positions which they occupy. I will hand over the documents to the President and the Minister for Defence for investigation.

General MULCAHY: I do not know whether I ought to deal with this matter here. I have not seen the documents that Deputy Alfred Byrne refers to, but I am aware of what the conditions are in Mountjoy gaol. There are no conditions there that any objection can be taken to. Certain disciplinary action had recently to be taken in Mountjoy gaol, but that action was taken to uphold the regulations that are absolutely necessary for prison discipline.

Mr. A. BYRNE: I will hand to the Minister the documents that I have referred to.

THE ADJOURNMENT.—POSITION OF ANTI-TREATY DEPUTIES.

The PRESIDENT: I beg to move the adjournment of the Dáil until tomorrow afternoon at 3 o'clock.

MINISTER for EXTERNAL AFFAIRS (Mr. D. Fitzgerald): I second the motion.

Mr. D. J. GOREY: I beg to raise the matter of which I gave notice earlier, namely that reasonable facilities for meeting be accorded to the Deputies returned at the recent elections in the Sinn Féin interests. I do so for the reason that every sane man recognises the critical position of the country. The agricultural industry is at a standstill, and I am speaking as one who has an intimate knowledge of it. The agricultural industry of this country is in a most critical condition. Never in my time, and I can remember since the eighties, have I known the industry to be in as critical condition as it is to-day. I can say that never before was it faced with a graver or darker outlook than it is faced with at the moment. The nation, and the component parts of the nation, whether as individuals or the nation as a whole, are faced with the question of bankruptcy. Bankruptcy is staring the industry in the face, and it is time that some means should be found so that the elements in the nation could mend themselves and be put upon solid grounds and carry on under normal conditions. At the present time we have very little else besides bitterness, jealousies and recriminations. I have been speaking to men on both sides, and I do not think there is any man with any sense of responsibility but regrets the present position. There are men without responsibility who do not regret the position, because it enables irresponsible men to do things that in normal times could not be done. But every responsible man on both sides that I have met, every man who loves the country, regrets the present position, and wishes he could see a means towards a happy ending of it. We, too, on these benches here, wish that a happy ending would take place, but the position as far as we can see it does not seem to mend itself, or does not seem to give any indication of moving in that direction. At the outset, I ask that our action here be not misconstrued in any way. We do not pretend that we have found a solution of the difficulty, but in all matters affecting the life of the nation we are determined to maintain an independent and constitutional attitude and steadfastly pursue what we believe to be right.

I said a moment ago that we are not so bold as to claim that we have found a solution of the difficulties that beset the life of the nation, but we have sufficient regard for the fair fame and good name of the country and of its future, honestly to endeavour to bridge over the minor difficulties that stand in the way of a final solution of the main question. Men hold different views regarding the release of the prisoners, and to be quite candid the average man in the country has not had an opportunity of making up his mind on the question. Some hold that the prisoners should be released unconditionally; on the other hand there are those who hold that the prisoners should not be released unless the arms and ammunition, the dumps and the other paraphernalia of war, if such a thing exists, should be handed up; and again there are others who hold that sufficient assurances are contained in the recent utterances of Mr. de Valera in regard to constitutional action in the future which should result in bringing about the immediate release of the prisoners unconditionally. Now, all this to my mind, and to the minds of the people I am connected with here, indicates a great diversity of opinion, but the main difficulty arises from the fact that the people are not really aware of what is the real policy of the Sinn Féin party, and I say that as one coming from the country. My opinion is that the average man in the country is not aware of what the policy of these people is. They are not aware whether these people are going to pursue the attainment of their objects by constitutional means, or whether they arrogate to themselves the right to resort again to unconstitutional weapons. As the matter stands, one can understand the difficulty as there is no authoritative definition of what their policy is likely to be. Some Sinn Féin Deputies are in prison, some are on the run and a few who are free must find it impossible to take counsel with their brother Deputies. Taking into consideration all the circumstances, we consider it is essential, in the interests of the nation, that the Sinn Féin Deputies should be accorded reasonable facilities to meet, and it is for that reason I have raised this matter on the adjournment. We, on these benches, have been approached, as perhaps most Deputies in the Dáil have been approached, as to what our attitude is to be on certain matters, as to our attitude with regard to the release of the prisoners and with regard to other questions. We are not in a position, and neither is the average man in the country in a position, to make up our minds until these other people get an opportunity of meeting, and of giving a clear answer to certain specific questions. We want to know whether the militant method is going to be left aside, and the constitutional method adopted or not. It is time that the country had a clear answer on that issue, and it is time that these 44 men had an opportunity of meeting and saying whether the constitutional method is going to be their method, or whether they reserve to themselves the right of going into the unconstitutional field again. That is why I have raised this matter to give them an opportunity to declare what their policy is going to be.

Mr. MILROY: I am afraid that the knowledge of the last speaker who raised this matter about Sinn Féin is very inadequate. He speaks of allowing the Sinn Féin Deputies who are in prison to be released and of giving them an opportunity to meet. So far as I know most of the Sinn Féin Deputies are at large and are here present to-day. I believe an old device used by certain pirates when they approached a victim ship was to hoist a friendly flag and when they came near the ship down came the friendly flag and up went the Skull and Crossbones. These gentlemen and ladies for whom Deputy Gorey has so much solicitude have reversed the process and hoisted the Skull and Cross-bones until they could do it no longer, and now they hoist the friendly flag of Sinn Féin. I deny that they are the Sinn Féin Party. I deny that they have any right to speak in the name of Sinn Féin. We are here acting in that principle to establish the right of the Irish nation to decide its own fate. We attempt to prevent that from external or internal aggression. Deputy Gorey says that the average man has not had time to make up his mind.

Mr. GOREY: I do not think I said anything of the sort.

Mr. MILROY: Well, I made one mistake. The average man had not an opportunity of making up his mind. I am glad of the correction; I like to be corrected in my quotations. Who is the average man? Is Deputy Gorey an average man?

Mr. GOREY: When I am sober I hope so.

Mr. MILROY: Well, I hope that gentleman is in that average state at the present moment. But at any rate, whether he is or is not an average man, he seems to have been incapable of making up his mind as to what Irregularism has meant up to the present. We have had over twelve months of very clear demonstration of what those 44 elected representatives of the people stand for and what they mean. Is there any man, any Deputy here, who has not made up his mind as to whether or not that is a good or a bad thing for this nation? Is there any sane human being within the four shores of Ireland who has not made up his mind as to whether the burning of houses, the breaking of bridges and destruction of the economic life of the country is a bad thing, a damn bad thing, for Ireland? I hope by the time I have finished that Deputy Gorey will have made up his mind. Those 44 Deputies to whom Deputy Gorey has referred are rather a mixed grill. There are certain of them at large because really they had not the courage to take the desperate steps their colleagues took. I do not know whether Deputy Gorey means to give, say, Mr. Frank Aiken, facilities for expounding his theory of poison gas. I suggest that Deputy Gorey would ask that particular Deputy to go down to his constituency, to his own holding, and expound the theory of poison gas there. It is true that certain of these Deputies are cooing like sucking doves. They talk about peace and unity and concord and the salvation of the nation. They would be better employed for the next ten years in saying Acts of Contrition. They would be better employed in showing the country how to repair the ravages of war that they have brought upon it without provocation, unless the provocation be that we declined to assent to the principle that all authority within the State, legislative, judicial and administrative, should be derived solely from Mr. De Valera and Miss Mary McSwiney. So far as I understand the attitude of the Government, so far as I understand the elementary principles of common sense and of democratic Government, these persons can meet unmolested the moment they assent to this principle that the will of the majority shall prevail in this country, but if they persist in the attitude that they have adopted up to now, that the will of the majority shall go down before a self-selected clique, a small minority, I say, if I had anything to do with the Government, that they should never meet together to try to spread that principle or doctrine. There is not one man or one woman interned by the Free State Government so far as I know who cannot walk out of jail to-morrow the moment they assent to the principle that Government of the people, by the people and for the people shall be the fundamental rule of authority in this country. Deputy Gorey speaks about both sides. I thought we had heard enough of that cant in the last Dáil. That may be an unparliamentary expression, but one cannot resist alluding to this kind of peculiar terminology in some emphatic way. What are both sides? I recognise no both sides in this question any more than I suppose the Almighty recognised two sides when Lucifer tried to set up a rival government with a minority in the celestial regions.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There must be no applause in the Gallery and if anyone else applauds in the Gallery he will be removed.

Mr. MILROY: I think that was applause from the celestial region. There can be no question of two sides in this matter. Either the people must prevail or the Nation goes down in chaos and confusion. Either the will expressed by the people must be accepted as the definite and unchallengeable basis of law or the terms law, Government, and democracy become so many shibboleths that have no meaning to a sensible being. I do not really understand what Deputy Gorey is driving at.

Mr. GOREY: You had a right to wait then before you replied.

Mr. MILROY: I do not really understand what was his purpose in raising this matter unless it was to get a column and a half of his prepared speech in to-morrow's Press. I think that he might have saved the Dáil all this discussion if he had written a letter to the Press and signed his name to it. But there is another thing that has struck me, the singular transformation of the Deputy since the last Dáil. In the last Dáil we had Deputy Gorey rampant against the Irregulars.

Mr. GOREY: And he is still.

Mr. MILROY: But there was this difference, an election was then pending and the election is now over. Deputy Gorey is now elected for four years. At the beginning of this Dáil I think that it is time to stop this attempt to appeal to the gallery, this attempt to figure in the limelight for the sake of cutting a figure. I think the time has come to stop talking and to get on with the work of the nation.

Mr. R. WILSON: The simple question which we raised this afternoon, that we asked that the 44 people who are representing, each perhaps 6,000 citizens of Ireland, should be given an opportunity to consult together, has brought forward an effusion such as that, and if we were to depend on effusions like that in this Dáil and if we were to take a speech like that of the last Deputy as voicing the views of the people of Ireland, then I would say that our case is hopeless. We are asking what is only a reasonable request. These 44 people who have had no opportunity of coming together, and to whom under these laws you were supposed to have sent notices to attend here, are not in a position to come together. They are inside prison walls and on the hillsides, and are not in a position to give expression to their views in order that their followers in jail might be advised by them in the right direction, to follow the Constitution and to come in here and work with us. Is that a reasonable request, or is it not, and why should it bring forth from the back of the Government a man who instead of meeting the question has turned it into ridicule, and has dealt with the past, refusing to look to the future? All our hope and strength lies in meeting the future united and not wasting our strength in these weakening attempts at destruction and turmoil. After all, they are not a minority that are to be unrecognised; everyone of the 44 members of the 153 is a member who must be recognised. I myself am very much disappointed that there were in this country 44 people who could be brought into this Dáil with the opinions which these people hold, but I must look at the facts and I must say that these people have been elected, and it is our duty to do the best we can for the country, and give them every facility to come together and formulate their policy. If we could induce them to come inside and work through the Constitution in this Dáil we would be doing something for the country, and something which would enable us to let out the prisoners and get to work for the economic development of the country, which is badly needed.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. Hogan): I am genuinely surprised that a matter of this importance has been brought forward in this fashion by the Farmers' Party.

Mr. WILSON: Most interesting.

Mr. HOGAN: And I think it is likely that every thinking Deputy outside the Farmers' Party in the Dáil at the moment is also genuinely surprised. It was brought forward first by way of resolution. Surely the Farmers' Party knew that they had to give notice of motion. I can hardly make myself believe that they did not, and even if they were under the impression that they could deal with a question like this by a motion without notice surely they believe it was one of those matters so important that at least other Deputies who have an equal interest in the country should get notice of it.

Mr. GOREY: I agree.

Mr. HOGAN: But, as I say, I cannot believe that they were under the delusion that they could move a motion without notice. Now we have it on the adjournment. What is the point of raising a matter like this on the adjournment? What is the urgency? Is it suggested that the matter could not wait for four days, and that we could not all get notice of it, or is it one of those casual, trivial matters that could be decided off hand? It is not the business of the Farmers' Party. Those Deputies, Sinn Féin Deputies as Deputy Gorey calls them, are amongst the people and represent the people, ten thousand or fifteen thousand of whom we have now in gaol. It cost us £50,000,000 to put them in, it cost us the lives of many gallant men to put them in, and it cost us the life of Michael Collins. Do the Farmer Deputies suggest as reasonable men that a question like this should be decided on a moment's notice on the first day the Dáil meets? Is that the suggestion? Now it is a serious matter. I can understand any Deputy from any party putting down a motion on that, but not discussing it on the adjournment of the Dáil. I suggest that we have got just far enough with it

Mr. LYONS: The matter that has been raised by Deputy Gorey on the adjournment is the same as the question raised by me on the first stage of the 1922 Session of the Dáil. I only want to ask one question, and that is whether the 34 members interned have got the opportunity from the Government of deciding whether or not they would come in and work with the remainder of their colleagues selected by the people of Ireland? I want some Minister, probably the Minister for Defence, to answer whether they have received any written notice that if they had decided on attending this first Session of the Dáil that they would be released and get sufficient guarantee that they will not be arrested, and especially so with regard to the nine men or women Deputies who are not interned. Now, from the arguments put forward on behalf of the prisoners by Deputies Gorey and Wilson one would imagine that all the prisoners interned belong to the Farmers' Party.

Mr. WILSON: Not at all.

Mr. LYONS: As an Independent Labour man I say that there are more workers interned than there are farmers' sons.

Mr. GOREY: Very interesting.

Mr. LYONS: The point that Deputy Gorey and Deputy Wilson are going on is that there are pending elections for County Councils and District Councils. I quite agree with the motion raised on the adjournment advocating the release of prisoners. Deputy Milroy said a moment ago that any prisoner has the opportunity of coming out if he is prepared to act according to the will of the people. Now, would it be information to Deputy Milroy to know that there are several prisoners to my knowledge who have signed the usual form of undertaking six months ago and they have not yet been released?

Mr. MILROY: Would the Deputy understand that certain people who signed that are not prepared to act on it?

Mr. LYONS: I am afraid I will have to allow the Dáil to decide as to whether or not they are prepared to do so, but I know they have signed it. If the 44 Deputies elected by the minority come in here and take their seats and act according to the wishes of the Irish people I am sure that no Government elected by the people of Ireland will keep their followers in prison. They are selected by the people to do the work of the people, as employees of the people, and I think it is only right that they should get the opportunity of voicing their opinion as to whether they will accept that position, or not, by giving them the option and a sufficient guarantee as was given to many Deputies in the Dáil in 1920 by the British Government who were at that time interned. That guarantee was given to Deputies then, and to members of the present Government, and other Deputies, that they would get a free pardon and sufficient guarantee that they would not be arrested if they came in and acted in the first Parliament of the Irish people. I think the same facilities should have been given to the people arrested and interned during the recent trouble. I congratulate Deputy Gorey and Deputy Wilson on the fact that they have laid a foundation stone, and that they are going to swell their representation in the County Councils and District Councils.

The PRESIDENT: It is a matter of very great surprise to me that this motion or discussion should be raised at this particular time. It appears to me to be a constitutional complexity to say the least of it. In the first place if it were a matter of serious moment it occurred to me that it ought to have been raised on the question of the election of President. If it were not thought advisable to raise it at that particular juncture in our proceedings I should say it might reasonably have been raised on the nomination by the President of the other members of the Executive Council. But the manner in which it was raised, and the statement made on its introduction appear to me to be extraordinary. I should say that two members of the Dáil—I believe they are here, I have not seen them though I am sure they are here—informed me that they were approached within the last fortnight, close upon midnight—the hour selected, I believe, was after ten o'clock—by men who came to them with a document to sign. On that document was the request that they would raise questions here; first for the release of prisoners, and secondly for the alteration, or to put it in their own inimitable phraseology the provision that no bar and no obstacle should stand in the way of any man taking a seat here in this Dáil.

Now, mark the particular method adopted. If an honest man has got a bargain to make with you it is not near midnight he comes to make it, and he does not usually bring two or three aides-de-camp with him when he is going to make a bargain unless you are not going to be a free agent in the bargain. As I see the situation it comes to this—and I am the only person here now with serious responsibility with regard to the matter; the other members of the Executive have not been nominated; they still hold their offices as Ministers—to raise this matter now and to put upon one person the responsibility of answering it is a thing I am sure the Deputies will appreciate. The position was unquestionably decided by the people in the recent Election. One hundred and nine Deputies were returned, not one of whom put on his placard that he stood for one or both of those conditions put by the midnight visitors. If he did I am satisfied that on that issue the return of those who stood for a programme such as that would not have been as secure as it has been. Those forty-four people have been returned. Are they the petted children of this Nation? Must the Nation stand to attention while these forty-four are making up their minds whether they are to pass through the doors of this representative Assembly; whether or not they will honour this country by coming in here without first apologising to the Nation for the blood they have spilled, the destruction they have caused, and the horrible twelve months through which we have passed? Any time during that period, the whole of the eighteen months, and certainly for the first six months, we actually brought the Treaty into jeopardy, brought it to the very edge of the abyss in order to try and bring back those men to a sense of their citizenship to this Nation. When that failed and even after we had attacked them, many a time we offered here not only to make peace with them but even to get out, only on condition that they would get out too. What was the response? Our houses were burned, some members of our families were shot, and now we read in the Press, from the relative of one of these prisoners, the squeal that ten days have elapsed without getting a reply to a letter she sent to her husband. How many graves are there in Ireland from which no letters will ever come? How few squeals are there from the people who have made these sacrifices that this Nation should stand for the elected rule of the majority? Not one. I have not heard a squeal from one person whose family has made sacrifices for the right of this country and the right of citizenship and for the right of mapping out and marking out its progress and advancement.

Posturing Republicans! Ridiculous politicians! They ask and they demand of the people in Ireland that they should call themselves Republicans. For years I subscribed to that and fought for it as hard as any of them and my friends here have done likewise. What was our revenue in two years? The revenue of the Dublin Corporation. That is what they want to condemn the people of this country to with their nonsense—not one single month's revenue of the State we are now administering. That is what they want to condemn the people of this country to, in the future, in order that a few of their so-called intellectuals shall decorate themselves with the order of Commandant-General, or President, or Vice-President, or Acting President or something of that sort. They ask us now, having failed in doing their damndest to get the British back here, they ask us now to pitch away in a moment of sentimentalism what we have gained, in order that they may be allowed to walk in through these doors and to say here in this Assembly of the Nation: "We are men and women of principle." The possession of that word is one of their conservations. Is the future political history of this country to be written in this manner: that a man or woman has only to get into jail and has only to stand for election and get elected, and our courts and our institutions, and the order of citizenship that we have established, are to be swept away in order that a number of persons returned in a constituency perhaps under false pretences, can order the Courts to open the doors and demand their freedom and do and say whatever they like? Forty-four of these people have been elected; eighteen of them are in jail. What are the twenty-six doing? What contribution are they going to make to the stability of this State? What apology have they got to make for the wrongs they have done this country? Until we get some evidence of a real change of heart I say it is not for us to be swept off our feet by sentimentalism because an actual minority of forty-four people say they are going to determine and mark out the progress of this country.

Mr. GOREY: Can I not reply?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No.

Mr. GOREY: Can I not make a personal explanation?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes, the Deputy can make a personal explanation, but it must be a personal explanation.

Mr. GOREY: The President has referred to men being waited on in the night. I have been waited upon in the night without an Army to protect me. So have other Deputies here been waited on, and they have flatly refused to sign those undertakings. The object of raising this motion here was not to pander to anybody. It was merely to ask a definite answer from these forty-four representatives whether they accepted the Constitutional platform or not. Then we would know what to do.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is not a personal explanation.

A DEPUTY: What are you going to do with the murderers in that forty-four—?

Mr. GOREY: Deputies have made personal reflections on us across the floor.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Order. The Deputy must sit down. The Motion is that the Dáil do now adjourn until 3 o'clock to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

NOMINATION OF THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL.

The PRESIDENT: My nomination as President of the Executive Council has been approved by the Governor-General, and I now beg to submit formally, for the assent of the Dáil, the names of the following Deputies as members of the Executive Council:—

Deputy Kevin O'Higgins as Vice-President and Minister for Home Affairs;

Deputy Ernest Blythe as Minister for Finance;

General Richard Mulcahy as Minister for Defence;

Deputy Joseph McGrath as Minister for Industry and Commerce;

Deputy Desmond Fitzgerald as Minister for External Affairs; and Deputy Eoin MacNeill as Minister for Education (when he will have complied with Article 17 of the Constitution).

I regret that I have found it necessary to consult the members of the old Executive Council—those of them who are present—with regard to the Ministry of Finance, and that I do not feel justified in keeping that portfolio myself. I have asked the Deputy who has been Minister for Local Government to accept that portfolio, and he has kindly consented to do so, with the approval of the other members of the Executive Council. I do not think it is necessary to do more than formally move for assent, and I now formally do so.

Mr. THOS. JOHNSON: The motion that has been made by the President of the Executive Council asks the Dáil, in effect, to approve the re-election of the same Deputies to act with him as an Executive Council as have been so acting for the last year. He is quite entitled to do so, and it is necessary that the President should call to his aid those persons who may have the confidence of the Dáil and the country to act with him as the Government of the country. It seems to me that before the Dáil approves of this selection, we should have something to say, and we should hear something from the President in regard to the intentions of this Ministry, and rather to suggest to the new Executive Council which will be elected certain lines of policy which the Dáil thinks, or the individual members of the Dáil may think, should be carried out by this Ministry which has now been nominated. The fact that the same Deputies are to be associated with the President in the future suggests that there is no change in policy, or if there is to be a change in policy it seems to me, at any rate, that we might have some indication from the President as to what his mind is in calling these gentlemen to his assistance in the Government of the country.

It may be said that the party which the President leads has been returned by a majority to the Dáil, has presented a programme to the country, and has got the confidence of the country for that programme. I have followed, as carefully as it has been possible for me to follow, the various statements made officially by that party and by the President, and I have failed to divine what is the intention in regard to policy of the President and his party. We know, of course, that what was put before the country was the re-establishment of peace and the maintenance of the Constitution. Well, that, of course, is a kind of thing that is usually put before an electorate by a Ministry which has happened to come through successfully military disputes and military conflicts. We are all old enough to remember the khaki election in England and the results of it, and, I think, the Dáil should express itself rather upon other matters, such as the means whereby that Constitution is to be consolidated and the intentions of the Government regarding the problems that are really important. We heard, of course, officially from the President and his organisation that it was the intention of the party and the Government to deal with problems of reconstruction, house-building, industrial development, industrial disputes, domestic and foreign trade and commerce, agriculture, fisheries, manufactures, transport system, etc. Well, the Ministry to be established will necessarily have to deal with these things; but what we really desire to know is what method will be adopted in dealing with them; what is the purpose of that method; what is the policy that is intended to be carried through in dealing with these various problems. I would like this occasion to be used in such a way that the Dáil may express its views upon the methods of dealing with these problems.

We have in this motion an intimation that Deputy Kevin O'Higgins should be appointed as Vice-President and Minister for Home Affairs. I could, perhaps, with pleasure to myself, perhaps displeasure to many Deputies of the Dáil, require some enlightenment and utter some words of criticism regarding the policy of the Ministry of Home Affairs during the past month or two, since the Dissolution, and make suggestions regarding the immediate future of the policy of that Ministry. I might deal with the question of the imprisonment and internment of 10,000 to 15,000 people. I might deal with the question of the treatment of internees and prisoners. I think it is the duty of someone to be here to deal with those questions and to raise them and to criticise the policy of the Government with regard to them. But for my part it has been intimated fairly and clearly by the electorate that they do not desire that we, of the Labour Party, should take the responsibility of criticising Government action upon these matters.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSON: Questions of this kind have, if we interpret the intentions of the electorate rightly, been relegated rather to the Deputies of the Government Party and to the Deputies of what is known as the Republican Party, and I have the right to assume that both these Parties will accept the responsibility which has been imposed upon them. While saying that, I want to say as definitely as it is possible to say that we stand where we stood all through last Session in saying that men and women who have been arrested, men and women especially who have been arrested in time of peace or comparative peace, ought not to be detained one hour beyond the necessary time that is required to bring them to trial. We say, as definitely as it is possible to say, that in our opinion these men and women ought to be released, and we are prepared to vote for any proposition brought forward with that object in view, by any person who deems it to be his or her responsibility to raise that question in this Dáil. But our interests rather lie in questions of social and economic difficulty, problems that I fear are going to prevent the re-establishment of peace and the stabilisation of the State, unless they are dealt with on lines very differently from those hinted at and suggested by the Government, and the Government supporters, whether in the country or in the Dáil in the last Session.

So far as I can see the mind of the Government is running in the direction of allowing the development of economic affairs to follow the beaten path, and to trust to the ordinary operations of commerce and exchange to bring about prosperity in this country. During one of the Debates in the Dáil last Session I drew attention to the state of unemployment in such countries as Norway, Denmark, Sweden, and the Netherlands, each of which countries is somewhat in the same position as Ireland is towards the neighbouring countries. Economically each of these countries lives to a very great degree, indeed, upon export trade, upon the markets abroad. The figures which I quoted in that discussion showed that even such a country as Denmark, which was prosperous as an agricultural country, comparatively prosperous, had within the last year a percentage of unemployment as high as twenty-five, and Sweden had a percentage of unemployment as high as thirty-two in March, 1922. This country is dependent for the export market upon prosperity in England. You are trusting to the development of the ordinary methods of commerce, and you are hopeful that the times will grow better in this country, with the coming of military peace, and that the trade of this country will revive, and a market will continue to be found across the water for Irish produce. That is the proposition, that is the mind of the Ministry, that is the mind of the supporters of the Ministry in this country.

The market in England is not improving. We were told by leading British industrialists three or four weeks ago that they expected, as things were going, an unemployed population in Great Britain of two millions. It is steadily rising since the middle of the summer, notwithstanding the fact that twelve months have elapsed since the enforcement of the wage reduction campaign in that country. People in England were told by the employers there that they must accept reductions in wages if they wanted to improve trade, to regenerate the commercial system. Reductions were enforced, but the promise has not been fulfilled. Trade and commerce have not improved, and unemployment has increased. The market for Irish goods has decreased in that country because of the decrease in employment, and because, still further, of the reductions in wages of those who are employed.

I want to know whether it is the intention of the Ministry here, whether it is the mind of the Government here, or, shall I say, whether it is the mind of the majority on the Government benches and those behind the Government benches, to continue that policy and to assist and encourage the present policy in this country towards reduction in wages. The plea is put forward here, just the same as it was in England, that employment can only be revived by reductions in wages. That was the cry in England, and it has not been fulfilled. Is there any reason for thinking that reductions in wages in Ireland will be followed by an increase of employment in Ireland to any appreciable extent? I deny it. I say, on the other hand, as I said before in this Dáil, that the true policy is to keep up wages and to readjust your economic system in such a way as to ensure that those high wages will be spent in the purchase of Irish commodities. I want the Ministry to realise, and I want some of the new members of the Dáil to realise, that even though trade were to improve to an unexpected extent in England within the next few months, that in itself is not going to improve your industrial prospects in this country. Everyone who has studied these matters knows that the power to produce cheaply in this country, even on similar rates of wages, is not as great as the power to produce cheaply in England, or one might even say in Germany, or in any of the continental countries where the standard has been lowered within recent years. But the power to produce cheaply of our industrial manufacturers in this country is not as great as the power to produce cheaply in England. During the European War we all know how manufacturers took advantage of the opportunity of lavish expenditure of Government funds to enlarge their establishments, to improve their facilities for production, and generally blind the Exchequer by spending what should have been paid in taxes—excess profits tax—in the refurbishing of their machinery and their productive processes. That was not done to anything like the same extent in this country, because the foundations were not there, and your comparative position for cheap production in Ireland as compared with England is much worse than it was prior to 1914. Assume a revival of trade in England, where are your competitive industries to be? That revival of trade in England means an easing of the opportunities for those cheap manufactures to come into Ireland and to compete with your Irish manufactures. Neither the hope of improved conditions in England nor the hope of lower wages in Ireland are going to make your industrial position satisfactory.

I want to say to the President that if his Ministry, when formed, tends to proceed on the lines of least resistance, simply to allow the ordinary processes of commerce as they have been known in the past to proceed and develop of their own volition, seeking the highest profit irrespective of human effects, seeking to buy in the cheapest market and to sell in the dearest, then the industrial and economic position of this country, in my opinion, is going to be a very bad one indeed, and any hopes that the country had that the revolution which has been accomplished would lead to improved material life for the people would be lost and unfulfilled.

We have on the Statute Book a Bill dealing with unemployment insurance. It was passed during the last Session, and affects the system of unemployment insurance, abolishing the system of uncovenanted benefit and re-establishing what might be called pure insurance schemes. During the discussion on that Bill, I pointed out from these benches that, unless there was an extraordinary revival of trade and an increase in employment between that date and October, we were going to find the winter a very serious one, because of the fact that from the middle of October we shall have a steadily increasing number of men coming on to unemployment or continuing unemployment without any unemployment insurance whatever. The dole, as it was called, was abolished, and it was hoped by the Assistant Minister in charge of the Bill that trade and commerce would so improve, between the date of the introduction of the Bill and the middle of October, that the forecast, or, rather, fears that were given voice to would not be fulfilled. There is no improvement. There is very much to the contrary. There has been an increase of several thousands in the numbers of unemployed on the Unemployment Exchanges, quite irrespective of any effects of the trade disputes. There will be a still further increase with every man demobilised, and I think it is well to ask the Ministry, or the President, whether they have taken into account the position of these people during the coming winter. During the debate on the Second Reading of the Unemployment Insurance Bill, Mr. Whelehan stated that by the middle of August 10,000 persons would have exhausted all their contributions, and would have no right to benefit but for the special arrangement proposed in the Bill. He also stated that when the first benefit year terminates, on October the 7th, about one-third of the unemployed will, if they continue to draw benefit until then, have no contribution left unexhausted with which to restart the new benefit year. "It is hoped," he said, "that by that time economic conditions will have so improved as to have absorbed all, or nearly all, of these workers into employment."

Now, what are we to contemplate, if nothing is done to substitute for the dole, as it was called, something better? Are we to look on calmly and without fear at the increase in unemployment, and the steadily and rapidly growing number of men, who are not only unemployed, but are not receiving any insurance benefit? Do you think that that large number of people in the country are going to be contented and satisfied to rest silent, quiet, and patient until the Government is satisfied that peace has been re-established, and that the ordinary processes of commerce will have solved this problem? I have no such hopes. On the contrary, I have very great fears that this growing number of unemployed, with nothing to fall back upon in the way of insurance benefit, will make your social problem, perhaps make your military problem, a very, very great one indeed. It seems to me that the Government, and that any Ministry that may be elected, is faced, at this moment, with the question of whether they are going to choose to follow on the ordinary British and European system of commerce—laissez faire in commerce—or whether they are going to show some imagination and resist the temptation to take the easy line of life and leave things to find their own level. I hope the decision of the Government will be to follow on and bring into practical application those principles which they advocated, which we advocated prior to the establishment of the Free State, principles which laid it down clearly that it was the duty of the State to see that the children of the State would have opportunities for employment, for wealth production and opportunities to live in the country to which they belong. I would ask Ministers to spend a day or two in looking back upon the propaganda that they indulged in prior to the signing of the Treaty, during the agitation which led to the signing of the Treaty, and to face the implications honestly, and to bring them into practical operation. If they will do that they will get our support to the utmost possible extent, but if they do that they will lose the support of many others, whose support, I imagine from the signs we have seen, they will much rather have than the support of those who have spoken on behalf of labour in the past.

Mr. McGARRY: I am very much surprised to hear the tone of Deputy Johnson's speech. It seems to me that he has taken the advantage which he complains the English manufacturers took during the war. They took the opportunity to make profits during the war, and he took the opportunity of the President's motion to make a long speech and to profiteer on it. The motion before the Dáil, as I understand it, is that certain Ministers be appointed or reappointed. Deputy Johnson made a speech in which he has not had a single word to say about any of the Ministers, but puts a series of questions to a Ministry that has not yet been appointed. He has not said a single word why those Ministers should not be appointed. We have instead listened to a lecture on political economy in which he talked about everything but the President's motion. I suggest that it is the duty of every member to criticise the Government, if the Government ought to be criticised, but the criticism ought always to be helpful. I can get up and talk without any responsibility, but Ministers have responsibility, and if I am going to criticise them my criticism ought to be helpful. I do not think it right for any member to stand up here and waste the time of the Dáil with a lecture on political economy and criticism of a Ministry that is not here. Anybody may get up and propose an alternative Ministry, but lectures on political economy are no use.

Mr. WM. HEWAT: I rise, with a good deal of hesitation, as a new member, to speak in this Dáil, and I ask your indulgence in dealing with a matter that the leader of the Labour Party has raised. I take a good deal of exception to his attitude towards this problem. In the first instance, he refers to the fact that at an earlier stage the common sense of employers and workmen in England came to the conclusion that the situation justified a reduction in wages, which the men there, through the advice of their leaders, were prepared to accept. Those reductions were put into operation and were largely based on the argument that in reducing the wages it was necessary for the maintenance of trade, but also behind that was the very important argument that as the wages had been inflated during the war owing to exceptional circumstances, the business community claimed that in the reflex action the fall in the cost of living ought also to be taken into account. Now, Deputy Johnson has referred to the fact that these reductions have not been as successful in stemming the tide of bad trade as was expected at the time.

I say on the other hand if the reductions had not taken place and if the Labour Party at the other side had adopted the same attitude as is advocated by the Leader of the Labour Party that, bad as the situation to-day is, as far as the trade of the country is concerned, it would be infinitely worse with the palliative which was not as successful as it might have been, owing to the fact that continental politics came in and interfered with the revival of trade which had undoubtedly set in by that stage. Now, applying that to this country we, on this side, cannot help but be affected by the economic operations and the economic laws on the other side of the Channel. We might reasonably have expected that labour and the labour leaders would have recognised that and that coming out of troubles at home, troubles from other causes, that at all events we might have the opportunity of sitting down calmly and of being able to reason out all those matters as between Capital and Labour, without having to come to the deadlock that is at present holding up the country and is threatening increased unemployment in the near future. I claim that the policy of the Labour Party has not been as intelligent as one would expect from a Party who put forward a claim that they are able and willing to govern. The question of unemployment is a serious one, and the outlook, as far as winter is concerned, is serious also.

Deputy Johnson has referred to the abolition of the dole. The dole has been very useful in some cases, but I think that as far as Ireland is concerned it has been grossly abused, with the help and assistance of the Labour Party. Go down the country, into any part you like, and anyone there will tell you about obviously manufactured cases. What we want to get at is the man who is willing to work, and if he cannot get the work he has got to get assistance from the State. I would join with Deputy Johnson in saying to the Government that that is obviously a situation that must be attended to. On the other hand the only remedy for the man who is prepared to put his back to the wall, to stand all day and do nothing, is to make him feel in his stomach, if necessary, the need for work. The country needs that the work must be done on a fair basis. That to-day is holding up an immense amount of work. That to-day is putting a strangle-hold on all individual enterprise. If any man has money to spend in advancement let him look around. Let him compare his cost to-day of any building as compared with pre-war costs and he will see that it is not reasonable. What the country wants to-day is an opportunity to develop every resource. To do that we must have a position in which a man willing to extend his capital shall do so in security and with a fair expectation of a reasonable return for his money. Take the question of the North Wall to-day—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is this a question of the Executive Council's policy?

Mr. HEWAT: I have to apologise for transgressing. It is my ignorance in this matter. I say in these matters the position that ought to appeal to the Ministry is that they must help to encourage individual trades and individual enterprise, rather than unnecessarily interfere in connection with matters that are not properly under their control. I would like to say that Deputy Johnson's argument seemed to me to appeal in this way, that if wages are not to be governed by competitive conditions and if they are to be subject only to the wish of the person receiving the wages, I am afraid the country would be very different to live in for the ordinary man who has an income which is not liable to those fluctuations.

Mr. T. J. O'CONNELL: I rise principally to express regret that the President, in nominating his Executive Council, has again this year deemed it advisable to include as one of the Ministries within the Executive Council, the Ministry of Education. I think, from any point of view, that decision is to be regretted, but in saying that I would like to make it clear that I do not wish to be regarded as indicating the unsuitability in any way of the Deputy who is named as the Minister for Education for that particular position. What I do say is, that under the provisions of our Constitution we have some Ministers within the Executive Council, and some who are outside Ministers responsible only to this Dáil. I say that if there is one Ministry more suitable than another to be regarded as one which should be directly responsible to the Dáil, and only to the Dáil, it is the Ministry of Education. The Executive Council is responsible for policy, and I take it the main policy for which this Executive Council, now about to be chosen by this Dáil, will be responsible is the maintenance of the Treaty, and that all its actions and all its acts will be governed by a consideration of that policy. Now we know, and it is admitted by every Party, that the necessity for an improvement in our education, and in our educational system, is one of the most pressing problems that this Dáil will have to face. In my opinion at least it is not right that the proposals which might be brought forward to improve our educational system should be governed by considerations which have to do with matters of broad policy such as the Executive Council will have to deal with. The Minister for Education should be in the position that he could take the Dáil fully and wholly into his confidence, and every Party in the Dáil, in framing his proposals. He cannot do that if he is a member of the Executive Council, because it would mean if the proposal that he brings forward happens to be defeated, and happens not to meet with the wishes of the Dáil, it is immediately a question of policy, and as the Minister is a member of the Executive Council, the Council stands or falls, the Government stands or falls, on this educational proposal. I hold strongly that that is not as it should be. While knowing that the President would naturally find it necessary to call to his aid a man of the experience and wisdom and wise judgment of Deputy MacNeill, I must express very great regret, and I believe that regret will be shared by a great many people in this Dáil and in the country who believe that education should be dealt with and kept as far as possible from politics or political concerns, that the President has again included in the inside or Executive Council this Ministry of Education.

Mr. R. WILSON: In looking through the Ministries which in future are to be the inner Cabinet, which 4 o'clock. in reality will be the Governors of this country, it seems strange to us here representing the farming interests that the Minister for Agriculture, who has to deal with the greatest industry in this country, is excluded from the inner Councils of the Cabinet and thereby deprived of the support which he should necessarily be expected to have in a country that is mainly agricultural. It must seem strange that I should be asking that the Minister for Agriculture should be included in the Executive Council, while my friend on my left is desirous of excluding from the Executive Council the Minister for Education. My reason for making the request I have made is that in the very near future the fiscal problem in this country will have to be dealt with, and when it comes to be dealt with, we are afraid that unless we are properly represented, or rather the great industry in which we are interested is represented, in that Executive Council our interests will be overlooked. Five out of every six men in this country are engaged in agriculture, and if our industry is not given proper representation, we are afraid that it will be let down and become impoverished. If it is necessary to have in the Executive Council the Minister for Industry and Commerce, surely it is of far greater importance that the agricultural industry, which gives employment to five out of every six men in this country, should also be represented in the Council so that the necessary proposals for the protection of our industry could there be put forward directly. With regard to the nominations for the various Ministries, I have nothing to say further than this, that most of the Deputies named have given faithful service in the past, and as far as we are concerned, not being able to form our own Ministry, we must of course accept them as the best substitutes that could be found.

Mr. SEAN LYONS: I should just like to say that I am sure, from all that has been said of the Ministers whose names have been put before the Dáil on nomination, they certainly have a right to feel honoured and proud of the confidence they inspired. Not one word has been said against any Minister who has formed part of the Government of the country; it certainly speaks well for them. During the propaganda employed outside we were told that we must not recognise these Ministers at all. This Assembly is the place, and this is the opportune time for anyone to say anything they have to say in criticism of the Ministry. I have listened with intense interest to every speech that has been delivered, and I have not heard one word as to why we should not recognise outside in the country the men whom we recognise as Executive Ministers inside in this Dáil. The majority of the Teachtaí in this Dáil may not probably value my independent manner of speaking, but I am very pleased myself, and so is my Party. I am the Party known as the Town Tenants' Party, but I may say that I have several colleagues in the Independent Party. It is a great consolation to be able to stand up here and say that no Party in this Dáil has ventured to put forward one of their own members in opposition to members of the Executive nominated, and in that connection we have only had an expression of regret from Deputy Wilson on behalf of the Farmers' Party that they were not numerous enough to form a Cabinet.

Mr. GOREY: What about your own Party?

Mr. LYONS: With regard to the remarks made by Deputy O'Connell, I am sure that the Government or Cabinet, when appointed, will certainly do everything that is necessary to promote the education of the children of this country, and I am sure that matter is safe in the hands of Deputy MacNeill. I have nothing further to say only that I am quite satisfied, and I believe that if some Parties in the Dáil had sufficient power they would try and nominate somebody from their own ranks for the Cabinet.

Mr. ALFRED BYRNE: Before the President replies I will take this opportunity to ask the Minister for Industry and Commerce to say whether the Government intend to take any steps in the near future with a view to bringing about a Conference between the parties in order to bring about a settlement of the North Wall strike. Many thousands of pounds have been lost by the public Board of which I am a member.

A DEPUTY: Hundreds of thousands of pounds have been lost to the country.

Mr. BYRNE: I think we ought to have a statement whether it is the intention to make some effort to bring that unfortunate dispute to an end.

The PRESIDENT: The purport of the speeches which have been made refer to matters of policy, and it will be within the recollection of the old members of the Dáil that last year the policy was outlined in the speech delivered by the Governor-General. Much the same objection was made last year when forming the Ministry as has been made now, to the inclusion of particular Ministries, or rather a particular Ministry, and the exclusion of another Ministry. With the exception possibly of two or three Ministries the selection of the Executive Council is not a matter of particular Ministries, but the inclusion of certain persons.

I explained last year, as I observed just now, in reading over the report, my very great regret at not being able to include the then occupant, and, I hope, the future occupant, of the Ministry of Agriculture within the Executive Council. Last year when making up the Ministry I consulted with the other Ministers. It was within the period known as the Provisional Parliament in the Third Dáil, and I got their advice and their assistance, and I took the advice and counsel separately of some of the Ministers—I think more than of any other that of the Minister for Agriculture. The success or improvement of the development of agriculture in this country does not, in my view, depend upon the inclusion or otherwise of the Minister for Agriculture in the Executive Council. If it be thought that the work of a Ministry is of great importance to the particular subject under that Ministry, there is the fact of the maximum amount of time if the holder of that office is not a member of the Executive Council. He is not troubled by questions of policy, and he has not to attend Executive meetings, and he has not to accept responsibility unless he so desires. But I would like to say, on the part of the present occupant of that office, that he so desired and he accepted responsibility for every action of the Government as if he were a member of the Executive Council. I think the same thing might be said of the other Ministers. The circumstances of the times may have suggested to these Ministers that that was the patriotic policy. I believe that at any rate in the case of the particular Minister mentioned it was more than his conception of patriotic policy, that it was the real individual, the man himself who stood for that policy and his belief that, where there was a case in which his counsel might have altered our decision that nevertheless he was a loyal, conscientious and energetic supporter of the Government in its policy. I have only to repeat what I did say on the last occasion, that it was with regret that I could not include him in the Executive Council.

It does not interfere with what the Farmers' Party have put forward; it does not interfere with the development or improvement or the existence of the industry of agriculture in any way whatever, and when the time comes, when the farmers form their own Government, I think they will come to the conclusion that what I am saying now was not far short of the real state of the case. Now, with regard to the other Minister, I think I mentioned that the Ministry of Education was an institution in itself. That is what is in the report. But my recollection of that particular reference at the time was that I said the Minister for Education was an institution in himself. I think that Deputy O'Connell will practically admit that. I do not know, having given the matter still more consideration, that the Minister for Education should not be included within the Executive Council. After all, how are you going to reconstruct this nation? Upon what basis is the superstructure to be built? Will you not depend and must you not look to the Minister for Education to mark out the Gaelicisation, if I might so say, of our whole culture? While we have complaints that in the past that has been neglected, and that the country has not been fashioned according to the best wishes of the thinking people who are anxious for nation building, ought we not now look with hope and confidence that we will get some inspiration from the Minister for Education? I think it will be admitted upon a question of such importance as that, that the Executive Council would not be doing its duty if it did not include the Minister for Education within its ranks and accept responsibility for whatever proposals he would put forward in an attempt to make our nation separate and distinct and something to be thought of.

The economic questions that have been raised are raised at a time when the industrial atmosphere is not perhaps best constituted to lend to any statement that I might make, any degree of stability, or any hope of leading towards a more peaceable settlement of the present condition of affairs. This much I would say, that it certainly appears to me that there are certain trades or certain businesses—I have one particularly in mind, I think it was mentioned by Deputy Hewat in his maiden speech—which are not an economic proposition no matter from what angle they could possibly be considered, and that is, the provision of houses. It has always appeared to me during my experience of towns and cities in Ireland that the housing problem was a matter of the most vital importance to our people. If one examines the Census Returns of the City of Dublin I think it will be found that 62 per cent. of the people are native born. The drain from the country to supply that citizenship is enormous, and that drain will be continued until there are more satisfactory conditions prevailing with regard to the housing of the people. But does anybody suggest that the present prices, the present cost of building houses, is a cost that can be borne by the State or by any component part of the State? We know that it is not, and we know furthermore that there is something more at issue than the mere question of wages, that it is a very serious and very complicated problem, and though at this moment Deputy Johnson gave us a prescription, the patient is scarcely in a fit state to get that prescription. But even if we had agreement there is something more than agreement wanted upon the mere question of wages. There must be an admission by all parties that greater sacrifices must be made if we are to achieve the solution not only of that problem, but of many others. These are, however, problems which might be very well discussed another time. I had not any information that these questions would be raised. I should say that it may be inferred from some of the statements made, that we have not been considering these industrial disturbances. We have. I have been in consultation with the Minister for Industry and Commerce some times or at least many times in the day. He has kept me very well informed of the movements and fluctuations, and I regret to say, from what I have learned of them, that the fluctuations do not promise very well. If circumstances to-day are favourable towards one side, that side hardens. If the circumstances are reversed to-morrow, that side hardens. That is not the spirit upon which there is very great hope for a solution of these difficulties. I hope that in the matter of the consideration of these problems that are very serious—and more serious than things that affect this life—that they will bring with them very serious consideration for the future and upon the future of this country and upon the future of every order that is in the country. If we can only get some real earnest spirit of accommodation from both sides I have no fear whatever but that the result will be satisfactory to the country.

Mr. JOHNSON: On a point of order, the motion that was put into our hands is really not a motion; it is a statement that the President nominates certain Deputies as members of the Executive Council.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I was going to put it in the form of a motion. The nominations were not ready when the Order Paper was printed, and I asked the President to circulate the names at the earliest possible moment. The motion has to be in accordance with Article 53 of the Constitution, and it is as follows:—

“That the Dáil assent to the nomination of the following Deputies as members of the Executive Council:—

KEVIN O’HIGGINS, Vice-President and Minister of Home Affairs;

ERNEST BLYTHE, Minister of Finance;

RICHARD MULCAHY, Minister of Defence;

JOSEPH McGRATH, Minister of Industry and Commerce;

DESMOND FITZGERALD, Minister of External Affairs;

EOIN MacNEILL, Minister of Education (when he shall have complied with Article 17 of the Constitution).”

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Very good.

Alteration agreed to.

Motion, as altered, put and agreed to.

EXTERNAL MINISTRIES.

The PRESIDENT: I beg to move:

“Go mbeid siad so leanas ina n-Aireachta nach baill den Ard-Chomhairle a sealbhóirí, Talmhuíocht, Iascach, Rialtas Aitiúil, Oifig an Phuist.”

“That the following be Ministries the holders of which shall not be members of the Executive Council, viz., Agriculture, Fisheries, Local Government, Post Office.”

Mr. P. HUGHES: I beg to second.

Mr. JOHNSON: Before we pass this motion, I would like to raise the question whether or not experience of the past year justifies the appointment of a Minister for Fisheries. I have no doubt whatever that there is great work to be done, and very important work to be done, in the Department of Fisheries, but I am raising again what I raised before, and that is whether this Department is of such importance at present, and whether it is even possible to place it in a position of importance such as to justify the appointment of a Minister in charge. I am not going to find very great fault with it, but I am very doubtful indeed whether the work to be done in connection with fisheries will justify the appointment of a Minister, specially in charge of the Department, unless we can be assured that the finance that is necessary to put this on a proper basis to justify a Ministry is likely to be forthcoming. I do not think that anything that was reported, to the Dáil at any rate, would warrant us in saying that the work of this Department requires the attention of a special Minister. I can readily conceive that it may do so provided that finance was available in sufficient quantity; but there is no appearance of that, and I think that unless there is some promise that money will be available for the very extensive development that this Department of the National life demands, a Minister in charge of it is not required at the present stage.

Mr. GOREY: With regard to this Ministry of Fisheries. I think it can only be justified on the grounds that there are fish in the rivers and in the seas around our coast. There is no use in having a Minister for Fisheries without having the fish, and I would like to know from the recent occupant of the office what has been done and what is being done at the moment in regard to our inland or our sea fisheries. Complaints have been made by the fisherman on practically every river that nothing has been done to protect the fish. The Ministry of Fisheries has been in existence for some time, and I would like to know what is being done, now that the spawning season has commenced or is about to commence, to preserve our spawning rivers.

In the constituency I represent nothing to my knowledge has been done to protect fisheries. Money can be found for everything else in the country evidently, sometimes to the tune of millions, but this matter of fisheries, that requires very little expenditure and that would repay the country perhaps ten hundred per cent., has been left without attention. Practically all our fisheries have been denuded of fish. During the recent trouble, when there was no law or protection, all the spawning beds were denuded of fish. Dynamite had been used in the destruction of fish, and fish have been killed wholesale. At the present time fishermen on the Nore, the Suir, and the Barrow are making complaints to me and to other Deputies that there is no protection whatsoever for the fish, and they want protection. They even suggest that if there was nobody else to protect them, the military, who have little to do at the moment, should be sent out. There is no use in burking the fact that nothing has been done. I should know a little about fisheries, and I did not acquire my knowledge second-hand. I have had experience and have lived by fisheries for some time. I know all that there is to be known about fisheries. The Minister has this advantage, that he might be able to educate the fish how to protect themselves, seeing the profession that he has been brought up to.

I would like an assurance that the remnant of the fish left will be protected, and that the spawning stocks will be preserved. You have no use in appointing a Minister for Fisheries if a serious effort is not made at the beginning of the spawning season. If a serious effort is not made there is no use in proceeding with the farce of appointing a Ministry of Fisheries which would be a Ministry in name only.

Mr. WILSON: My complaint against the continuation of the Ministry of Fisheries is not that it would not be necessary, but because, in view of the finance of the country, it would be a farce to continue the Ministry and grant it £30,000 a year. The expense of the Ministry in respect of salaries and wages is £22,000, and the amount of money which these gentlemen administer is £30,000. I put it to you, is it a reasonable proposition to appoint a Minister when you have no money to develop the Department of which he is the head?

Would it not be better to wait until our finances are in a proper state before starting off with a Minister and a Department and all the other paraphernalia which can give no results because there is no money to spend? The whole thing is really a farce and a laughing stock for everybody on the ground of expense. We should abolish the Ministry, and when we have the money let us support our fisheries, because I believe the fisheries of the country, if properly handled, would yield us as much possibly as the land. For these reasons I am opposed to the appointment of a Minister for Fisheries at present.

Sir JAMES CRAIG: I regret very much that nothing has been said about the creation of a Ministry of Health. The medical profession, at all events, have been looking forward with some hope that in the new appointments to be made by the present Dáil a Ministry of Health would be among the Ministries formed. I have not urged this matter very strongly because of the expense connected with it. One does not want to multiply the number of Ministries, but, as I said on a past occasion, surely the health of the people is of more importance than the fish in the rivers and in the seas.

Mr. GOREY: Question.

Sir JAMES CRAIG: We all know, at all events, that we cannot have a healthy population if the health of the people is not looked after, and I say deliberately that the public health of the country is in a very serious condition. I am not going to press this matter at the present moment, because I feel like an orphan in this assembly. I am not going to press the President to add to his Ministries that other Ministry of Public Health, but I am going to suggest that the Government should do the next best thing, and that a Public Health Department should be formed within the Ministry of Local Government, and that there should be a Parliamentary Secretary in the Dáil who would be responsible for the Public Health Department of the Ministry of Local Government.

I admire very much the work done as Minister for Local Government by Deputy Blythe. He made himself thoroughly acquainted with the matters relating to the public health of the country, and as we know, he proposed to introduce a Public Health Bill which is one of the Bills that has been delayed owing to the work that the Government had to do before the dissolution of the last Dáil. I am very conscious that it will be a difficult matter to get a Minister who will be able to follow in the footsteps of Deputy Blythe. Deputy Blythe had made himself very thoroughly acquainted with the needs of the country, and he understood very clearly the matters that were necessary to help in the public health administration. Perhaps the President will give me some encouragement by saying that the Government will form such a Department within the Ministry of Local Government and that some Deputy will be responsible for public health matters in the Dáil.

Mr. MacBRIDE: I am one of those who, in the first instance, opposed the formation of this Ministry of Fisheries, but the Dáil, in its wisdom, thought otherwise. The Ministry was formed, and I am not going to oppose it now. But I think the whole Department ought to be scrapped. As far as I know, it consists of scientists and messenger boys. The scientists are no good, and they never produce anything. You get treatises that repel by their very appearance. They could never discover anything. They never discovered a new fishing ground. I must beg their pardon. I think they discovered, two or three years ago, a fish off the Kerry coast that was not caught in any other place except off the coast of Spain. That is so much to their credit. Deputy Gorey says there is no fish. There is any amount of fish. There are hundreds of thousands of square miles of fishing grounds off the coast of Ireland, and up to Iceland, and there has not been the slightest effort made to develop them. Men from the East coast of England come over and take the fish away. We have a Ministry of Fisheries with an income of £30,000, and only £3,000 is spent upon development. All the rest goes on the messenger boys and the scientists, who never produce anything at all. I think that the whole of them ought to be turned out and men put into the Ministry who know something about the business and who would develop the fisheries of the country. This previous Ministry of Fisheries have not yet published their report for 1921. My boots were nearly worn going to Eason's, before the last Dáil dissolved, to try and get the report for 1921, but it has not turned up yet. They are overpowered with work, but what they are doing I cannot see.

MINISTER for FISHERIES (Mr. Finian Lynch): Ní fheadar an cóir no an ceart domh-sa éinnidh a rádh sa cheist seo, acht caithfead-sa a rádh gur dóigh liom gur náireach an rud a dubhairt an teachta Seosamh Mac Brighde. Is an-fhuirist cainnt a dhléanamh mar gheall ar dhaoineibh nach bhfuil láithreach, acht se mo thuairim-se nach cóir é nuair nach bhfuilid láithreach cumh iad fein do chosaint.

I think that Deputy MacBride's talk about our scientists and the officials of the Department is very ill-mannered, to say the least of it. It is very cheap for Deputies to get up here and criticise officials who cannot defend themselves. These officials, in a sense, of course, were traditional. They were handed down to me from the C.D.B. and the D.A.T.I. At least they have worked loyally with me, and they have performed their duties to my satisfaction. I think it is very bad taste of any Deputy to get up in the Dáil and criticise persons who cannot defend themselves here. Deputy MacBride stated, and the same mistake was made by other Deputies, less ill-mannered, I should say, that there was only £3,000 for development and that the rest was spent upon administration. Deputies will remember that when the estimates were brought up it looked as if there was only £3,000 for development, but I pointed out that there was money coming from the C.D.B., something like £25,000 or £45,000—I have not the figures with me—that was also to be spent upon development. When persons criticise it would be well that they should have their figures made up more correctly than the criticisms I have heard this evening would show.

I should say I agree almost entirely with Deputy Johnson. I agree that it is a joke to have a Ministry of Fisheries if it is not financed, and I hope that the finance will be forthcoming. Deputy Gorey asked me about the protection of spawning beds. Under the existing law that is the duty of the Conservators. The Ministry has really very little control, except inasmuch as it makes a small grant annually to the Boards, and that is the only power the old Fishery Department had as far as protection was concerned. The Boards of Conservators appointed bailiffs, or whatever they were called, to supervise the rivers, and actually in Deputy Gorey's own county my information is that there was an extraordinary improvement through the action of the Civic Guard and the military in the county. I think that is all that it is necessary for me to say. I feel it would be rather bad taste on my part to defend the Ministry to which I am attached.

Mr. T. J. O'CONNELL: It appears that some of the recent speakers are under the impression that we are criticising or have under consideration the work of the Department of Fisheries. The real question at issue is whether a separate Ministry of Fisheries should be set up or not. While agreeing with what Deputy Johnson has said, that there is little use in having a Ministry unless it is properly financed, I do hold that a separate Minister for Fisheries is essential. Knowing something of the condition of our fisheries on the western coast I believe that there is there a vast field for development. We have very few industries in Ireland, but I am confident that fishing could be developed very much to the benefit of the people who work in the industry, and also the people who through its development would be provided with cheap and wholesome food. Anyone who knows conditions there, and who has seen, as I have, fishermen unable to send out their boats owing to want of proper tackle and appliances, while, at the same time, trawlers coming over from Fleetwood and Hull rake up at the very doors of the fishermen the harvest that should be theirs, must admit that it is essential a special Department of the Government should be set up to look after what could be a great industry in this country. If that is to be done properly, it must, as Deputy Johnson stated, be taken seriously, and a matter of £3,000 or £30,000 is nothing when compared with the results that may be attained by properly dealing with the whole question on a big scale. I do not agree with the policy of my friend, Deputy Wilson, in waiting until the finances are there. You will not have the finances if you wait. The way to provide finances and to provide employment and money in the country is to set about the development of industries such as this, and for that reason I am prepared to support the establishment of the Ministry of Fisheries.

Mr. P. J. SHAW: I wish to support the appointment of a Minister for Fisheries. I wish to mention that in the county from which I come there are a number of lakes to which large numbers of visitors came from different parts of England to fish. Owing to the fact that during the last three, four, or five years 90 per cent. of the trout that went up to spawn in the rivers never came back, that industry at the present time is practically extinct. In the last couple of years you could count the boats during the May-fly fishing season, whereas four or five years ago, when there was protection, the lakes in that county were dotted with fishing boats. An immense amount of money was spent in the county by the visitors. I would ask the Minister for Fisheries to endeavour during the coming spawning season to see that the gross abuses which existed, and which I can guarantee to prove did exist, will be stopped. Otherwise it would be much better that the rivers should be blocked up, so as not to allow the trout up to spawn, because when they did go they never came back, and the rivers are so depleted that fishing has become a byword. Instead of going to fish now you might as well go out and take the fresh air.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. Ernest Blythe): With regard to the remarks of Deputy Sir James Craig, I think it should be clear to the Dáil that there could be no question of having a Department of Public Health and a Department of Local Government at the same time. The Department of Local Government is really, so far as it goes, a Department of Public Health. Nearly all the activities of that Department, if you leave out roads, are concerned with Public Health. Housing and the relief of the necessitous are really matters for a Department of Public Health. The medical charities or the provision of medical relief is also a matter for the Public Health Department. In the Ministries Bill, which it was not possible to bring before the Dáil, I believe it was the intention that the name should be the Department of Local Government and Public Health, and that the National Insurance Commission would come in under that Department. It would then be merely a matter of choosing a name. It could be the Department of Health, or the Ministry of Health, or any other name that was suggested. It is intended really to give a substance to the Department of Health. There are one or two functions added to it which it is thought would be an administrative convenience to have added.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: In view of the discussion that has been created by the suggestion that Ministries should be allocated in advance, I would like to suggest to the President quite briefly, that it might be better to adopt the procedure adopted in the previous Dáil. Instead of deciding before the Committee meets what are the posts to be filled by the Committee, the Committee itself should undertake the consideration both of the Departments to be created, which are non-Executive Departments, and of the Ministers who shall fill those Departments. It has been urged that certain revision of Departments should occur. A proposal has been made that one Department shall be deleted. Before any decision can be taken on matters of that kind it is perfectly clear that detailed information would be required, such as is not before the Dáil at the present moment, and which is not likely to be before the Dáil under its present constitution. It is rather a matter to be looked into by a Committee that might call special evidence from the Departments concerned. I therefore suggest, without going into any details, that if the Dáil were to proceed with Resolution 3, appointing the Committee as required under the requisite Article of the Constitution—Article 55—that the Committee might be charged not merely with appointing names to certain Departments, but that the Committee might bring recommendations before the Dáil as to what other Departments should be created beyond the six Departments already defined, as existing within the Executive Council.

The PRESIDENT: I notice that during the contests that have just taken place throughout the country a great deal of lopsided financial propositions were dealt with, sometimes in publications, and at other times by speakers. Amongst the rest, in some parts of the country this particular Ministry may have been under discussion. It would appear from an examination of the estimates for Fisheries that there was some extraordinary extravagance and that where development is only put down for £3,000 the total gross cost of the Ministry would be £55,500.

I spoke to the Minister for Fisheries a couple of days ago and told him that, so far as I could see, his particular Ministry would be probably criticised and that its retention would probably be questioned in the Dáil. In considering this particular Ministry one ought to bear in mind what the circumstances of the moment are, and what they have been for the past few years, not alone in this country, but in England, Scotland, and on the Continent. One should see how the fisheries developed or how the industry of fishing progressed in England during the last couple of years and what its condition is to-day. We should take stock of our particular position with regard to this industry.

I understand there is no country in Europe with such a coast line suitable for fisheries as we have, and I suppose there is no country in Europe where the fishing industry is at such a low ebb as it is in this country. That there are potentialities in the fisheries of this country, both internal and external, I think everybody will admit. Even if there is not sufficient money available to develop fisheries, surely it is not waste of money to have a Minister appointed who will consider how it is best to accommodate the expenses of such development with the financial condition of the country. I have gone through the report which I have got from the Minister for Fisheries on this subject, and in it attention is drawn to the fact that the fishing industry not alone in Ireland, but in Great Britain, was at its lowest ebb during the last twelve months. It was due to three causes. The European markets, it appears, were disorganised through political upheavals. Mackerel was not in demand in the big centres of population in England since these markets were flooded with fish carried on the steam trawling fleets which had just begun to operate after the war, and even these steam trawling companies were unable to make ends meet. The general conditions prevailing in Ireland during 1922 did not lend themselves to the development of an industry such as that of fishing, which requires prompt delivery and excellent transit and accommodation, more than is supplied by the ordinary times of the departure and arrival of trains that one sees in the railway companies notices. It is well known that the loss of a train may possibly involve enormous loss to persons engaged in this calling. The Minister has shown me tables dealing with the number of English, Scottish and Irish steam vessels. In England the number is over 2,000, in Scotland it is nearly 1,000, and in Ireland 11. Motor vessels in England number 468, in Scotland over 2,000, and in Ireland 291. Sailing vessels in England number over 500, in Scotland over 4,000, and in Ireland the number is written down as 3,089, and it is remarked underneath that that number includes 1,639 rowing boats. The report goes on to say what has been done even under these very depressing and unusual conditions. It states that the fishing season opened last spring, and the task was to induce the fishermen to go to sea. Many boat-owners had no nets fit for fishing. Their gear had become worn out in fruitless efforts in 1921, and they had no means to buy new ones. Loans were given by the Ministry to equip the Arklow fleet for the south-west mackerel season which opened in April, and even with the provision of gear they were unwilling to undertake the voyage to Baltimore and other places, as the railway service from Cork to those fishing places was still suspended. The Ministry was compelled to set up a scheme for the transit of these catches to the nearest port to the Welsh markets. The catches were sold in bulk in Milford Haven by a salesmaster, but the scheme did not prove a financial success, as the fish were late in striking the coast, and the weather was wet and stormy and unsuitable for fishing. Now, the Ministry apparently was satisfied that were it not for the little assistance given in that instance it would have been impossible, if a good deal of the expenses were not available for use in the proper channels, to have got these particular facilities. Loans, it appears, were made available at Howth, and, generally speaking, from a perusal of this report I would say that the Ministry has not been idle. To my mind the actual sum that would be saved by not having a Minister appointed to this particular activity would not be a financial proposition, and I would be very glad if, in considering financial propositions, a little more study of the fundamentals of finance were given. I have observed in some publications—if I may digress for moment—that comparisons are made between the cost of the services in 1923 and in 1916. A child in the matter of finance would tell you that it was much less expensive to live in 1916 than it is now. Comparisons such as these mislead not alone the unfortunate dupe who conceives the idea of making such comparisons, but also mislead others. They do not lead anywhere, and they would not be altered if the persons issuing these publications were trying to do here what we have been trying to do for the last twelve months. Two points have been under discussion on the question of this Ministry. One is whether a Minister should be appointed at all, and another is, whether the particular Minister who has been in charge of this Ministry should be re-elected. That is not the point. The point is, that there are four Ministries put forward by me, the holders of which will have to be recommended by a Committee of fifteen Deputies in accordance with Article 55 of the Constitution. I should say that if the Minister for Fisheries had his way a very much larger sum of money would have been included in the Estimates, but whether it is his great respect for me as Minister for Finance, or the power I had over Estimates, they were cut down. It is a very small amount. It may be, even in the exceptional circumstances through which we passed, that fishing was not economical, it is just as well that the amount was small. But there ought to be great opportunities for development, and I think every member is satisfied that there are such opportunities, and if that be so I think they warrant the appointment of such a Ministry.

Motion put and agreed to.

EXTERNAL MINISTERS—

APPOINTMENT OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE.

The PRESIDENT: I move:—

Bhunreacht i dtaobh na n-Airi i gcoir Talmhuíochta, Iascaigh, Rialtais Aitiúla agus Oifig an Phuist. Go dtoghtar an Coiste do reir an Vote ionaistrithe singil; Gur aon duine deag a bheidh mar quorum den Choiste.”

“That a Committee of the Dáil, consisting of 15 Deputies, be chosen to make recommendations to the Dáil in accordance with Article 55 of the Constitution as to the Ministers for Agriculture, Fisheries, Local Government and the Post Office; that the Committee be elected by the single transferable vote; that the quorum of the Committee be eleven.”

I think, before other members retire for afternoon tea, that they ought to be informed of the necessity for voting when the Ballot takes place. It is advisable that there should be a full attendance of members so as to get the actual effect of the Constitution.

Mr. BLYTHE: I second.

Motion put and agreed to.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Nomination papers for this Committee have been prepared, and I would suggest, if it meets with the approval of Deputies, that nominations should be received in the Clerk's office up to twelve o'clock noon on Saturday next, and that the election should take place on Tuesday. If the voting papers could be handed in between three and four on Tuesday it would allow the doing of other business on Tuesday, and we might be able to get the result announced on Tuesday evening.

Mr. JOHNSON: What is in the mind of the Ministry in this matter? Do they desire that the new appointments shall be made at an early date, or do they desire that the actual appointments should be postponed for some time? I rather anticipated that the appointment of the Committee would be finished this week and that the Committee would meet at once. I have no doubt the decisions have already been taken. Therefore, the final result of the election of this Committee, that is the appointments of the Ministers, could be completed at an early date next week. I do not know what the intention of the Ministry may be in regard to the continuation of the sittings of the Dáil, but I have heard it whispered that there is likely to be an adjournment some day next week for a week or two. If that is the case we ought to get rid of this little problem before this adjournment. If we are only to take the election of the Committee on Tuesday, then it means if they are to do any business allotted to them while the other people are adjourning or enjoying the adjournment, the decision will be postponed until the resumption after the adjournment. That, I think, will be too long distant. I suggest we get a Committee elected this week.

Vol. 5.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: By what process?

Mr. JOHNSON: Nomination to-morrow, and election on Saturday. I suggest that the attendance here now is as great as it will be, and we can take the nominations to-night.

The PRESIDENT: I would like to point out this to the Deputy. He knows some of the difficulties we were in last year. Permission is asked to introduce a Bill on the 1st of the month. The second reading takes place on the 3rd with some accommodation from the House. If it passes its second reading on the 3rd it cannot be taken in Committee until the 7th. So that between the date of the introduction of the Bill and the going into the actual discussion on Committee something like six days must elapse. Let us assume the Governor-General delivers his speech at a given date. Obviously members want to see that in print before it is discussed. We were hoping to have the first reading of the Judiciary Bill this evening, the second reading on Tuesday. This election could take place on Tuesday, and we could have the Governor-General's speech on the 3rd of October. The Judiciary Bill could go into Committee on that date. Let us give two or three days for that. Then a discussion could take place on the Governor-General's speech. In the absence of such arrangements as that we would be almost committed to bringing members up from the country for a day in the week. We anticipate bringing them up on Tuesday next would obviate the necessity of bringing them up one day only in the week until we settle down to business.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The proposal is to meet next Tuesday and to adjourn until the 3rd of October, which will be a Wednesday. Let the Committee meet that week and make recommendations.

The PRESIDENT: I am in no hurry for the Committee, but it is advisable that the Minister for Local Government be appointed soon.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I do not think Deputy Johnson's programme

could be carried out this week as this is Thursday.

Mr. JOHNSON: I thought there might be some business to-morrow, or in any case if the nominations be taken to-day the election of a Committee could be taken to-morrow and the Committee could meet next week and get through its business. If full consideration has been given to the matter I do not mind.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Nominations will be accepted up to Saturday, at 12 noon, in the Clerk's office. The voting papers can be handed in on Tuesday before 4 o'clock. The result will be ready on Tuesday evening before the Dáil adjourns, that is before 8.30. Ballot papers can be sent out on Saturday.

The PRESIDENT: There are a number of new members who are not perhaps aware that they have the power to nominate a person. Any single member of the Dáil can nominate another member. Nominations are not limited, but I think they should be limited to

Mr. McCARTHY: If the ballot papers are posted on Saturday some of the members may not get them.

Mr. HUGHES: Might not the papers be distributed to Deputies at the meeting of the Dáil on Tuesday?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes, we can distribute them on Tuesday in the Dáil, and they can be handed in before 4 o'clock, if that is considered a better arrangement. We will inform Deputies that their presence at a meeting on Tuesday is necessary.

Before coming to the next business, I might point out that it is necessary, under the Standing Orders, to receive nominations for the position of Leas-Cheann Comhairle, or Deputy Speaker. Only one nomination has been received so far, that of Deputy Padraic O'Maille, and his name will appear on the Order Paper on Tuesday. The election of Leas-Cheann Comhairle will be part of the business for Tuesday next.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BILL.— FIRST STAGE.

The PRESIDENT: I beg to move for leave to introduce "A Bill for the establishment of Courts of Justice pursuant to the Constitution of Saorstát Éireann, and for the purposes relating to the better administration of justice."

Just before the close of the last session I moved for permission to introduce this Bill. Permission was given, and the Bill is now in print, but the fact that it was not passed in the last session leaves us in the position of having to introduce it again from the very beginning. For the benefit of members of the Dáil, who were not members of the Third Dáil, I should say that this Bill is drafted on the lines recommended by a Committee which was set up by the Executive Council to consider the whole question. It was stated during the last session of the Dáil that owing to its importance, and to the fact that it marked such a distinction, such a passing away of what might be called old landmarks and the establishment of a new system, it would be advisable that this particular Bill should be before the country for some time. It has now been before the country for nearly two months, and, as far as I have been able to find out, there has been no criticism of it. The Bill is drafted to suit the needs of the country. It follows out the lines laid down in the Constitution, and we hope that it will give that confidence which courts of justice ought to command in any country. There are certain objections to it from certain quarters, but they have not found any real volume of public opinion behind them. I am sure it will not be taken as any slight upon either of the professions mainly concerned if I say that it is natural that there should be objection to it, having regard to the fact that law is going to be made somewhat cheaper for the ordinary citizen in the country. Naturally, if a particular commodity that was very expensive is going to be made cheaper, somebody must suffer, and, consequently, there will be dissatisfaction among the sufferers.

In introducing the Bill to the Dáil, on the last occasion, I laid some stress on the fact that the system by which the Bench was recruited in the old days did not lend itself to popular approval, and, as a consequence, the courts came to be termed "British Courts." During the struggle that took place for the assertion of the rights of the Nation, alternative courts of justice, called Dáil Courts, were established, and it might have been urged against the Saorstát that a considerable time elapsed before we attempted to bring into being courts which should command, and which ought to command, the confidence of the people, because the system, as it was, was not of our making, and the system that is outlined in this particular Bill is of our making.

This Bill does not within itself deal in a detailed manner, and could not deal in a detailed manner, with the whole organisation for the administration of justice. It creates the framework of courts of justice into which the detailed organisation will be fitted. It prescribes, in accordance with the recommendations of the Judiciary Committee, the various grades of courts and measure of jurisdiction in each grade. It provides that each court shall, by means of a Rule-making Authority, settle the detailed scheme of administration of the courts. The Rules that will be made for that purpose will be laid upon the Table of both Houses of the Oireachtas, so that they can be examined to see that they are administratively satisfactory and really enable the new courts to fulfil the high hopes entertained for a more efficient, expeditious, and less costly judicial system. I accordingly move for permission to bring in this Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Second Reading ordered for Tuesday next.

The PRESIDENT: I move that the Dáil do now adjourn until Tuesday next at 3 o'clock.

Question put, and agreed to.

The Dáil adjourned at 5.20 p.m.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS. ORAL ANSWERS.

BRITISH SAFEGUARDING OF INDUSTRIES ACT.—(FISCAL COMMISSIONERS' REPORT.)

Major BRYAN R. COOPER: Before putting this question, I would like to congratulate the Minister upon his courage in taking up this office. I beg to ask him whether he proposes to act on the interim report of the Fiscal Inquiry Commission and to repeal the duties now levied under the British Safeguarding of Industries Act.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. Blythe): The proposals contained in the Interim Report of the Fiscal Enquiry Committee in regard to the repeal of the duties now levied under the Safeguarding of Industries Act are at present under consideration and I will make a statement as to the Government's intentions in due course.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF THE GREAT WAR.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Finance whether the Irish Government have any representative on the Pensions Appeal Board in Dublin; whether he is aware that recently the British Pensions Board have made considerable reductions in pensions to dependents of Irish soldiers who were killed in the Great War; whether he is aware that the reductions which applied to Irish dependents were based on an English cost of living figure, if he will take steps to see that Appeals are not rejected or pensions reduced on citizens of the Free State without first satisfying the Free State Government or its representative that such decisions are justified.

Mr. BLYTHE: The administration of British military pensions is not a matter in which the Government of the Irish Free State is officially concerned. I am, however, taking steps to have the representations contained in the Deputy's question brought to the notice of the appropriate British authority.

Mr. SHAW: Arising out of the Minister's reply to this question, I beg to ask if it is correct to say that dependents' allowances have been reduced by 50 per cent? I am aware that such a reduction has been made in the Counties of Longford and Westmeath, which I represent, and I desire to know if the reduction is a general one.

Mr. BLYTHE: I am not aware of any reduction.

Mr. SHAW: As Chairman of the Westmeath Pensions Committee, I am aware that such a reduction has been made.

SURVEYS OF IRELAND (CUSTODY OF).

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Finance whether he will take steps to secure from the British Government all the original engraved Plates, Drawings, Triangulations, Notes etc., relating to the Surveys of Ireland; whether he is aware that these valuable works, together with plans and Engravings and Charts of Irish Territorial Waters and Harbours, were removed to the Ordnance Survey Department, Southampton, also a valuable dynamo used for electrotyping of copperplates; to ask that this branch of the National Service be restored to its former prominence.

Mr. BLYTHE: Steps have already been taken to secure for the Government of the Irish Free State its fair share of the property referred to. The return of the plates referred to in the first part of the question has been going on for some months past, but has been held up owing to transit difficulties. The electrotyping plant was removed to Southampton about twenty years ago, and is understood to be entirely out of date.

DESTROYED PROPERTY (CLAIMS FOR COMPENSATION).

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Finance whether he can now state when the Dublin claims for destroyed property, commandeered goods, motor cars, etc., will be heard, and whether the Government propose to take steps to speed up the rebuilding of O'Connell Street.

Mr. BLYTHE: I presume that the various claims referred to in the Deputy's question are such as come within the scope of the Damage to Property (Compensation) Act, 1923, as amended by the Damage to Property (Amendment) Act, 1923. A commencement will be made with the hearing of Dublin cases in the Michaelmas Sessions now at hand.

Subject to the provisions of the Acts mentioned, the question of rebuilding is one for the owners of the property destroyed, and the imposition of rebuilding conditions rests with the Court. Of course, there must be a full reinstatement condition as in the case of the O'Connell Street area.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

TOMAS MacEOIN asked the Minister for Local Government whether the appointment of Inspectors under the Food and Drugs Act rests solely with the County Councils, or whether such appointments require his sanction; whether he proposes to compel County Councils to appoint members of the Gárda Síochána as Inspectors by withholding his sanction to the appointment of any other person by a County Council; and, if not, what is the reason for refusing sanction to the appointment proposed to be made by the Louth County Council.

Mr. BLYTHE (replied): County Councils have no power of appointment of Inspectors specially for the purposes of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts. The law on the matter is in Section 13 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, as to which I have been advised that the duties must be assigned to a police officer and also that the sanction of the Minister for Local Government is not required. Members of the Gárda Síochána are being specially instructed in these duties.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE.

TOMAS MacEOIN asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce if he will state:

(1) The number of persons in insured trades at present unemployed.

(2) How many of these are still entitled to benefit in the First Benefit Year under the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1923.

(3) How many it is estimated will enter the Second Benefit Year on October 18th, with contributions to credit, and what will be the average number of contributions to credit of such persons?

MINISTER for INDUSTRY and COMMERCE (Mr. Joseph McGrath):

(1) The number of persons in the insured trades whose employment books were lodged on the 28th August last, the latest date for which complete statistics are available, was 42,281. This figure includes a number of persons who had found employment but had not removed their books.

(2) 49,725 persons have so far claimed benefit in the first benefit year, of whom 8,925 were entitled to less than the full 15 weeks.

(3) 42,740 of those who have claimed benefit this year will enter the next benefit year on October 18th with contributions to credit. The average number of such contributions cannot be calculated without much labour, but the great majority of persons have a substantial number.

It will be appreciated that the figures given in answer to Parts (1) (2) and (3) of the question are not strictly comparable. Individuals included in one figure find employment [Minister for Industry.] during the benefit year and are consequently not included in another figure compiled at a different date in that year. The figures, however, enable the general position to be understood.

ELECTRICITY COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce if Electricity Commissioners have been appointed in accordance with the "Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919"; and if no such Commissioners have been appointed, what person is exercising the functions prescribed in that Act; and under what title reference may be made to such person, or persons? Further, to ask if the definitions accorded to the expressions "authorised distributors" and "authorised undertakers" in that Act are proper definitions in the Saorstát. And finally, to ask when appropriate legislation may be expected to be introduced to take the place of the Electricity Supply and Lighting Acts and Regulations from 1882 to 1922.

Mr. McGRATH: Electricity Commissioners under the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919, have not been appointed in the Saorstát, the amount of work under the Act not justifying the expense of that course. The Ministries Bill, shortly to be introduced, will provide that the functions of the Electricity Commissioners are to be exercised by the Ministry of Industry and Commerce pending the introduction of a Bill, which is already in draft, to codify and amend the law relating to Electricity Supply and Lighting. I am unable at present to give a precise date for the introduction of this measure. Until it becomes law the definitions of "authorised distributors" and "authorised undertakers" in the several existing Electricity Supply and Lighting Acts will remain unaltered.

IRISH TRANSPORT OFFICIAL'S ARREST.

SEAN BUITLEIR asked the Minister for Home Affairs with reference to the arrest under the Public Safety (Emergency Powers) Act, 1923, of James Baird, an official of the Irish Transport and General Workers' Union, locally in charge of the workers' interests in the trade dispute in Co. Waterford, which of the twelve offences specified in Part II. of the Schedule to that Act he committed or attempted to commit, or was suspected of having committed, and what are the reasons which cause the Minister to be of opinion that the public safety would be endangered by Mr. Baird being set at liberty.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. Kevin O'Higgins): James Baird, Labour Organiser, was arrested by a responsible officer of Garda Síochána on the 6th instant in Waterford and interned on a Detention Order signed by an Executive Minister under Section 2 (2) of the Public Safety (Emergency Powers) Act, 1923, inasmuch as he was suspected of being guilty of the offence mentioned in No. 12 of the offences set out in Part II. of the Schedule to the Act, viz.—encouraging the commission of arson described in No. 7 of the said Part of the said Schedule.

SEIZED SHOT-GUNS.

RISTEARD Mac LIAM asked the Minister for Home Affairs what is the position in regard to the guns taken up from farmers and others in the pre-Truce period by the British authorities, and what steps are necessary to be taken by the owners to recover possession of these guns.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Arrangements, which will be in operation from the 1st October, are being made to restore these guns to their owners. The guns will be returned by the Ministry of Defence to applicants resident in the Dublin area at Island Bridge Barracks, and to applicants resident in other areas at the Headquarters of the nearest Military Command. The procedure entails an application for a licence to be in possession of the arms to a Superintendent of the Dublin Metropolitan Police or to a Superintendent of the Garda Síochána, as the case may be. These licences should be presented by the applicants, who should also furnish any official receipts in their possession in respect of the guns, as well as any descriptive particulars which would lead to the easy identification of the arms.

MILITARY MOTORS (IDENTIFICATION NUMBERS).

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS asked the Minister for Defence whether all Army cars and lorries are obliged by regulations to carry numbers of identification, and if so, what steps are being taken to enforce such regulations.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): It is not a legal obligation that military motor vehicles should be registered and carry the usual identification numbers, but it is now an inter-departmental regulation that they should be registered with the Dublin Corporation. A number of cars have already been registered. Arrangements are in hands for giving full effect to the regulation and for affixing identification plates to all motor cars and lorries as soon as possible.

DISCHARGED SOLDIERS (UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFIT).

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that many soldiers on being released from Army service are not entitled to unemployment benefits, if he will take steps to see that some arrangement is made that would enable them to be paid; further, whether he is aware that in some cases where men left their employment in answer to the call to arms they have not been reinstated by their former employers.

General MULCAHY: I understand that only soldiers who had Unemployment Insurance contributions to their credit at the dates of their enlistment are eligible for unemployment benefit on discharge from the Army. To ensure the retention in each case of right to such benefit, it was provided by Section 7 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1923, that the minimum number (12) of contributions required to be made by previous Acts in each insurance year would be paid from Army funds in respect of each such year or part of such year that the soldier had served in the Army. It was not possible to make any further financial provision in connection with Unemployment Insurance. I should mention, however, that soldiers who are now being demobilised, except those who are discharged for ignominy, inefficiency, or for private reasons, are granted 28 days furlough with the pay of their rank, ration allowance of 2/- per day, and dependents' allowance where such is payable.

The question of the reinstatement of discharged soldiers in their pre-enlistment occupations which they left in answer to the call to arms is in the hands of the Minister for Industry and Commerce, who has set up a special section of his Department to look after this and other matters connected with the re-settlement of soldiers in civil life. I am sure that if the Deputy will communicate with that Minister, particulars of any cases he has in mind they will get good attention.

BARLEY GROWING.

Mr. WILLIAM DAVIN: I beg to ask the President the following question, of which I have given him private notice: Whether the Executive Council have taken, or are about to take, the steps necessary to secure a reasonable price for barley during the coming season, with a view to protecting the threatened interests of Irish barley growers; whether any representations have been made to Messrs. Arthur Guinness and Sons, Ltd., and other Irish brewers and maltsters on the subject; or, alternatively, whether it is the intention of the Executive Council to take steps to prohibit the importation of foreign barley with a view to saving Irish barley growers from economic ruin.

The PRESIDENT: A somewhat similar question was asked on the 31st July last, and I understand that another question is going to be raised on the adjournment, dealing with some labour disputes which at present exist in portion of the territory under our jurisdiction. It was my intention in answering the question about barley to deal with the other question also at the same time. If the Deputy would agree I would postpone making that statement until after this other question has been raised. I have given the matter careful consideration, and I came to the conclusion that the two subjects were intermixed and that the matter would be best dealt with in a statement on the second question which, although it may not have any appearance of association with the other question is, in my opinion, bound up with it, and I propose to deal with it in the statement I am to make. If the Deputy would agree to that I would postpone making the statement until after the other question has been raised on the adjournment.

QUESTIONS ON THE ADJOURNMENT.

LOUGH SWILLY AND LONDONDERRY RAILWAY STOPPAGE.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to give notice that I will raise on the adjournment a matter of urgent public importance, that is the question of the stoppage on the Lough Swilly and Londonderry Railway and the effect of that stoppage on the industries of Tírconail.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Has the motion the support of twelve Deputies? The necessary support having been indicated,

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The question will be taken at 7 o'clock, or before that if the Order Paper is finished.

STOPPAGE OF SALES IN WICKLOW.

Mr. WILSON: I beg to give notice that I will raise on the adjournment the stoppage of two sales yesterday in the County Wicklow by a member of this Dáil.

THE STRIKE AT NORTH WALL.

Mr. A. BYRNE: Before the Dáil proceeds with the ordinary business I desire to ask whether the President or any of the other Ministers propose making any announcement before the Dáil adjourns with reference to the trouble at the North Wall.

The PRESIDENT: In the statement that I propose making I will deal generally with the industrial situation, and in that way I think the North Wall is just as much included as Lough Swilly, and I hope that in the same way I will be able to associate in that statement the question raised by Deputy Davin.

DAOINE A TOGHADH CHUN FÓNAMH SA DÁIL A gCIMEAD.

ELECTION OF COMMITTEE.

[To make recommendations as to Ministers who shall not be members of the Executive Council, in accordance with Article 55 of the Constitution.]

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The next business is the election of a Committee to make recommendations as to Ministers who shall not be members of the Executive Council, in accordance with of the Constitution. The practice has been that Deputies get their ballot papers from the Clerk at the table and that the Dáil adjourns for an hour for the purpose of carrying out the election. The ballot box will be on the Clerk's table. It was arranged to have the election between 3 and 4 o'clock, but we did not take account of questions, so the Dáil can adjourn until 4 or 4.30, as Deputies think fit.

DEPUTIES: Four o'clock.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is four o'clock sufficient then?

Mr. JOHNSON: Had we better not wait until we know how long the distribution of papers will take? If it takes ten minutes that means that there will be only twenty minutes for consultation as to how the papers should be marked.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Perhaps we had better adjourn until 4.15.

The PRESIDENT: I beg to move the adjournment until 4.15.

Agreed.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputies will get their papers from the Clerk and will put the papers into the box provided for them before 4.15. The votes will then be counted and the result announced before the Dáil rises.

The Dáil adjourned at 3.30 until 4.15 p.m.

The Dáil resumed at 4.15 p.m.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Ninety-seven ballot papers were issued.

ELECTION OF LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE.

AIRE UM IASGACH (Fionán O Loingsigh): Cuirim os cómhair na Dála go dtóghfar Pádraic O Máille mar

Leas-Cheann Comhairle. Fear maicánta, deagh-mhúinte iseadh Teachta O Máille agus bhíomar go léir lán-tsásta leis fad a bhí sé mar Leas-Cheann Comhairle againn. Bhí aithmhéula orainn nach rabh sé in-ánn cuidiú leis an gCeann Comhairle mar bá choir ar feadh i bhfád acht tá áhas orainn anois go bhfuil sé co-láidir, slán 's a bhí sé ariamh agus go m-beidh sé abalta feasta cabhair mór a thabhairt don Cheann Comhairle, Cuirim an rún ós bhur g-comhair.

Professor ALTON: With very great pleasure, I second the proposal of the Minister for Fisheries, that Deputy Pádraic O'Máille be our Leas-Cheann Comhairle. It needs no words of mine to commend Deputy O'Máille to the Dáil. His good qualities are as great and conspicuous as his stature. We all know his geniality, his humanity and, what is essential in one who will occupy your Chair, sir, impartiality. It is with a special pleasure that I second the proposal.

Question put and agreed to.

PADRAIC O MAILLE: A Chinn Chomhairle agus a co-Theachtaí, táim an-bhuideach díbh mar gheall gur toghadh mé mar Leas-Cheann Comhairle; geallaim díbh go n-déunfad mo dhícheall chun an obair a dheunamh mar ba chóir agus go d-tabharfad cóthrom agus ceart do gach duine ins na díospóireachtaí a bheas againn annseo. Déunfad sin co fáda agus atáim agaibh mar Leas-Cheann Comhairle.

A Chinn Chomhairle and fellow Deputies, I am extremely grateful to you for having selected me as Leas-Cheann Comhairle, and I promise to do my best to carry out the duties of that office. When I am presiding over the Dáil, I shall endeavour to see that every Deputy who wishes to take part in the debate shall get fair play. I wish again to thank the Deputies most sincerely.

APPOINTMENT OF SESSIONAL -SELECTION COMMITTEE.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: We have on the Order Paper three Committees to be chosen to-day. There has been some discussion on the matter during the adjournment, and the President, I think, has a suggestion to make.

The PRESIDENT: I think it is the general opinion that Committees set up by the Dáil should bear as close a resemblance to the constitution of the Dáil as is reasonably possible. The Committee to be elected to make recommendations as to Ministers who shall not be members of the Executive is, in my view, a suitable body to make suggestions with regard to the appointment of other Committees, and the ballot which has just taken place ought to be a very fair reflex of the opinions of Deputies. It occurred to me, on seeing on the Order Paper the appointment of three Committees, that that would mean three other elections, if we were to get the same reflex as we hope to get from the ballot that has just taken place, and in consultation with the Ceann Comhairle, I pointed out that while some Deputies might be perfectly willing to act on some Committees they might not either like the work of other Committees, or possibly would not be able to afford the time. I would suggest, therefore, to the Dáil for its consideration that the nomination of members to act on the Committee on Procedure and Privileges, the Committee on Standing Orders for Private Bill business, and the House Committee should be left to this Committee that will be elected to-day.

In that way I think the various sections in the Dáil will get fair representation, and if it should happen, by accident, that any party might get more than its due share, our experience in the old Dáil was that there was always a readiness to give and take with regard to these matters, the real underlying idea with all here being to get Committees appointed which would be as near as possible to what might be called the least common multiple of the whole Dáil. I suggest, accordingly, that this Committee, which will make recommendations as to the Ministers who shall not be members of the Executive Council, should nominate the Committees which are set out under headings 3, 4, and 5 on the Order Paper.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the suggestion of the President is a workable one and that it ought to give satisfaction. I will support him.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I was going to suggest that it might be desirable that the principle that the President has stated should be extended further, and that the Committee to be elected to-day should continue as a Committee of Selection, not only for the three Committees referred to, but for any subsequent Committee desired by the Dáil, and that they should forward nominations and remain during the whole of this Session in existence as a Committee of Selection.

Mr. D. J. GOREY: We are quite satisfied with the suggestion made by the President. We think it is a workable suggestion and we agree to it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There will be no difficulty about making it a Sessional Selection Committee.

The PRESIDENT: Very good. I move: "That Deputies elected to the Committee to make recommendations in accordance with Article 55 of the Constitution, be appointed a Sessional Committee of Selection with power to nominate Deputies to serve on any Special Committee that it may be deemed necessary to set up throughout the Session; that the quorum of the Committee be seven."

Mr. JOHNSON: I second.

Question put and agreed to.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BILL, 1923.—

SECOND STAGE.

The PRESIDENT: I beg to move the Second Reading of the Courts of Justice Bill, 1923. There are just a few words I would add to the explanation which I made in introducing this measure. Its main and most notable feature, other than that of District Justice Courts, which could hardly be described as quite new, by reason of the fact that they have been in existence for some time and have given considerable satisfaction, is the scheme of Circuit Courts which has been borrowed to a large extent from the Dáil system or, for members who may not have been in close touch with that system, to the system of Courts set up under the First and Second Dáil. These Circuit Courts will take the place, firstly, of the existing County Courts, and, secondly, so much of the High Court jurisdiction as related to the everyday legal business of the country which ought to be disposed of locally. They will deal with cases of actions in which sums of money up to three hundred pounds are involved. They will also deal with actions in connection with land where the land does not exceed in annual value £60, and they will deal with the administration of property up to £1,000. They will also deal with criminal business, but not the graver criminal charges which are capital offences. The Judges will keep moving about from place to place during the year, sitting to hear cases with ample time for the consideration of them. In that respect they will differ much from the old system, from what is called the old British circuit system which gave rise to some abuse by reason of the inadequate time allowed for the hearing of cases.

Any possible congestion of business under the Circuit Courts will be relieved by the transfer to the District Justices of small actions, including those for shop debts up to £25 and for small cases in which claims for damages arise or trespass up to £10, and the smaller classes of ejectment cases. There will be reserved to the High Court the important cases in so far as is indicated by the amount involved and in so far as the importance is indicated by legal questions sufficient to justify the transfer of the hearing to the High Court. Instead of the old system of appeals, which, I think, is generally admitted to have been a failure in this country, appeals from the County Court will be taken on verbatim notes of the evidence and of the Judge's charge. This is considered by people who have had experience to be a great improvement in the administration of justice. Another new feature of the Bill will be the Central Criminal Court set up in Dublin, for Dublin and the counties immediately surrounding, for the graver classes of offences, to which the death penalty attaches, and other cases which, owing to special circumstances, it might be considered necessary to transfer to that jurisdiction.

The Bill also provides in a criminal appeal something which has been long agitated for in this country and may be regarded, perhaps, as the first step in more extensive criminal reform. The pinnacle of the structure is the Supreme Court of Appeal, which will now for practical purposes be the final Court of Appeal in this country, and which it is desirable to set up as soon as possible in order that the Court of last resort may command the confidence and respect of the people.

MINISTER for EXTERNAL AFFAIRS (Mr. Desmond Fitzgerald): I beg to second the motion.

Question: "That the Courts of Justice Bill be read a second time," put and agreed to.

Committee stage ordered for Wednesday, 3rd October, 1923.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputies should send in amendments as early as possible, but not later than next Monday.

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

MONEY RESOLUTION.

The PRESIDENT: I beg to move:

"That for carrying out the provisions of any Act of the present Session to provide for the establishment of Courts of Justice according to the Constitution, and for the better administration of Justice, it is expedient

(a) to authorise the charge upon the Central Fund of the remuneration and pensions of the Judges of the High Court, the Supreme Court and the Circuit Court;

(b) to authorise the payment out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas of the remuneration of temporary Assistant Circuit Judges, the remuneration and pensions of Justices, Deputy-Justices, and Temporary Assistant Justices of the District Court, and any other expenses incurred in carrying such Act into effect."

I may say that the necessary Message has been received from the Governor-General.

Mr. JOHNSON: The motion that is now before the Dáil is a motion that would authorise the expenditure of money, and the debate that ought to have taken place on the Second Reading of the Bill may take place on this motion. I want to say very little regarding the Bill, of which the Second Reading has been given, except that I think there are certain omissions, which might well have been included in the Bill and which undoubtedly would require a larger expenditure of money. Therefore, what I have to say is appropriate to this motion. What I think, in regard to the Bill in general, is that there are two or three proposals that might still be considered, might, as a matter of fact, be more properly considered when dealing with the rules governing the conduct of the Courts, but I am not sufficiently familiar with the process of the administration of the law to know whether I am right or wrong on that.

I would like that there had been something in the Bill to improve and extend the provisions of Children's Courts. I think that the experiments on the trivial offences which are allowed to go before Children's Courts now have proved satisfactory, and justify an extension of the operation of those Courts, and that such Courts should be empowered to deal with even more serious cases than the present Courts are allowed to do. I think the experience of those who have been familiar with the work of those Courts would support what I say, and that children who are guilty, or at least who are being tried for more serious offences, might well be brought before Courts which are not Courts in the minds of the people, but are rather places where strict fatherly advice might be given and minor punishment inflicted. The children should not be brought into contact with the atmosphere of Criminal Courts. I think that a great deal of money might be saved to the country if there was some application in Ireland of a system which has been introduced with success in one or two Continental countries and is advocated by experienced Judges in England, of some kind of a conciliator rather than a Judge, whom the parties can approach, and perhaps even whom the parties must approach in certain classes of cases before the trials take place or litigation is persisted in. It has been found, I understand, in Norway that a very large percentage of the cases are settled out of court through the operations of, shall I say, this conciliator, and that very many cases which are not settled are not persisted in because of the advice of this impartial person in regard to the prospects of the case. I think that is a reform which might well be introduced here and would, perhaps, cure the country of a disease which is very prevalent, the epidemic of litigation.

Another point I would like to raise, and this is the only one. Perhaps this is particularly the one that ought to be dealt with in the Rules, but there are members of the Dáil who will be quite familiar with the movement in industrial circles towards consolidation, and the removal of lines of demarcation, such as the amalgamation of unions. It has led to a great deal of economy and oiling of machinery. I think there should be something of the kind done in respect to the legal profession, and that the strict lines of demarcation between Solicitor and Counsel should not be persisted in. I think there should be no compulsion upon a litigant to pay a Counsel as well as a Solicitor if he is satisfied the Solicitor can do his work satisfactorily. I would like to have seen a reform in that direction which would enable the Solicitor, if his client is satisfied with his advocacy, to appear before the Court. The employment of a Counsel should be optional. I am sure there is a great deal of disagreement within the profession on that proposition, but I am informed authoritatively that very highly experienced lawyers believe the time has come when there should be either an amalgamation of the departments of the profession or at least greater facilities for appearance, in the Courts, of the Solicitors. I suppose I should add that the Counsel and Barristers should have the right to defend and do work which Solicitors now are entitled to do. Perhaps before the discussions on the Bill itself are completed we may hear some observations on those points by those who are competent by their experience to deal with them. I throw them out as the mind of a considerable section of laymen who are anxious to get justice done as cheaply as possible. There is a pretty generally accepted belief that the country is over professionalised and that amongst the professions in which there are too many practising, the legal profession predominates. If it were possible gradually to eliminate half the lawyers in the country I think the country would benefit.

Mr. P. J. McGOLDRICK: Ba mhaith liom an t-Uachtarán agus an Rialtas do mhola mar gheall ar an mBille seo. Sílim go dtugann sé dlighe córao, saor dúinn.

I wish to congratulate the President and the Government on this Bill, which, in the main, I think is excellent, one which, for the first time in this country, gives us convenient and cheap law and is an illustration of the value of native government. The Bill for the most part follows the system of the old Dáil Courts and I think the Judiciary Committee and the Government were right in following this system rather than the system of the clumsy British Courts.

Mr. WILSON: On a point of order, are we discussing the Bill at the moment?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I was hoping the Deputy would come to the motion. The motion is to provide money for the payment of the Judges. Deputy Johnson protested that he was going to be in order, and of course was not. The protestation showed that he knew that.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I thought the discussion on the Second Reading ended so abruptly that it would be necessary on the part of Deputies to put forward views that might bring the Bill more into harmony with the conditions as they exist, and it is with a view to putting them before the Dáil that I proposed to continue the debate on the subject.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy could have spoken on the Second Reading, and there will be a Committee Stage. There will be ample opportunity in Committee.

Captain W. A. REDMOND: Before this resolution is passed, I should like to ask the President a question, as this is a resolution to authorise a charge upon the Central Fund of the remuneration and pensions of the Judges of the High Court, the Supreme Court and the Circuit Courts. The appointing of these Judges will, of course, necessitate the doing away with existing Judgeships, and I would therefore like to ask the President if he could enlighten us upon this question, namely, where is the money to come from out of which the existing Judges are to receive their pensions, and I think it is a very fair question, arising from this Resolution.

The PRESIDENT: That is provided for in the Appendix to the Consequential Provisions Act of 1922. The particular salaries that are paid to these Judges have been provided for, that is for the existing Judges, in our Estimates for this year. The Resolution provides for such moneys as will be necessary to pay the Judges appointed under this Act. As far as the old Judges are concerned, that is already provided for, but this is a new service now. On the passing of the Act it will be necessary to appoint those Judges, and this is the system we have adopted up to this, that immediately before the Committee Stage a Resolution authorising the charge upon the Central Fund is passed, and as far as the Bill and this Resolution are concerned the salaries of the Judges who will be appointed under the Act are only dealt with.

Captain REDMOND: Do I understand the President to say supposing some of the existing Judges are kept on that that will be a saving of money to the Free State Exchequer?

The PRESIDENT: Yes.

Captain REDMOND: I am glad to hear that.

Resolution put and agreed to.

THE DAIL RESUMES.

Resolution reported.

The PRESIDENT: I move that the Dáil agree with the Committee in this Resolution.

Agreed.

THE ADJOURNMENT.

DERRY AND LOUGH SWILLY RAILWAY DISPUTE.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: In accordance with the notice given by Deputy Johnson, the matter of which he has given notice comes before the Dáil now.

Mr. JOHNSON: I desire to raise this question regarding the stoppage of the Lough Swilly Railway, with a view to preventing the development of the dispute there and, perhaps, preventing the deprivation of the people served by this railway of means of communication for a considerable time. It is not the first time that the question has been raised here of the administration of this railway. There was a dispute in the early part of August of this year, and a stoppage or threatened stoppage of the railway, and it is necessary to go back to that date to understand the reasons for the present strike or lock-out. In August two clerks of long service were notified that their services were no longer required, on the grounds that there was no work for them. Now, every member of the staff knew that both of these men and the staff in the office where they worked were fully occupied, and, as a matter of fact, they were working harder and more continuously than at any previous time, and it was felt generally that there was no truth in the suggestion of the management that these men were being dismissed because there was no work for them. But it was also pointed out at the time that the clerks and the stationmasters on the line who were entitled by agreement to a holiday were being deprived of their holiday because of shortness of staff. Owing to the intervention, I think, of the Ministry in the North East Government—the Minister for Labour, Mr. Andrews—an agreement was arrived at whereby the company withdrew the dismissal notices for one month so as to give the company the opportunity of finding other suitable work for the two men alleged to be redundant, and that no dismissal was to take place except in consultation with the Union. I ask the Dáil to bear in mind that there was no general agreement that the shortage of staff was a fact, that it was because of the shortage of staff that the company alleged that they were not in a position to carry out their agreement, which was part of the National Railways Agreement.

The manager of the railway, Mr. Hunt, along with his son, runs this railway without supervision and, I think, without responsibility, but I suggest that they have as a matter of fact responsibility for the greater part of the line to the Government of Saorstát, but that they run this company without responsibility so far as one can gather. Mr. Hunt was written to repeatedly in connection with this matter, and in a letter to the Irish Secretary of the Railway Clerks' Association, as late as September 3rd, admitted that 79 per cent. of the stationmasters and 40 per cent. of the clerks had not even then obtained their annual holidays for this year, and he concluded his letter with this statement, that "with the available staff we have done the best possible and cannot do more." Now, notwithstanding that statement, these two officers were served with a notice of dismissal as from the 22nd of September, again on the ground of redundancy. It is as well to state that when first being verbally informed of their dismissal in August last the men were told that as they had now reached the maximum of their scale, £180 a year, the company could not afford to keep them any longer. That attitude was receded from and redundancy was substituted as the explanation why these men were to be dismissed. Now the Union concerned has adopted every means possible to come to reasonable terms with the management of this company. I think that everyone will agree, and I think I can challenge contradiction from the Department concerned, that the Railway Clerks' Association have always tried to meet difficulties reasonably and have endeavoured everywhere with every company to see the point of view of the company and to meet it where possible. They have done and are willing to do the same with regard to this company, but it seems to be fairly clear from the experience in this case, as from experience in frequent cases, the manager is endeavouring to force the hands of the State, whether the Northern Government or the Free State Government, to do something for the company to save it and to save him. It is known to everybody in that part of the country that the management is not as considerate on the question of expenses, wasteful charges upon the company, when he himself is concerned, as when he is dealing with questions relating to railway employees.

In this case it is obvious that the alleged reason for the dismissal of these two men is not the real reason. It is necessary that the real reason—if there is another reason—should be stated. We have a right to assume that the reason given, that there is not work for these men, is the one that they will rely upon. I am putting it forward that, in this case, as invariably in well-managed undertakings, not the oldest or experienced officers should be dismissed when there is redundancy, but the newest recruits: and the “last in, first out,” when dealing with dismissals because of redundancy. That is the well-established principle, and it is one that meets with general approval. The spokesmen for the men concerned in this company endeavoured, by letter and telegram, to postpone action for even one week, so that there may be a conference, so that there may be an attempt to find out whether any conciliation in the matter could be arrived at.

The following letter was sent to Mr. Hunt, the General Manager, on the 22nd of September, by the Secretary of the Railway Clerks' Association:—

“I regret to state that your inexplicable and deplorable attitude in this case has left your staff no option but to withhold their labour as from midnight on Sunday, 23rd instant, until such time as you see your way to observe the universally recognised method of negotiation between employer and employee.

“Taking all the circumstances into consideration, one is reluctantly forced to the conclusion that there has been no desire on the part of the Company to discuss the question in dispute, with a view to arriving at an amicable settlement.

“My modest request for a postponement of the dismissal for one week, without prejudice to the Company, so as to give time for negotiation with the Chief Officers of the Association present, was ignored. My wire of the 20th instant reiterating this request was not replied to. You were in Dublin on Thursday last, but your Londonderry office refused to give us your Dublin address so that I might get in touch with you. When I at last discovered your whereabouts through another source and requested you over the telephone to meet me, you declined on the plea that you were leaving for your train, although it was not due for fifty minutes.

“You declined the requests of two Ministers (Free State and Northern Ireland), backed up by the Parliamentary representatives of the district served by the Railway, to postpone action even for one week and to give time for proper negotiations.

“You will agree that this is hardly the attitude of a man anxious for a peaceful settlement, and I am reluctantly forced to conclude that no settlement was desired, though I do not pretend to know the reasons for this extraordinary state of mind. They are probably known only to those responsible for the management of the Londonderry and Lough Swilly Railway Company.

“The unoffending people of Donegal and district will be severely hit by any interruption of the services, and in their interests I would appeal to you, even at this late stage, to be a little more reasonable. You will find me, and those for whom I act, ready to do everything humanly possible to avert trouble in connection with a matter which we could settle in five minutes with any other railway company in Ireland.”

That letter is signed by Mr. J. T.

[Mr. Johnson.]

O'Farrell, Secretary of the Railway Clerks' Association.

Now, Mr. Hunt has sent telegrams to Deputies of the Dáil, wholesale, asking that this matter should be settled, or, at least, that the work should be resumed, for the sake of the fishing industry, which is now in full swing. I hope it is. The men concerned are very anxious that work should be resumed. They are very anxious that this matter should be settled amicably, but they contend, and rightly, that there should be meetings and conferences, and that regular procedure should be adopted, as has been agreed upon by the railway companies, and which agreement the Company is bound to support. The Management of this Company is most unsatisfactory. The Manager is responsible to the Free State Government for the management of three parts of the line. The line is, in fact, to the extent of three parts of it, Government property. It was built by Government money, and I want to urge upon the Ministry the desirability of dealing with this matter immediately with a view to the resumption of the work on the railways, and with a view to seeing that the future conduct of the Manager in relation to the employees of the Company will follow something like normal procedure, and that the Manager should be compelled to account for his conduct of the Company, to an authority which the Government, whose money is invested in the Company, has some confidence in.

I do not want to go into further details. The Ministry here is conversant with the facts, or, shall I say, with the history of this line for the last year or two, and with the constant pin-pricks for which the manager is responsible, and I make bold to say there are reasons outside railway management which led him to run the railway in the manner in which he is running it and which involve such frequent disturbance of the traffic on the line, to the loss of the people of Tirconail.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I wish to say that it was only when I arrived here in the Dáil to-day that I learned this subject was to be brought forward with regard to the railway company. We,

as the Deputies of Tirconail, represent the area served by this railway. We have a penurious railway company, and we have a somewhat bellicose trades union, I suppose, and we have a storm between those two, both of whom our county is paying, and the area that is supposed to be served by this line has to stand by and bear the sacrifices of the want of a service and the destruction of the whole of its economic condition as a service. I am not going to enter into the question as to who is at fault in this dispute, but I think it is possible there are some faults on both sides. Neither am I going to take up any attitude of condemning the manager of a railway company. The men whom I condemn in this transaction are the Board of Directors, because the manager is only the servant of the directors and he is amenable to the instructions he receives from his directors. I am quite confident whatever action he is taking in this matter is guided, inspired and directed by the directors in control. As to his ability to solve the difficulty, I am not satisfied. This question turns upon two men. The railway company, so far as I can understand, were prepared to accept the conditions of the week for consultation, but during that week the two men were to stand dismissed. The railway servants claim that they were satisfied with the week's interval for negotiations, but pending these negotiations the two men should remain in their employment and then be subject to dismissal, should the negotiators so decide. That is the whole point at issue between the railway company and the men in this particular case, so far as I can see; but I think there must be some inspiring agency that is guiding these railway directors and this railway manager towards endeavouring to promote some sort of disaffection among either its men, or, in any case, those in some area of its control, and I think they must have some other motives, because those little things are not at all so awfully important that a railway company should condemn the whole service, which covers a very large and extensive area, and serves 100,000 people and thirty-one towns, to complete dislocation.

The agency they allege that is at the bottom of all this, and as governing their action, is that the railway is not a paying concern. I suppose that matter pertains to railways in general at the present time and, therefore, this railway does not stand alone in that particular matter. I think the right way to try and get over that difficulty is not to begin to create friction with their employees, or to restrict or curtail their services, but rather to endeavour to develop them to such an extent as would undoubtedly bring some recompense to the railway, and bring it to a position where it would become a paying concern, instead of taking the other road and driving everything into chaos and destruction. That seems to be the tendency and object of the railway management of the line at the present time.

In August last I had occasion to arraign them before this Dáil with regard to the restrictions of the services on a very large extent of line to which they contributed nothing in the making, and which was not part of their assets, but was a very profitable portion of a bargain they made with the British Government when it was here, and from which they were able to amass a great deal of money. In regard to that particular branch of the line I think the Government here are somewhat at fault. I understood during the time of the British Government that with regard to the portion of the line—Letterkenny to Burton Port—there was always an inspector there from the Board of Works who kept matters under supervision in the interests of the State which owned the line, but immediately that that line and others passed into the hands of our own Government, this agent seems to have passed away and there seems to be no one now to hold the railway company to their obligations and see that the district gets the service to the extent to which the people of the district are entitled. It is a district that very badly needs railway service, and is at present suffering most intensely from the agencies complained of here.

I think some inquiry must be made into this dispute and made at once because it is necessary in the interests of the people who are served by that railway, and if some drastic steps are not taken I cannot see any possibility except of matters going from bad to worse until the whole system may be reduced to scrap or at any rate until it may be unable to continue at all. As portion of the line, two miles of the 98 miles, is within the area of the Northern Parliament and the other 96 miles is in the Free State I think that co-operation and collaboration between both authorities is necessary in ensuring or compelling the company to do its duty to the people whom the railway was made to serve. I think it is up to the Government at the present time to take some drastic action to ascertain whether the agencies that are operating are agencies that are purposely operating to try and destroy the prospects of the community and railway, or whether it is due to the accident that the line is not a paying concern; and then they would see before them if it is ever to become a paying concern under the present existing conditions. That is the only thing I can see. I cannot arrive at any conclusion as to the merits or demerits as between the employees and the railway company, but I urge the Government to see that a proper representative is put in charge and to see that the company is made to discharge its obligations in accordance with contract and that the people get the service they are entitled, and that no other impediments are put between them and the services which they are justly entitled to receive.

Major MYLES: I desire to take this opportunity of urging on the Government the necessity for instituting an inquiry into the working of this railway. These recurrent strikes are a serious and very great inconvenience, and cause an immense amount of dislocation in ordinary traffic and inconvenience in social life. Serious complaints have been made as to the management of this railway. I will not enter into the merits of the dispute between the company's servants and themselves, but I urge the Minister for Industry and Commerce to avail himself of this opportunity of having a thorough investigation made into the entire working of the system.

Mr. DAVIN: During the discussion

[Mr. Davin.] on the Estimates in the third Dáil in the early part of the year, I made certain statements with regard to the management, or I should rather say to the mismanagement of this line. Deputies who were present on that occasion will remember—and I regret it—the manner in which I was treated by those responsible on the Government benches. I think, however, they will agree now that with the changed attitude of Deputy McGoldrick, and indeed having regard to everything said here to-day, everything I said on that particular occasion was justified by events that occurred since. I made certain serious charges—and I quite agree that they were serious charges—I said at the time that I was making these charges upon the authority of people who could swear to their accuracy, and I repeat now everything I said on that occasion, and I do so for the purpose of supporting Deputy McGoldrick and the other Deputies who called for an inquiry into the administration of that particular line. It appeared to me that the management of the company, then responsible, had the idea at a certain time that the Free State would not function, and that it was therefore their duty to do everything they could, holding the views they held, to encourage and support those who would be responsible for the bursting up of the Free State. I am reliably informed that any official of the company who at certain stages of the early portion of last year were known to be favourable to the Free State, and other supporters of the Treaty, were interfered with in a manner that they would not be interfered with by the management of any other railway company. If a member of the staff, who was a supporter of the Free State, made himself any way vocal in regard to his support of the present Government he was immediately transferred to Derry City, where he was put under the control of those running the Belfast Parliament.

That is the general attitude of those who were responsible for the administration of that company and who are responsible for the administration of funds that are voted by the Dáil out of the pockets of the taxpayers of the Free State area. I, therefore, contend, seeing there is no change of attitude on the part of the people responsible for these things, that it is the duty of the Deputies of the Dáil to demand that an immediate investigation be held into the administration of that particular concern. We are told that they are unable to pay their clerks at the rate of £180 a year. I am satisfied that if an enquiry be held into the expenditure of this company, it will disclose a most extraordinary state of affairs, so far as the expenses and salaries of those two individuals who control the company are concerned. I am told that the weekly expenses of the manager and his son would, perhaps, amount to more, on some occasions, than the salary of the two individuals who have been referred to.

According to an old Act of Parliament, this company were obliged to run a certain train service. When I referred to this particular matter on the last occasion in the Dáil, it was at a period when the company was not carrying out its obligations in that respect. They transferred their rolling stock, which was built and paid for out of public funds in this country, into an area where it would give a better service to the Six-County section than to the section they were supposed to serve and for whom the money was allocated. Deputy Johnson has travelled over the merits so far as the present dispute is concerned. The plea of redundancy is a wrong one, and, at any rate, could not arise except there was no work to be found for the two individuals whose services are being dispensed with. It has been stated and it is, I believe, correct, that 79 per cent. of the station masters and 40 per cent. of the clerks have not got the holidays they are entitled to get, in accordance with the agreement signed by the General Manager of this company. The question of redundancy cannot arise until that 79 per cent. of station masters and 40 per cent. of clerks have got the holidays they are entitled to. If the company are anxious to carry out to the letter the agreement which their own manager signed and to give these officials the holidays they are entitled to, they can find work for the men they are endeavouring to dismiss. I support in every way the statement made by Deputy Johnson. I do not intend to go into it at any greater length, because I happen to be a member of the Association to which these two particular individuals belong. But I am quite prepared to allow the whole question of the management—or mismanagement—and administration of this company to be dealt with by any impartial tribunal set up by the Dáil. I contend that it is the duty of the Deputies here to demand that such a tribunal be set up in the interest of those who are called upon to pay for the guaranteed section of the line.

MINISTER for INDUSTRY and COMMERCE (Mr. McGrath): I am sorry that this matter has been introduced here. It may be, perhaps, that the people who tried before to bring about an enquiry in connection with this railway, avail of the opportunity, which the present trouble there affords, in order to press their case. It is most unfortunate that disputes, such as this dispute, should be brought up here, particularly by members of the Labour Party. They know how delicate these matters are. I have been in conference with some of them dealing with situations such as this and they are aware that it is a most delicate business. If this is to be a precedent, we will have every dispute that occurs in the country brought up here by the representative of the constituency in which it occurs and the merits and demerits argued out.

I am not going into the merits or demerits in this particular case, but I would point out that six weeks have elapsed since this trouble commenced. It was agreed to postpone the dismissal of these two men for a month in order to investigate the case. What is the result of that investigation, or did such investigation take place? We do not know. At least, the Dáil has not been told. After that month the two men concerned got a fortnight's notice, and on Saturday or Sunday of last week an effort was made to have these cases decided by a body which was meeting on the 27th. The manager proposed to reinstate the two clerks in question and pay them for the time they were off, although he claimed the meeting on Thursday had no right to deal with a question such as this. The representative of the Railway Clerks refused that, as he was entitled to do, except the men were kept on for another week. Meantime two representatives from England intimated their intention to attend to represent the men dismissed, but it seems strange to me that six weeks have been allowed to elapse and that these men did not think it worth while to come over from England. I have had a similar experience in connection with English representatives elsewhere. It occurs very often, and at the last moment they appear on the scene and want further time. It will be a most unfortunate thing if those questions are raised in the Dáil. A question could very well be raised in connection with the dockers' dispute, which is as important as, if not more important, than the dispute under discussion. Two representatives from the particular area are pressing for an enquiry. It is very well known that re-organisation of the whole railway system is about to take place. At least, a Bill is about to be introduced and, if that Bill is passed, one of the first things to be tackled will be this question of the small railways. It is a very serious question, and the railway in question is being run at an extraordinary loss. While the Government is responsible for a large portion of the line, it is undoubtedly paying a very small sum compared to what it is costing the company to run that particular line.

These are facts. At the moment the time is not ripe for such an enquiry, but it is one of the first things that must be tackled as soon as the re-organisation of the railways is completed. I think that a discussion such as has taken place only prejudices the case that is to be discussed, and I hope will be discussed with the two representatives coming from England representing the men. As far as my information goes regarding the particular dispute I would not like to say anything on it. I have certain information, and it would certainly rebut a good deal of the evidence which comes from one side only in this matter. My information is different. As I said before, I am not going to mention what it is, because I do not want to be the one responsible for prejudicing the case, which must be heard on its merits this week.

Mr. DAVIN: I wish to correct a wrong impression which the Minister appears to have received from somebody, that it is necessary for two representatives to come from England before anything is done. I want to tell the Minister, and I thought he was aware of it, that there is an Irish official of the organisation who represents these two men, and who is in a position to make a definite settlement with the people responsible for the dismissal of the two men.

The PRESIDENT: There was a question—

Mr. DAVIN: I want to know before the President makes his statement is he to be taken as concluding the debate on this particular question?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The motion is that the Dáil do adjourn. The question of the Lough Swilly Railway has apparently been disposed of.

Mr. DAVIN: I want to know, as a matter of order, if any Deputy can speak after the President has made his statement.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: What is the statement to be about?

The PRESIDENT: It will deal with the question of barley and also industrial disputes and the general industrial unrest. I have no objection to have a discussion on whatever I have got to say. This arises on a question put by Deputy Davin as to the price of barley, on Deputy Byrne's question about the Docks, on Deputy Johnson's statement about the Lough Swilly Railway, and a matter of which I have got private notice from Deputy Liddy concerning the bacon factories in Limerick. I might say that we have been considering not so much industrial unrest as the whole economic outlook at the moment, which may perhaps be more responsible for the industrial unrest throughout the entire country than the mere accident of a dispute here or an interruption of business there. The number of these disputes and the industrial unrest they indicate are matters of the most serious importance for the entire community. A great number of employers in a great number of trades seek reduction of wages which are violently resisted by the men. The shipping services are dislocated, some ports being almost closed, and the net result of this on the export of cattle and agricultural produce is such that the country is faced with an enormous loss.

I have figures here showing a comparison between the months of July and August for bacon, eggs, fish, margarine, oats and spirits. In July £145,657 worth of bacon was exported and in August £15,499; eggs, £225,269 in July, £192,971 in August; fish, £32,122 in July, and £2,369 in August; margarine, £6,851 in July, £959 in August; oats, £15,000 as against £6,000; spirits, £40,000 as against a little less than £10,000. The case of cattle is much more serious. For the months of June, July and August, 1922, the total was 90,836; this year, 23,534. As to the question raised by Deputy Davin, I have figures which are rather remarkable. It appears that for the twelve months ended March of this year the total importation of barley into Ireland was 11,724 tons. For the corresponding period, that is the previous twelve months up to March, 1922, the total was 25,711 tons; that is to say, more than twice what was imported during the twelve months ending in March this year. For the years 1909 to 1913 the average was 60,400 tons.

Mr. DAVIN: Have you the figures for malt?

The PRESIDENT: I have. 1923, 36,000 tons; 1922, 30,000 tons. That indicates to me that there is something more than the importation of stuff affecting the price, that it is not a question of an excess of imports that is affecting the price in this instance, but that there must be something else. From investigations that we have made we have discovered that business in Cork is at a stand-still, that the bacon trade is closed down and that many other disputes are causing grave loss and hardship.

It is pointed out in a special report by the Minister for Industry and Commerce that these are not the times, after having sustained very severe losses during the last few years, that we can afford the luxury of industrial unrest. We are appealing in this case to both parties to these disputes, both of which, from any examination I could bring to bear, are equally to blame, or at least could be charged with a considerable portion of the blame. We are faced with a very serious situation. Agricultural produce, and agriculture in general, is the mainstay of the business of this country. Any person to whom you speak having any knowledge whatever of agriculture will tell you that it is not an economic proposition at the moment, that it is not a paying concern, that its prospects are low and that there does not appear to be very much hope of any great improvement in the industry. From all sides one hears that the cost of production exceeds the price that can be obtained. It is obvious from that, that there must be some reduction in the cost of production, otherwise we are giving other people—people to whom we sell our goods—the benefits of the high cost of production. We are making them a present of the goods. It appears to us that unless a very considerable reduction be effected in the cost of living the cost of production will not, and cannot, come down. An examination of the cost of production shows that every single order in the community is to blame, and the fallacies we have learned, or that were bandied about during the war period, of the shortage of output—fallacies that have been learned by people who made money easily during that period—have now got to be unlearned by others, and the whole economic situation has got to be reconsidered, from the rich banker down to the poorest working man, in all its aspects and in every phase of it. We cannot in this country afford to pay one per cent. bank interest more than is paid in England, and we cannot afford to pay in this country a price for labour in excess of what is paid in much richer countries whose output is greater and whose possibilities of extension and improvement and development are greater than ours. Unless there be a reasonable spirit of compromise from every section of the community there is very little hope of the development of commerce or anything else in this country. If there is going to rule in the future, low prices for agricultural produce, we have got to do one of two things. We have got to lessen the cost of production, or we have got to put up with fewer of the luxuries to which we have been accustomed during a time of extravagance and prosperity. I think it will be admitted by any person who has made any examination whatever of this question, that the war years were years of wonderful prosperity, when capital was being spent as revenue, and when everyone passed on liabilities to somebody who came after. From any examination, and from what we have been able to learn from any of the experts engaged, it is not possible to maintain high wages and high prices. It is unreasonable to expect a reduction in wages unless there be a reduction in prices. We are not unmindful of the dangers of propounding these particular headlines to a community which has become accustomed, in the first place, to high wages, and in the second place, to high prices. Some of the main contributing factors to the high cost of living are, in the first place, what I have said, bank interest, the price of bread, and another article which some people call an article of food, some a luxury, and more an article of infamy—beer, porter or stout, or whatever you like to call it; the price of meat and the rates of local authorities. The rates of local authorities in this country are beyond the capacity of the people to bear, and a reduction must take place in regard to them. There is no use in saying that someone must be satisfied with less. Everyone must bear a share, and everyone must contribute something. It is a time when sacrifices must be made if we are to survive and mark out any advancement in the future.

If we look at the condition of affairs in other countries it will be observed that there is no real prosperity in any of them. In those countries that the Delegation which left Ireland to represent it on the Continent visited, we observed one thing, and that was the remarkable industry on the part of every country through which we passed. An effort was made to mark some advancement, and even in some places where the Exchange had become entirely unbalanced, and where the ordinary channels of trade were naturally interrupted by it, there was, nevertheless, evident industry in every city that we passed through and in most of the country places—very much more remarkable than there is in the city of Dublin or in any other of the cities or towns in Ireland. Most of those examinations that we have made of transport and transit charges disclose to us a price which no other country could equal. Costs are higher, attributable to various causes: by some people to the high wages; by other people, who dispute that, to high profits and to conditions. People claim they are entitled to high profits because they do not know when their particular business is going to be subject to interruption and they must benefit by any chance they get in commerce; they become in essence profiteers, and justify profiteering by saying that they are paying higher wages than they are able and that they must get these enormous profits to enable them to do their business. We did not come to the conclusion that we are justified in asking for a reduction of wages or an increase of output unless the other side in the dispute agree in their case to a reduction in profits and to a more generous consideration of the claims and requirements of those who are a necessary and inseparable part of their business—the working classes. It is, so far as we are able to find out, impossible to anticipate a very much greater consumption of goods, but if there be any extension of business at all it is only possible if there is generous co-operation received from all sections of the community in endeavouring to solve what is a very serious and very important phase in our national life, and that is our political economy. The Government in examining this question took up that particular activity which requires the greatest attention and the closest study in this country, and that is building. We are prepared as far as the resources of the nation will permit to unfold schemes and to provide money for a very big scheme of building, granted that we get from both employers and employees such consideration and such guarantees as will enable us to make a success of the scheme, to come as near as possible, and to work towards coming as near as possible, to the provision of an economic house—to take away, as it were, from one section of the community a long-standing complaint, to ask from that section a contribution towards the solution of that problem which is perhaps the most crying need of that particular order, a real contribution which will benefit themselves, which will not interfere with or limit their income to any unreasonable extent, and that the other section of the community should contribute their quota in a reduction of prices such as will make it possible to make the scheme a success. We have had recently set up a Committee dealing with profiteering, and we were not satisfied at all with the amount of co-operation that there was on the part of people whose duty it was to co-operate with us in finding out what was responsible for the high prices. The work of the Committee would have been of a much higher order and of much more use to the community if there had been that co-operation. It was impossible in some instances to get information, to get replies to questions, which would justify one in coming to conclusions, and it was, on the other hand, practically impossible to get the necessary questions asked which would have enabled us to elicit the information. It appeared to be as if there was a conspiracy on the part of one side of the community to keep up prices, and on the other hand a conspiracy on the part of the other side of the community to keep up wages. In considering this question the Government, granted that there will be accommodation on the part of both parties to these disputes, will endeavour to do its part in providing the necessary money to absorb a very considerable portion of the unemployed. The last few years have been years in which most people who would be inclined to invest capital in industry or commercial purposes have tied it up.

A certain oiling of the machinery must be effected, and the Government is prepared to effect that as far as they are concerned. They anticipate at the same time that there will be a development on the part of business. That development will only come when there is greater stability in business than there is at the moment. In any case, with the necessary reconstruction that will have to be effected owing to the damage of the last two or three years, there will be unquestionably very much greater employment in the very early Spring of next year, and it is in the intervening period that our proposal will be unfolded. If we find that there is a real effort on the part of both parties to this dispute to come together again, and every effort on the part of the Government will be made to bring that about, if they come together in a spirit of good-will in a real attempt at co-operation and an evident desire to settle those things once and for all, or at least to formulate industrial machinery to enable disputes to be settled in an amicable spirit, to consider the real needs of the country, we are prepared to afford every facility for those meetings and as far as the resources of the country will permit to place money at the disposal of both parties, because it is natural to assume that both parties will benefit from those monies and it will be reasonable to assume that the schemes we put up will be economic ones.

As regards the question of barley raised by Deputy Davin, it is bound up in this. Unless the cost of living is reduced considerably it is fairly obvious that those who are growing barley will not continue to do so. There will be a lessening of employment, and that will not be in the public good.

I do not know Sancti 20 much more I could add to what I have said on this subject. I think it will be admitted at any rate that we have endeavoured to point out to the two sections, employers and employees, that it is not by asserting loudly the claims of one or the demands of the other that the country will progress, but that the real need of the moment is to add as much as we possibly can, each in our own way, to the wealth and stability of this country, and that we can only do that by giving an honest day's work, whether we are employer or employed. If we build on such a foundation as that there is hope for the future, and the best thing to do at this moment is to enter into the settling of those disputes with a spirit desirous to succeed. If we do that I think we will have done our part, even if we do not succeed in settling the disputes.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am glad the President has raised this question, although it has taken me quite unexpectedly. I thought from what was said the other day that we might have had a statement perhaps next week, and I had hopes that, perhaps, in the meantime it might have been my good fortune to have met him to discuss the very question which he has put before the Dáil. Just before the dissolution we had a discussion on a motion to which an amendment was accepted. That motion called for a conference of people interested on both sides of the economic dispute with a view to finding the best means of providing regularity and permanence of employment, which regularity and permanence of employment had been stated in the previous part of the resolution as something which should be provided for. I have looked somewhat carefully at the public Press in the hope that there would have been some sign from the Employers' Organisation of their acceptance of the position set out in that motion which was carried by the Dáil, and that following upon such announcement as I had hoped to see that we would have a statement from the Ministry that a conference was to be called into being. Notwithstanding the failure of Employers' Organisations to signify their adherence to the proposition in that motion, I am still hopeful that they may be brought to the frame of mind which will show that they recognise the human needs of the men and women who do the work of the country.

The position outlined by the Minister is very, very serious and very, very important. I have indicated more than once my fear that the future of the country, industrially and socially, is likely to be very bad, and that we shall go through a great deal of suffering unless some new attitude is adopted towards these questions. Both sides, I will admit, in the absence of a new spirit, have taken a line that there is only a "pull-devil, pull-baker" method of arriving at stability in regard to wages and prices, that economic relations must be for ever based upon the attempt of the seller to get the highest and the attempt of the buyer to pay the lowest, and that in the region of wages a workman who is selling his labour is driven, by the philosophy, by the economics that are taught and acted upon, to demand the highest and to take every opportunity to secure the highest, and the employer, on the other hand, is driven to take every advantage that he can to obtain the greatest amount of labour for the lowest amount of pay. If in the future that is to be the basis upon which the social and economic life of the country is to be built, to continue, there is no hope whatever for the prosperity of this country. You will have social unrest, you will have economic strife, you will have poverty, because we are in competition with countries that are infinitely better able to produce cheaply than we are. I said many a time that the struggle that has gone on during the last few years has been participated in by the masses of the people, because, consciously or unconsciously, they felt that national freedom would lay the foundation and make it possible to achieve a better livelihood for the people. I am driven to this conclusion that there is needed no mere patching up of disputes with the expectation that they will break out again as soon as another opportunity serves either side, but a psychological change in the minds of both parties, and something in the way of a crusade for the common good.

More than two years ago—before the Treaty—the Labour Party issued a statement. I have been re-reading it, and I pin my faith to the general underlying spirit of that to-day. It is just as applicable to-day as it was then; that there is needed the generation of the spirit which is evoked in other countries by the cry: "The country is in danger," and that, if we can evoke that spirit and develop amongst workers and employers, amongst all classes who do service for the community, the idea that it is by their service that the community is going to be saved, then I think something can be done to save the community, to save the country, and to improve and better the lives of the poor. I had hoped that if there had been a conference of the kind that was suggested we might have been able to put forward a proposition such as this, that employers in industry, as well as workers, should approach each other with the thought and on the understanding that they are joint workers, and that it is as workers in the industry that they are seeking recognition and payment. I believe sincerely that such a proposition, if it could be accepted by the employers of the country, would draw forth from the workmen a response which has not hitherto been experienced.

Unfortunately it is not always "I, the employer as co-worker with you," but "I, the employer as your master; I, the employer and owner, seeking profit out of your labour." As co-workers we can find a basis of agreement. I believe that if the conception of the nation, as the body which has entrusted the management of industries to certain people who are employers in industries, is accepted, then again we shall have the basis of agreement, but I cannot see any hope of agreement or co-operation between the various sections of the community if we are to continue in the thought that it is as master and servant, as employer and owner, and worker and buyer and seller. On these lines peace will not come, but on the lines of common service, and united effort for the national good I believe peace can come. One could go into many details and make suggestions and proposals. I think it is, perhaps, unwise to develop the argument which I might and was prepared to develop on another occasion, and that it is better to leave any such discussion.

perhaps, to a conference which may be called into being. Workmen are not unreasonable when they have been approached fairly. There has not been any attempt to alter the relationship, and in my opinion that is the key to future health for this nation. I am not asking the Dáil, I am not asking any section, to subscribe to any theory of society except this, that we want to see society based on labour and service for the common weal. The President has referred to housing. No one knows, and no one appreciates the importance of an effort in regard to housing more than he does. The sufferers from bad housing not only in the cities, but in some of the smallest towns in the country, and in the rural districts as well, are the working people, and I have faith in the goodwill, to say nothing better, of the masses of the people, and those engaged in the trades which are concerned with building, than that they are quite prepared to do all that is necessary to build houses well and cheaply, provided that there is a general conception of common service for the common good. They are just as well prepared as any other section of the community, and probably have shown greater readiness to do that than many other sections of the community. I am prepared to stand by everything that was said and written in the programme of the First Dáil, when they affirmed that the duty of every man and woman was to give allegiance and service to the commonwealth, and when they declared it to be the duty of the nation to ensure that every citizen shall have opportunity to spend his or her health, strength and faculties in the service of the people. In return for willing service it declared the right of every citizen to an adequate share of the produce of the nation's labour. With that proposition, if it is generally accepted, I believe it is possible to enthuse the workers of this country in such a manner as will ensure the rebuilding materially, socially and spiritually of a nation to be proud of.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I did not intend to intervene in this particular matter at all, but there was one statement that fell from the lips of the leader of the Labour Party that I do not think should pass unchallenged. I do not think he intended making it as sweeping as he did, but the fact that the Labour Leader comes mostly in contact with the bad sort of employer may have prejudiced him somewhat like the Magistrate on the Bench who is always coming in contact with the bad type of offender. He said: "It is never a case of 'I am the fellow-worker'; it is always the case of 'I am the master,' where the employer is concerned." I do not think that can be substantiated in fact. I know many employers, if I may speak for myself, whose relations with their workmen are as friendly as possible, and who, when the workman wants to take a pig to the fair, lend him their horse and cart and always act in that friendly spirit.

I think we all know that there is one firm in the City of Dublin, Guinness, who always act with the greatest generosity to their employees and treat their men as human beings and friends and with every kindness. Now the greatest industry in this country is agriculture. I know that there are thousands of those farmers who take off their coats and work side by side with their labouring men, as hard and harder, and share their glass together when the day's work is over. That, I believe, is the spirit that actuates far more employers in Ireland than those of whom Deputy Johnson speaks. That is the spirit that the President wishes to infuse into the whole of our national life, and I agree with him when he says that if we go on in that spirit, not as employer and employee, not as master and slave, but as fellow Irishmen, working together for the good of our country, then we may be in sight of the end of our trouble.

Mr. THOMAS O'MAHONY: There were two points in the speech of the President that must appeal to all the Deputies present. The first was that he promised that as far as the resources of the Government would permit it, if he were encouraged by a friendly attitude on the part of employers and employees, he would pledge the resources of the Government in favour of a big scheme of national hous-

[Mr. O'Mahony.] ing. We all admit that there is no greater or more crying evil in the country than the condition of the houses of the working classes. I agree that the two factors who must be consulted, in respect to improving those conditions, are the building employers and the building workers, and that unless we have kindly co-operation from these two no scheme of national housing is possible. The cost of building in this country is prohibitive. It has been suggested that that cost is largely due to the extravagant profits of the employers. The answer to that is that where the workers themselves have built houses the cost has been as great as in the case where private employers were engaged in the construction. In considering that case, one has to bear in mind the relative cost of corresponding houses in England, and the difference in wages paid to the English worker and the Irish worker does not account for the difference of the cost of the houses; the difference in the cost of material in both countries does not bridge it. One must, therefore, unwillingly though we have to admit it, come to the conclusion that it is due to the fact that as compared with the output of the English worker the output of the Irish worker is substantially lower. The experience of the Government in association with the present housing scheme is that houses in Ireland have cost something like £750 each. In England corresponding houses have been erected for half or less than half that money. The houses in England fetch a far higher rent than the corresponding houses in Ireland. Therefore, this country, with its much more limited resources, is called upon to bear a double dose of original sin. We lose largely in the cost of construction, and we get, when our costly house is erected, a much lower rent than they get in England.

The next important item touched upon by the President was that the Government was prepared to do all they could to absorb unemployment in the country. In that programme he shall have behind him every man in the country who has the interests of the country at heart, but if we are to provide for absorbing the unemployed we must get a better return than we have hitherto been getting from the worker. The dole must not be administered in another form, and that is paying a man a full day's wage for an insufficient day's work. If the spirit that Deputy Johnson referred to is exhibited by both employers and employees—friendly co-operation—and if labour recognises that whilst it has its rights it also has its obligations to the community, then you can rest assured we are going to embark on a newer and a happier era. But what has been the attitude of labour in this matter? Take the case of wages. In every country in Europe wages during the last few years have been gradually coming down to the pre-war level, to the level that the present-day conditions in those countries warrant. Is that the case in Ireland? Take the case of the city of Cork.

Mr. JOHNSON: Does the Deputy desire that wages should come down to the pre-war level?

Mr. O'MAHONY: Not to the pre-war level; gradually coming down. I said, to the conditions that are now prevailing in those countries—to the existing conditions. A few days ago Deputy Johnson suggested in the Dáil that high wages were apparently the solution of all our difficulties, and that the bigger the wages we paid in this country, the more definite progress this country was going to make. It was an extraordinary doctrine to come from any Deputy. Wages have come down substantially in England during the last two years, and why? The Englishman recognises that that which he produces has to be put on the markets of the world in competition with corresponding articles produced in other countries of the world, and if he is unable to put that on the market at a price that will compel trade in favour of the Englishman, then his trade is gone. English trade is dependent upon the economic law that governs all countries, that an article will be sold on its merits as regards quality and price. If the Englishman cannot produce an article of right quality and at the right price then his neighbour ousts him.

The factor that compelled a reduction of wages in England was that as Continental wages came down, the Englishman was no longer able to market his goods at a price that would command a sale in the markets of the world. He had to adapt himself to circumstances. How did the Englishman adapt himself to circumstances? The workers in England, in co-operation with their leaders, came into conference with the employers in England, and as a result of the joint conference all agreed that the time had come, and that the economic position forced it on them, for a reduction of wages, or else they would have no wages or work at all. Is that the attitude adopted in Ireland? The bulk of the Irish workers are simply sheep in the fold to be called to their own destruction by the leaders of the Labour organisation in Ireland. The man does not count. The man, I regret to say, has lost his manhood. He is controlled by the machine.

Mr. DAVIN: On every side.

Mr. O'MAHONY: Where is the machine on the other side?

Mr. DAVIN: On your side.

Mr. O'MAHONY: He is controlled by the machine. Truth, I know, is always disagreeable.

Mr. DAVIN: It is, for yourselves.

Mr. O'MAHONY: It hurts some people. The man is controlled by the machine. I will give you an instance that occurred quite recently in Cork. A firm there wanted to get their business premises fitted up, and they put it up for tender, and the tender of the Cork employers was 35 per cent. higher than that of an English firm. The merchant expressed his willingness to give 10 per cent. more than the English price and get the work done at home. The Irish employers could not do it owing to the cost of wages. Here is an example of practical co-operation:—An offer was made on the part of the employers to hand over their plant, workshops and machinery to the workers of Cork who would be engaged at the work, and they told them they could do it at the 10 per cent. increase over the English price. The Cork worker confessed that he could not earn the wages he was getting on those conditions, and so the work had to go to England.

Mr. GOREY: God help Cork, and the rest of us.

Mr. HALL: Were the employers inclined to give them the loan of their banking account, too?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputies cannot carry on conversations across the Chamber.

Mr. O'MAHONY: The employers, as I say, were prepared to give them the plant, workshops and all the facilities they use in the production of their own work for nothing, but the workers could not, even under those favourable conditions, do the work. Now, there is no good in accentuating difficulties between employers and employees. I wish that we could go on to deal with the question of employer and employee in the spirit suggested at the end of Deputy Johnson's speech, that as we have a community of interests we should in a friendly spirit whenever any differences arise between us, discuss those differences between the two factors that are necessary for trade and production in this country.

I should like to see a Committee set up on the lines that he suggests, in which, before anybody, whether he be employer or employee or Labour leader, attempted to commit a particular trade or industry with which they are associated to chaos, it would be compulsory both on employers and employees to go into consultation and have the merits or demerits of the case discussed. With a competent Committee and conditions such as these, I am perfectly satisfied that much of the evils that the country suffers from, largely as the result of labour disruption, would be obviated.

Mr. DAVIN: I had hoped the President, in the reply he promised earlier in the evening, would deal in a thorough way with the question I put to him on private notice. I am sorry he missed the main point of the question and went on to deal more or less with the position of the employer and the employed instead of giving this Dáil and the country his own candid views about the profiteering section known as the middleman. Now, I happen, in company with other Deputies, to represent a barley-growing constituency, and for that reason, and knowing the conditions prevailing in that particular area, at the moment, I put down this question on private notice. According to the figures which were published by the Department, the number of acres of barley sown in 1921 was 175,460; in 1922, 170,265, and from the information which I have at my disposal, but which I cannot prove by Government records, I understand that the acreage in 1922 has been reduced by about one-half, due, no doubt, to the bad prices which prevailed.

Now, anybody who knows anything about the condition of living of the small farmer—and it is the small farmer who sows and grows barley—knows that every one of them, owing to the condition of the times and the bad prices of the last couple of years, are on the books of the local shopkeepers or are paying interest to some bank or other.

The President, in answer to a previous question put down by me about three months ago, said the Government were unable to deal with this situation until they had the report of the Commission on Agriculture, and the report of the Fiscal Commission which has been sitting for some time past. I have very little hope, and I say that from the experience of the last Dáil, that the report of any Commission set up by the Government will be put into operation. Commission after Commission has been set up by the Third Dáil in the same way as by the British Government to pacify people who created agitation, and when the reports of these Commissions were submitted to the Government, in every case they were turned down, and it is for that reason I have no hope whatever that any Commission which the President relies upon is going to be a guidance to the Government in regard to a decision on a policy of this kind.

The President, I am certain, is in possession of and should have read and considered the Report of the Food Prices Commission. The report of that Commission was forwarded to the Government on the 26th July, and we have had no indication to-day or previous to to-day as to what the mind of the Government was or what they intended to do as a result of the recommendations of that particular Commission. It is strange that that Commission was only availed of by people who suffered as a result of the profiteering going on and which has been going on for the past three or four years. I have no hesitation in saying that there is no country in the world to-day in which there is such an unscrupulous gang of profiteers as there is in Ireland. I think the Government should take notice of that fact and make up their minds as to how to deal with that particular section. In the report of the Commission it is stated that the cost to the brewer of the barley used in the manufacture of one barrel of stout is 7/3 in 1914; and 8/- in 1922, while the cost for the barrel of stout to the licensed vintner was £1 12s. 4½d. in 1914, and in 1922 £3 6s. 10½d., less the proportion of Government duty, showing there was an increase only of 10 per cent. to the person who grows barley, while the brewer or the distiller had an increase of 109 per cent. Now, it would be interesting to know what the mind of the Government is and what they intend to do as a result of evidence of that kind submitted to them in the report sent to them on the 26th July.

We have all read in the papers that Messrs. Guinness & Co. have only recently applied and got sanction to increase their capital from five millions to seven and a-half millions, and that two and a-half millions is to be distributed to the shareholders as a free gift, notwithstanding the fact that three bonuses were already paid in the same year to employees, both salaried and otherwise. That shows the amount of profit made by Guinness & Co., and it shows you how that firm is treating the worker that Deputy Cooper referred to, and I agree with Deputy Cooper that the working farmer in this country who takes off his coat and works on the farm beside his worker is entitled to the same consideration and respect as the worker who works alongside of him. I, like Deputy Cooper, acknowledge the fact that Guinness & Co. have not treated the working farmer who sows and produces the barley in the same way as they have treated their employees. It may seem strange that I should raise this question. I raise it because I realise that unless the Government make some attempt to deal with the precarious position of barley growers one of the main industries will go out of existence. It is well known to Deputies who represent rural constituencies, especially where there is a considerable amount of barley grown, that as a result of the low prices last year a lot of land is being let out, and eventually, if things go on as they are, people who grow barley and depend upon it for a livelihood will find themselves in the bankruptcy court. The President, referring in a slight way to this question, read out the figures of the imported barley, which were correct, but he did not read out, and he said he had not got, the figures with regard to imported malt. The average importation of malt for the five years, 1909 to 1915, was 38,434 tons per year. In 1920 it was 21,290 tons; in 1921 it was 37,110 tons; in 1922 it was 38,352 tons, showing, as the figures do, that while there has been admittedly a decrease in the importation in foreign barley, due, no doubt, to the continental conditions prevailing, still there has been an increase in the importation of malt. I have been informed, and I am quite sure it is correct, that the people of this country who are foolish enough or otherwise to drink Guinness's stout, are drinking stout brewed from imported barley while the exported stout sold in England is brewed out of Irish grain bought at a very cheap price.

While the licensed vintners here are charging 8d. per bottle to the Irish population for Irish stout, brewed out of imported grain, the people of Liverpool and Manchester get Irish stout brewed out of Irish grain at 6d. and, in some cases, at 5½d. per bottle. These are things that require to be looked into, and looked into at once, by the Government. One cannot have failed to notice the reduction in the prices of pigs and cattle owing to the recent industrial trouble. But although there has been a reduction in the price, due to industrial and, perhaps, other causes, there has been no reduction whatever in the price charged by the retailer to the consumer. If a strike is threatened, you find that the shopkeeper or middleman, without any reason whatsoever, except that he anticipates a strike, which may not take place, at once raises the price of every commodity to the consumer. If that thing is going to continue, there will have to be some law to regulate the price. Profiteering, against which there is no protection, is one of the principal causes of the industrial troubles in this country. If the representatives of the big business interests in this country, either in the Dáil or outside it, will lend some assistance in reducing the prices of commodities, as they are endeavouring to reduce wages, then they will be doing something to end the industrial unrest, which is prevalent.

The President referred to the Railway rates and transport charges and to the fact that there had been no reduction in railway, canal or other transport charges. By agreement between all the parties concerned, the Railwaymen of this country, numbering 30,000 in round figures, have suffered a reduction of wages of from £1 to £1 5s. each. Notwithstanding that, there has been no reduction in the Railway rates in operation since they reached the peak point in 1921. These are things that require to be answered by somebody, either here or outside. They require justification, and if they cannot be justified then they call for the serious consideration of the Government. I trust the President in his reply—if he replies—will say whether or not the Government have made any representations to Guinness & Co. and the other Irish brewers with regard to the price of barley in the coming season, and if so, with what result? If Guinness & Co., who monopolise and control the market, are not prepared to give a reasonable price to those who grow the barley in this country, then I trust he will indicate the measures the Government intend to take so as to remedy such a state of affairs.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. P. Hogan): I could probably make as long a speech about barley as Deputy Davin, and say just as little, if I tried. I have listened to three or four speeches from him on that subject, in which, if one is to judge from his protestations, he is intensely interested. But he has never yet made a single suggestion. How would he deal with this question? He complains that the Government has done nothing. He complains that they will not carry out the findings of the Commissions. He suggests that they have not at their disposal the really valuable advice which they should have on this question. He has been talking about this matter for the last three months, but he has not told us what he would have done.

Mr. DAVIN: Tell us what you have done.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Order!

Mr. HOGAN: He has never come to the point. Barley is like every other subject: there is no use in talking round it. Is he in favour of an embargo? I would like to hear Deputy Davin on that next time he speaks—because I am perfectly certain he will make another speech on barley. Is he in favour of an import duty? Is he in favour of guaranteed prices? These are three questions that have got to be answered before you make up your mind as to what you are going to do. He has not even distantly referred to them. I will pay him the compliment of saying that he has kept me in complete ignorance of his real mind on these very important questions. But they are questions which have got to be answered.

Mr. DAVIN: On a point of explanation, so far as I am personally concerned, I will be quite candid. If the Minister responsible, or the Government, is not in a position to force the hands of Messrs. Guinness & Co., I am prepared to vote for an embargo on imported grain.

Mr. HOGAN: I think I need not say any more, A Chinn Chomhairle. The Dáil should pass a vote of thanks to me.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE took the Chair at this stage.

Mr. GOREY: The reason we, on these benches, have not intervened in this debate is because we do not think the question can be dealt with by notice of this kind. We, of the Farmers' Union, have the barley question, together with other questions, under consideration at the moment. We are trying to work out a means whereby tariff rates could be applied to some of the stuff that comes into the country—barley, food-stuffs and other things. We have not come to a definite conclusion, but our people are in conference. When we have finally decided what ought to be included and what ought not be included, we will put our conclusions in proper form before the Dáil. We did not desire to intervene in this debate because we were of opinion that the matter could not be properly dealt with in this manner.

With regard to the other question raised in the debate, I am very glad to hear that there are Deputies on the other benches to relieve some of us in trying to knock sense into those on the Labour benches. Deputy O'Mahony has given us a very instructive speech, but the same speech practically was delivered here time and again in the last Dáil. Deputy O'Mahony's figures are figures I have used time and again. They have never been contradicted and could not be contradicted. Unless Deputy Johnson and the persons whom he speaks for are prepared to give a return for the wages paid there is no use talking on this question or using the flowery phrases which Deputy Johnson used. It is simply baby language. It would be good enough for the nursery. It would not do at all in a community of full grown men and women. Unless labour is prepared to give work for wages—

Mr. JOHNSON: Is 25/- a week a wage that you stand over?

Mr. GOREY: In Dublin?

Mr. JOHNSON: In County Waterford.

Mr. GOREY: Certainly; a good wage, a great wage. I have often lived on less and I did not do any robbing to supplement it, or use the burner's torch.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

The Deputy must realise that he has to address the chair, not the members on the opposite benches.

Mr. GOREY: Is there any machinery you could invent to keep the gentlemen on the opposite benches from continuously interrupting? As a previous Deputy said the truth is very bitter and very disagreeable. I would like the Deputies to get some medicine that will keep them quiet. If the Labour leaders are in earnest in what they say they ought to try and convince their own people first. The strike in Cork was a live question at the recent election. There were more people on strike in Cork than would have returned two Deputies. Did they do it? Did one of the Labour candidates get a quota? The answer was given to the Labour leaders at the election. The answer was given in Dublin and in every other constituency.

Mr. DAVIN: You cannot boast yourself.

Mr. GOREY: There were sufficient men idle about the docks in Dublin to elect 3 or 4 Deputies, if you take into account the votes of their families. What was the result? They did not even elect one Labour Deputy. Labour is sick of its leaders and sick of strikes. If the rank and file got a chance to speak out, if they were not bullied and dragged down by some of the leaders and their assistants things would be different from what they are. There is no use in carrying on this farce, there is no use in carrying on this debate. If Labour is not prepared to give a return in output for the wages received, Labour representatives have no use coming here and trying to fool the Dáil and the public. They have no use trying to fool the small farmers of this country, and they have very little use trying to fool the agricultural worker.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

It would be better if the Deputy did not make those bitter attacks on Labour. The reference to fooling the Dáil and the public was aggravating, and it would be better if the Deputy spoke in more measured language.

Mr. GOREY: It was really by way of advice that I was making my remarks, not with any bitterness or acrimony. I do not see any use in continuing this debate, as it impresses nobody. We are tired listening to the diatribes of Deputy Johnson. They cut no ice. Nobody believes in them. He does not believe in them himself.

Mr. T. NAGLE: I was very much amused at the tribute which Deputy Gorey paid to Deputy O'Mahony. He stated that Deputy O'Mahony had put forward figures which have never been controverted and could not be controverted. I beg to differ with some of the statements which Deputy O'Mahony made. He talked about the workers in England having accepted reductions in wages, and about the difference in the wages paid in the building trades in England and in this country. In talking about the workers in England having sense enough to accept reductions, he said they knew quite well that it was necessary to accept reductions in order to be able to compete with continental countries. He omitted, however, to tell us how it was necessary for English building trades workers to accept reductions in wages in order to compete with foreign building trades workers. I have yet to learn that houses built in Germany, or in the United States, or China, have ever been carted into England and sold there. I have also yet to learn how houses built in England, on the low rates of wages paid there, can have any effect in determining the prices of houses in Ireland, built by workers who are getting a little more wages than in England.

Mr. O'MAHONY: On a point of order, my remarks referred not to houses in England, but to trade in England—an entirely different matter.

Mr. NAGLE: I may be wrong, but I thought there was a comparison made between the wages paid to workers in the building trades in England and the wages paid in the building trades in Ireland; and the prices at which houses could be built in England and the prices at which they could be built in Ireland. I naturally drew the inference from the statement that the workers generally in England decided to accept reductions because they saw it was necessary to compete with foreign industry, that the building industry was lumped with the other industries to which he referred. He also made a statement to the effect that the Cork employers wanted some reconstruction work done and that English firms agreed to do this work at a price 35 per cent. below that of Cork firms.

I understand that Deputy O'Mahony is a building contractor, so he ought to know better than any other Deputy, that if an English firm could do a job in Cork for a smaller price than a Cork building contractor, that that was not due to the difference in the rate of wages paid in England and in Cork. Any building tradesmen coming from England to Cork would be compelled to get from the employers the rate of wages that prevail in Cork. For a good many years, at least as far back as I can remember, there has always been an agreement in the building trade whereby if men were sent by a contractor, say, from Dublin to Cork, and if the Cork rate of wages was higher than the Dublin rate, the men get the Cork rate. The same would apply to men coming from England. Apart from that, it should be obvious to everyone that the Cork tradesmen, certainly if men were brought from England or anywhere else, would not allow them do the work while men in Cork were idle. He also tried to prove that the fact that building was not going on now was due to the higher rate of wages. As Deputy O'Mahony has been in the building trade he will know something about the conditions that applied in pre-war days. I ask him, is it only during the last four or five years, since the workers' wages have got to something like a decent level, that there has been a scarcity of houses? There has been a scarcity of houses for the last forty, fifty, or one hundred years. Prior to 1914 the rate of wages paid to labourers in the South of Ireland was about 13/- or 14/-, and the rate of wages paid to the tradesmen was about 30/- per week. In spite of that houses were scarce and were not built. We heard a good many reasons why certain things were not done. When the employers in the building trade want a reduction in wages they usually tell us that if wages do not come down houses will not be built. Other employers on other occasions when they want to prove a different thing say that the reason for the slump in building in pre-war days was the Finance Act of 1909. Very many speculative builders in Dublin told us recently at the Rent Restrictions Commission that the Finance Act of 1909 was the reason why no building has been done from 1909 onwards. That was before the European war was thought of. Most of the building contractors I have met during the last three or four years admitted candidly that the wages paid in pre-war days were scandalous. They also admitted that if the cost of living went down to the figure it was in 1914 they would never consider the advisability of bringing the workers' wages down to the level that then existed. They admitted that an increase of 50 or 70 per cent. over the 1914 level would only be a decent wage for the working man. In spite of that state of affairs sufficient houses were not built then to meet the needs of the people. All the blame cannot be thrown on the workers who for the past three years got something like three decent meals a day, and occasionally visited a picture house or a theatre. Deputy Gorey stated that the labour leaders prevented the decent—of course they always add the word decent—workers from accepting a reduction in wages. The worker who accepts a reduction in wages is, of course, a decent worker, while the fellow who does not, is not.

Mrs. COLLINS-O'DRISCOLL: On a point of order, are we discussing the meaning of certain words, or the building trade? What is before the Dáil?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHATA
The President's statement.

Mrs. COLLINS-O'DRISCOLL: I cannot see how any of this is relevant.

Mr. NAGLE: I would like to point out that a Labour Leader is no more responsible for a working man refusing to accept a reduction in wages than the Secretary of an Employers' Federation is responsible for compelling that Federation to look for a reduction in wages. If the Deputy thinks that the Labour or Trade Union official is responsible he must be arguing from facts that exist in his own organisation. It must be that the official of the Employers' Federation is top dog and that he wields the whip and compels the members of the organisation to do what he thinks is right. As a matter of fact, a Trades Union official is just as much an employee as the Secretary of any local or national Employers' Federation. He only does what he is told. I would like Deputies when talking on these subjects in future to try to keep nearer to the truth of the matter and not talk merely for the sake of getting home a point. I thought after what the President and Deputy Johnson said that we were striving to bring about a better spirit, a spirit of co-operation between the various groups in this country. We all recognise that something on these lines must be done during the next couple of years if the country is to be saved from complete disaster. From the remarks of the President and Deputy Johnson, I thought we were getting near that. I was surprised to find some of the other Deputies trying to come out against one particular class in the country and trying to undo the very thing that the President and Deputy Johnson had been striving to do, to make all classes realise that they should work together in order to drag the country out of the abyss in which it now finds itself.

Mr. DALY: I was delighted beyond measure this evening to hear the President lay down, or call upon 7 o'clock. the people to lay down, the real foundation of patriotism by calling on all classes to unite for the common good of the country. The man who is getting high wages and the profiteer should cease fire. Whoever shall cease fire, I think the worker should be the last to do so, as the workers' children should not be called upon to suffer in order to have the common good of the country accomplished. In this matter, however, the President can set an example by reducing the prices of what the workers on the docks and in the fields call food, and we all know it is food to them.
Vol. 5.

The President could control the price of porter, and while the price of porter, tea, sugar and other things that the Cabinet have authority over is as high as it is at present, you cannot expect the workers to cease looking for higher wages. I think it is the duty of the Cabinet, especially in dealing with profiteers, that those prices should again be controlled and that the working classes should be in a position to buy the goods and necessities of life, if they are called upon to reduce their wages, in accordance with the reduction of wages. All these things should be accomplished before the unfortunate poor man should be called upon to accept reduced wages. There is another matter which affects the whole country, and which the President and his Cabinet have control over. We know that in the Land Act the unfortunate poor farmers, especially the small farmers, are called upon to pay three years' arrears of rent. I ask the Cabinet to extend the payment of these arrears over a longer period than that which they are asked to pay in order that they can pay them at all. These poor people, in their own way, are as badly off as the workers, and if the President and his Cabinet will set the example in the way which I have indicated, it will be the duty of everybody concerned to put their heads together and put their shoulders to the wheel in order that the progress and the common good of the country may be accomplished.

Mr. DALTON: I am afraid that the President's statement this evening has given rise to what I may describe as a very elastic debate. It is rather a pity that the Dáil did not take up his statement in the spirit in which it was made. I was very pleased to hear many of the remarks and most of the points which Deputy Johnson made. They were a very happy augury of the future, because they followed largely on the lines that the President adopted in making his statement. His statement, as Deputy Davin and also Deputy Johnson have stated, came, to a certain extent, unawares on members of the Dáil, as it was presumably not to be made until after the speech of the Governor-General. Let us hope that the members of this Dáil will act in the [Mr. Dalton.] spirit of his request. At present it is not for the Government of this country to take sides either with the workers or with the employers. We require capital and we require workers. The workers are, to my mind, a more important part of the community than capital, because labour eventually can create by itself, whereas capital alone cannot create. At present I believe that the duty that lies before us is to enter into consideration of the present trouble on the lines which the President has put before us in his statement. If we follow on those lines and try and find means to enable capital and labour to get through the present difficulties there is a possibility of the country getting out of its difficulties. A way can be found provided that labour recognises what its duty is to the country as well as to its own class, and the same thing applies to merchants and employers. Let us hope that they will, for Ireland's sake, if not in the interests of their own party, try every way to arrive at a happy ending of these troubles and then to take the necessary steps to see that there will not be a recurrence of them in this country.

The PRESIDENT: The Ministry of Industry and Commerce reports that it has secured resumption of work on the Donegal Railway, and the conference will be held this week. From some of the statements made it is obvious to me that people were speaking with some knowledge of the subject, but not with a complete knowledge. I have been informed that the Land Commission can scarcely send out receipts quickly enough for the payments of arrears of rent, and the Deputy will find that a considerable amount of the arrears are written off in the Land Act and that a portion is extended over 68½ years. I do not know anyone who would be prepared to accept payment over a longer period.

Deputy Davin has not got at the root of the question of barley. I would like to know whether the Deputy has examined the returns of barley bought in 1918, 1920, 1921 and 1922, and compared each year with the year following. There is no use in saying that the supply and demand have not any relation one to the other. They have. If in one year any firm, no matter in what it is engaged, buys 100,000 tons of any commodity and in the next year only requires 50,000 tons, and that 50,000 is what the market can absorb, obviously 50,000 will go west unless some other use can be devised for it. The Deputy has missed that point. He wants us to legislate against Guinness. Guinness could ask us why we could not legislate against labour, and so the vicious circle goes on. The Deputy laid stress on the fact that though we had many Commissions yet we adopted none of their reports. The Deputy must remember that when Commissions make sensible recommendations to this Dáil we have to take into consideration other Commissions, too. If they bear that in mind and submit sensible conclusions that the country will bear, then they will get consideration; but if extravagant recommendations are made by any Commission which is indifferent to the fact that there are other liabilities to be borne by the State, then you may expect that we will not adopt their report.

Mr. JOHNSON: What about your Terms of Reference?

The PRESIDENT: Terms of Reference ought to be read in the light of the fact that there are 3,000,000 people in this country, and consideration should be given to other subjects rather than the one under review. Take the question of housing. There has not been any report on that, and I think that most Deputies and persons will admit that it is a very important subject. This is largely due to the fact that anybody could not stand for recommending to the Government such a huge sum in subsidies as would be required to provide houses. People lose sight of the main issue. On the one side it is thrown out that labour will not stand down and on the other side people will say that labour must stand down. It is not by reiterating such statements as those that we are to get to any method of solving our trouble. If the workers require houses they cannot expect other people to provide them for them. The best of them admit that. If they are to partake of any such luxury unless those luxuries are provided at a price at which they can buy them at they will be denied them. They are the people themselves who are providing the houses, and I believe it is possible to provide those luxuries at a fair economic price. The tendency has been, during some years past, to find fault one side with the other, and that has caused indifference to the country's needs. When one has gone through other countries and has seen what they can boast of, seen what they have done, seen what monuments generations past have left, then one can see here in this country how poverty-stricken we are. Now that we have got the opportunity we cannot lay the blame at another's door for putting a stop to our progress. Let us at least prove worthy of the sacrifices of the people who died in order that we might live.

COMMITTEE TO RECOMMEND EXTERNAL MINISTERS.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

The following is the result of the election of members of the Committee:—Thomas Johnson, W. A. Redmond, R. Wilson, T. O'Mahony, P. Hughes, D. MacCarthy, W. Scars, R. H. Beamish, W. Davin, D. J. Gorey, P. S. Doyle, C. O Broin, P. Cosgrave, A. MacCabe and G. Nicholls.

Mr. JOHNSON: I take it that the figures will be published or issued to somebody?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

Any Deputy who wishes can see the figures in the Clerk's office.

ALLEGED INTERFERENCE WITH AUCTIONS IN COUNTY WICKLOW.

Mr. WILSON: I very much regret, on an occasion like this, after the debate that we have had, that it falls to me to bring forward what I would consider to be one of these incidents in our lives which are ruining our credit and which, unless remedied very soon, will create a state of lawlessness which we very much wish to prevent. A Deputy of this Dáil, with about forty men and two red flags, entered on premises yesterday where a public auction was advertised, and there said that he would not permit any auction to take place, and that he accepted responsibility for his action when he was questioned by the sergeant of the police. Now, there is very little use in any Deputy taking an oath here that he will abide by the laws of the country if he immediately goes out and breaks these laws, and I put this to him, or to anyone else who would be inclined to act similarly, that a person in a responsible position, such as a Deputy of this Dáil, should be very careful in his actions, especially in regard to an action which in the past has been upheld, but which, in the future, if we are ever to get away from lawlessness, must be stopped. The question that arises in this case is a question of the rights of property. It affects the farmer and the landholder in connection with the very property which he holds, and if these men are allowed to carry on their campaign it would prevent him from handling his property in the way he desires.

The particular estate in question was being carried on by a steward, and, presumably, on account of the fall in the price of produce, it was not a paying concern. The owner, who resides in England, sent instructions to have the various employees disbanded or given notice to, to sell the implements and to let the place on the eleven months' system. That is the position. Now, I am not advocating the eleven months' system, but in certain cases where you cannot make your land pay the fullest opportunities of the law should be provided by which any man can act as he likes in his own best interests to make a living.

The second case was that of a poor widow with a few children. She was unable to make her land a paying proposition, and also endeavoured to let it. It was also refused. I contend that such actions as these are striking at the whole credit of the country, and we, on the Farmers' Benches, who uphold the right of the law, who are prepared to stand by our obligations as regards our rates, taxes and annuities—and the President has just paid a tribute to the way in which we are discharging these liabilities—ought to be

[Mr. Wilson.]—afforded every opportunity to carry on our business how we like, and that these unauthorised attempts by Deputies who ought to know better, at nationalising our property ought to be stopped. I ask the Government to give an expression of their opinion and of the attitude they will adopt on similar occasions, and I hope it will be reasonable.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: At the moment I have received a report from the Civic Guard on only one of these two cases, and the position is this, that it may be that either or both of these cases will form the subject of a criminal prosecution. In that set of circumstances I have no wish to speak at length on the matter. One of the last Acts of the last Dáil was a Land Act, and we cannot allow a position to spring up in the country where every man would pass his own Land Act, so to speak. We passed another Act in the last Dáil called the Public Safety (Emergency Powers) Act, 1923. It may be that the excitement of the elections, and other recreations since the dissolution, have caused Deputies to forget many of its provisions. I draw the attention of Deputies to Sub-sections (2) and (3) of Section 5 of that Act. "Every person convicted by a Court of summary jurisdiction of any of the offences mentioned in Part II. of the Schedule to this Act, shall be sentenced to suffer imprisonment with hard labour for the term of 12 months, and to pay a fine of fifty pounds, and, in default of payment of such fine within one month after conviction, to suffer imprisonment with hard labour for a further term of six months, to be added to and commenced on the expiration of the said term of twelve months."

Sub-section 3 reads:—

Every person found guilty on indictment of any of the offences mentioned in Part II. of the Schedule to this Act shall be sentenced either:

(a) To suffer penal servitude for a term not exceeding three years and to pay a fine of not more than one hundred pounds nor less than fifty pounds, and, in default of payment of such fine within one month after sentence, to suffer penal servitude for a further term of one year to be added to and commence on the expiration of the said term of three years; or

(b) To suffer imprisonment with hard labour for a term of not more than two years nor less than one year and to pay a fine of not more than one hundred pounds nor less than fifty pounds, and, in default of payment of such fine within one month after sentence, to suffer imprisonment with hard labour for a further term of six months to be added to and commence on the expiration of the first-mentioned term of imprisonment."

Paragraph 9 of Part II. of the Schedule reads:—"Interfering with or preventing, without lawful authority, the lawful occupation, use or enjoyment of any land or premises."

Mr. GOREY: My hearing is not very good, but I understand that threats have been made across the floor here from Deputy to Deputy.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE resumed the chair.

Mr. GOREY: This, I think, is one of the most unfortunate incidents that has occurred since the late Election. This is not only an attack on a man's property, an attack on a farmer's property or a business man's property, but an attack on the liberty of every subject of this State. It is an attack on his citizenship. This attack led by a Deputy of this House is an encouragement to attack himself in return. We have here one case of a poor widow with 80 acres of land prevented from trying to make the best use of that land for the support of herself and her orphans by a man who is in receipt of £360 a year from the ratepayers of this country. What argument would he put up if a band of fellows came along and asked him to divide his £360 amongst them?

Mr. EVERETT: What about the 900 acres?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Order.

Mr. GOREY: I am not talking about 900 acres, but about this particular case; this is an attack on the liberty of the individual.

Mr. EVERETT: I do not care about your threats.

Mr. GOREY: They are not threats. If Deputies want threats and invite threats, if the law does not protect us and the people we represent, we will protect ourselves. Deputies can put that in their pipes and smoke it.

Mr. EVERETT: You are doing it in Waterford, where you are shooting labour men.

Mr. GOREY: We will do it everywhere else. I do not want to make a speech or raise bitterness, but this is the most cowardly class of organised ruffianism I think I have ever heard of in my life—this attack on a widow and her orphans.

Mr. EVERETT: A lie. There was no attack, sir.

Mr. GOREY: They came there and interfered with her liberty, and interfered with what every citizen is entitled to. It is the lowest class of organised ruffianism, and it is anything but a tribute to the men who took a part in it.

Mr. EVERETT: They will answer for their actions.

Mr. JOHNSON: I take it after the case has been tried and decided that sentences will follow. The case has been tried and decided in the Dáil by one of the Deputies who have spoken and I take it the sentence will follow.

Mr. WILSON: On a point of order, I must say Deputy Johnson has not given a proper version of the speech on the question. It has not been tried and decided in the Deputies' minds. It may have been tried and decided in one man's mind, but it has not been tried and decided in every man's mind.

Mr. EVERETT: The leader tried it.

EXECUTIVE NOMINATIONS APPROVED OF.

The PRESIDENT: I take it this particular debate has concluded. I forgot to mention earlier in the day that the nomination of six members of the Executive has been reported to his Excellency the Governor-General, who has approved of the nominations made by me and assented to by the Dáil. The nomination of the Minister for Education will be reported when he has complied with Article 17 of the Constitution.

The Dáil adjourned at 7.30 p.m. until 3 p.m. Wednesday, October 3rd.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS. ORAL ANSWERS.

THE IRISH-BRITISH TREATY.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS asked the President whether it is the intention of the Executive Council to apply for the registration of the Irish-British Treaty at Geneva, in accordance with the requirements of the League of Nations.

The PRESIDENT: The subject of the question is one which must obviously receive consideration in its due course and proper time.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I would like to ask the President if that answer is to mean that it has not yet received proper consideration.

The PRESIDENT: The answer contains all that I have got to say on the subject, and is sufficiently illuminative if the Deputy will consider it.

PENSIONS APPEAL TRIBUNAL (BRITISH PENSIONS).

AILFRID O BROIN asked the President whether he will ask for a return from the Pensions Appeal Tribunal (British Pensions), South Frederick Street, Dublin, showing the number of cases considered by them within the past 18 months, the number of appeals allowed, the number rejected, and the number of dependents and ex-service men who had their pensions reduced, and the cause for the reduction; further, whether he will secure the same information from the Ministry of Pensions, Dunlop House, Dublin.

The PRESIDENT: This tribunal is not under the control of the Government of Saorstát Eireann and I am consequently not in a position to ask for the returns referred to.

Mr. A. BYRNE: Arising out of the President's reply, I would like to ask whether the British Authorities have the right to reduce pensioners' allowances without any regard to the circumstances in these cases, or whether it is the intention of this Government to protect the citizens of the Free State from these undue cuts that are now taking place?

The PRESIDENT: The Government, as I have stated, has got no control whatever over this Committee.

Captain REDMOND: Will the President make representations to the proper authorities to secure, and to safeguard, the interests of these Irish citizens?

The PRESIDENT: That is another question, and I do not know that it is possible to do so.

Captain REDMOND: Is it not possible for this Government to make representations to the Colonial Secretary, or through whatever medium is the proper one, to see that this British Committee should look after the interests of Irish citizens?

The PRESIDENT: I do not think that this Dáil, if it were made aware that representations were made to us as to how we should conduct our business with regard to any persons placed in the same position in Great Britain, would be satisfied that such representations should be made to us. If that be our view in regard to that question, I do not see how we could interfere in a matter which concerns them.

Captain REDMOND: Surely the President will admit—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Order. That is entering upon an argument.

BURNING OF A HOUSE (COUNTY COURT DECREE).

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Minister for Finance whether he is aware that Michael Kenny, Castlepollard, Westmeath, obtained a decree in the County Court, Mullingar, on June 12th, 1922, for £1,150 for the burning of his house on the 3rd May, 1922, and further, whether he is aware that the State Solicitor has offered Michael Kenny £400 in full payment, and whether he can state by whose authority such an offer was made, and further, to ask when the full amount granted by the Court shall be paid?

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. Ernest Blythe): The decree granted in this case by the County Court was reopened by me under Section 2 (1) of the Damage to Property Compensation Act, and an offer was made pursuant to Section 2 (3). This offer was refused, and the question of making an amended offer is at present under consideration.

HOUSING SCHEMES (PRIVATE BUILDERS).

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Finance if he will state whether the Government have yet considered the advisability of assisting private builders in any effort they may take to build houses containing three, four and five rooms; whether he is aware that private builders are prepared to build five houses for the same grant as is given to Municipal authorities for the building of two houses.

Mr. BLYTHE: The question of reviving grants to private builders is at present under consideration.

COURTS OF JUSTICE STENOGRAPHERS.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether he can state how many official stenographers will be required to execute Section 63 of the Courts of Justice Bill, and what is the estimated total cost of this service, including salaries, bonus, allowances and travelling expenses.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. Kevin O'Higgins): Eight stenographers should suffice for the purpose of the Section in question, and the maximum cost of this service may provisionally be estimated at £4,000. Every effort will, of course, be made to keep the cost to a minimum.

HOUSING ACCOMMODATION (NORTH WALL AREA).

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether he is aware that many landlords are at present seeking to take possession of cottages and rooms from their tenants without providing alternative accommodation; whether he will take steps to improve the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1923, by including a clause to safeguard the tenants' interests; if he is aware that many residents in the North Wall area are now being threatened with eviction notices from their landlords.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I have no particular knowledge of the facts stated by Deputy O Broin, but I have no doubt that hardship occurs. Under the Act, however, possession is not to be given to the landlord unless the Court is satisfied that the hardship to him, in consequence of refusing him possession, would be greater than the hardship to the tenant in consequence of being forced to give up possession. This provision puts upon the Court the duty of deciding which is the lesser hardship and making an order accordingly. There does not seem to be any better way of deciding such points. It is not proposed to amend the Act, which represents the practically unanimous report of a Committee representative of all sections of the community.

SPORTING CARTRIDGE SUPPLIES.

Mr. PATRICK W. SHAW asked the Minister for Home Affairs when he purposes arranging for supplies of sporting cartridges to recognised dealers in country towns, as the present arrangement of endeavouring to obtain through Dublin agents is practically impossible for persons residing in country districts, and as the matter is urgent, owing to the great destruction being done to the crops by vermin.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: In accordance with the Regulations made pursuant to Section 8 of the Public Safety (Emer-agency Powers) Act, 1923, dealers duly registered and authorised thereunder may now on application obtain licences to import direct a certain quantity of sporting ammunition.

TOWN TENANTS (PURCHASE FACILITIES).

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Minister for Local Government whether it is his intention to introduce legislation on behalf of the town tenants, giving every tenant facilities for purchase similar to those given to the land tenants under the Land Bill?

Mr. BLYTHE (who replied) said: It is not the intention of the Government to introduce legislation of the nature referred to.

WESTMEATH OLD AGE PENSIONER (QUESTION OF AGE).

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Minister for Local Government whether he is aware that James Fin, Ballinagore, Westmeath, was granted the old age pension in March, 1923, and whether it was withheld subsequently on the question of age, notwithstanding that two older men than himself have sworn affidavits that the applicant, James Fin, is over seventy; further, whether the Minister will have the matter investigated with a view to having the old age pension granted, as Fin has no means of livelihood.

Mr. BLYTHE: The claim of James Fin, Ballinagore, to the old age pension is at present before the Ministry on appeal on the ground of age, and has not yet been decided. A birth certificate has not been received nor any other reasonably conclusive evidence of age. When a previous appeal was under consideration the two declarations referred to in the question were submitted, but the deponents had not given adequate reasons for their belief that the claimant was the statutory age. The evidence was, therefore, held to be insufficient and the claim to a pension disallowed on the 30th April last.

A decision on the present application will be deferred for a short time to give the claimant an opportunity of submitting further documentary evidence of age or affidavits containing definite statements and reasons therefor to show that applicant has reached seventy years.

Mr. LYONS: Is the Minister aware that many of these poor people are in a very destitute condition? This man is over seventy years of age, and can prove it by affidavit. There are many people in that position all over the country.

Mr. BLYTHE: I would like to be made aware of that by receiving the affidavits.

Mr. LYONS: The affidavit has been made in this case.

NATIONAL TEACHERS AND IRISH COURSES.

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Minister for Education whether he can state when it is likely that National School teachers who attended Irish courses will be paid, as these courses finished on the 3rd August last, and to ask that payment be expedited.

MINISTER for EDUCATION (Professor MacNeill): Payment of salary as National School teacher has, where such payment is regular, been made to all teachers who attended the special course of instruction in Irish held in July and August last. Payment for services as Professor and of the grants in aid of lodging and travelling expenses has been made, except in a few cases under consideration, to National School teachers and others who acted as Professors during the course. The claims for the grant-in-aid of lodging expenses and travelling allowances made by the teachers who attended the course as students are at present being examined and passed for payment. The scrutiny of these claims, involving in each case a reference to the class roll, is onerous, but it is hoped to have the great majority of the payments under this head made before the end of November.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS CERTIFICATES.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS asked the Postmaster-General if he can state how many Post Office Savings Certificates have been bought in Ireland, and the total amount of money, both gross and net, that has been received by the State in this way.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. J. J. Walsh): Up to the 27th September 11,105 Savings Certificates were sold, and the amount realised in respect of them was £218,206 18s. 0d. Of those, 109 Certificates representing £1,799 6s. 0d. have been repaid, thus leaving the net sales 10,996 Certificates, and the net receipts £216,407 12s. 0d.

The actual figures for the period, 28th September to 4th October, are not yet available, but it is estimated that the number and value of the Certificates sold during that period will have been 950 and £13,000, respectively.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Arising out of that answer I would like to ask if, in ascertaining these net figures, regard was had to the cost of collection, and if the Postmaster-General can state what percentage that cost of collection was estimated to be?

Mr. WALSH: The cost of collection is not included, nor can I say at the moment what it was. Notice will be required to get the further information asked for.

BROADCASTING LICENCES.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS asked the Postmaster-General whether, in pursuance of the undertaking given by the President in the last Dáil, that no broadcasting licences or monopolies would be granted in or by the Free State until this Dáil had first been consulted, he will now lay his proposals in these matters before the Dáil for discussion and sanction.

Mr. WALSH: The negotiations in connection with the proposed establishment of a Wireless Broadcasting Station in the Free State are still in progress, and I am not yet in a position to lay the proposals in the matter before the Dáil. It is the intention to seek the sanction of the Dáil for any scheme which may be agreed upon.

SANDYCOVE POSTAL DELIVERY.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that in Sandycove, Co. Dublin, there is now only one delivery of letters daily, and whether there is any precedent for such a restricted service in a thickly populated district within six miles of the General Post Office?

Mr. WALSH: I have had enquiry made respecting the delivery of letters at Sandycove and I find that with a view to retrenchment the second delivery of letters at Dun Laoghaire has been confined to the central portion of the township for some months past. The restriction allows one delivery only to Sandycove and other portions of the outlying district, the amount of correspondence for which is not regarded as justifying the expenditure necessary for a second delivery. The question of restoring the second delivery is, however, receiving further consideration, and a final decision in the matter will be given as soon as possible.

Major COOPER: Arising out of the Minister's reply, might I ask if he is aware that until recently Sandycove had four deliveries daily, and that precisely similar districts on each side of it, Dun Laoghaire and Dalkey, have three, and will he take these facts into account when considering the matter?

Mr. WALSH: I am aware of all these facts and they are being taken into consideration.

SUNDAY POSTAL SERVICE (ABOLITION OF).

Mr. WILLIAM HEWAT asked the Postmaster-General whether he can take any steps to minimise the great inconvenience caused to the business community by the abolition of Mail despatches on Sundays to provincial centres; and whether it would not be possible to institute an express service for Sundays and holidays at extra rates?

Mr. WALSH: Arrangements have recently been brought into force by which Mails for Provincial Centres in

[Mr. Walsh.]

Saorstát Éireann, to which there is a suitable train service, and where the circumstances are deemed to justify exceptional treatment, are despatched from Dublin on Sundays. Mails from Great Britain which reach Dun Laoghaire by the Mail Packet on Sunday morning, are included in the despatch.

An express despatch service from Dublin is afforded on Bank Holidays also; in addition to important centres in Great Britain, as on Sundays, the arrangement is extended to Cork and Belfast on Bank Holidays.

ARMY PENSIONS ACT, 1923.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Defence if he will state to whom persons claiming to be entitled to pension or gratuity under the Army Pensions Act, 1923, should make their applications, and if dependents or the men of the 1916 movement will have their claims considered by the same authority?

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): I anticipate that in about a week's time a public announcement will be made regarding the authority to whom all persons who appear to have claims under the Army Pensions Act, 1923, should make application. All claims will be dealt with by the one authority.

ACCIDENTAL SHOOTING (QUESTION OF COMPENSATION).

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Minister for Defence whether compensation will be paid to Patrick Murray, Macc, Rathowen, Westmeath, in respect of his son, John, who was accidentally shot in Athlone on the 7th October, 1922; and further, to ask that, as Murray is in very poor circumstances owing to the loss of his son, payment of compensation be expedited.

General MULCAHY: Mr. Murray's claim will be considered as soon as possible by the authority referred to in my reply to the previous question.

Mr. LYONS: Would it be possible to send this man something on account; he is in a very bad way?

WRITTEN ANSWERS (CLERICAL OFFICERS IN PRISON SERVICE—ALLOWANCE IN LIEU OF UNIFORM).

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether it is a fact that, in accordance with Treasury Letter 159/22 and General Prisons Board's Circular 977/22 the clerical officers in the Prisons Service are entitled to an allowance in lieu of uniform equal to the actual cost of the uniform supplied to the uniformed ranks; whether he is aware that these officers are, and have been, receiving an allowance equal to the cost of the unmade material, and that the cost of making the uniform has not been included in the allowance; and whether, as this means that those officers are not compensated for the making of their clothing and are not in receipt of an allowance equal to the actual cost of the uniform, as laid down in the Letter and Circular above referred to, he will now take the necessary steps to have this matter rectified and the officers put in receipt of the full allowance to which they are entitled?

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. O'Higgins): An allowance in lieu of uniform is granted to officers of clerical grades in the Prisons Service. As uniforms for prison officers are made up by prisoners' labour, the actual cost to the State is the cost of the materials, plus five per cent. for wear and tear of tools. The allowance in question is equivalent to such actual cost.

CIVIL SERVICE BONUSES.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Finance if he will state whether the Civil Service bonus has recently been revised on the English or Irish cost of living figure; whether it is a fact that, according to the cost of living report published by the Ministry of Industry and Commerce the cost of living figure was 91 in March, 1922, and 85 at the first of the present month, showing a decrease of six points; whether during that period the Civil Service bonus has been cut on a decrease of twenty points, and will he now explain by what way this cut has been arrived at; further, whether he is aware that, in accordance with the Whitley Council cost of living agreement, the bonus should be revised every six months by averaging the index figure on the first of each month for the six months preceding the date of revision; whether the index figure is being only ascertained every three or four months in the Free State, and whether he will now say whether this method of revising the bonus is in accordance with the Whitley Council Agreement.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. Blythe): The bonus payable to Civil Servants is revised every 1st March and 1st September by reference to the average Saorstát cost of living figure in the preceding six months. This average is arrived at for the Saorstát by ascertaining at the middle of each quarter the increase in the cost of living as compared with the pre-war period; the expense involved would not justify the carrying out of this investigation monthly instead of quarterly.

The bonus payable by the Saorstát to its Civil Servants is higher than the bonus payable by the British Government to British Civil Servants under the British Agreement referred to in the question. The relative figures are as follows:—

Cost of Living figures for purposes of bonus.
Saorstát. British
For period 1st September, 1922, to 1st March, 1923	90	85
For period 1st March, 1923, to 1st September, 1923	90	80
For period 1st September, 1923, to 1st March, 1924	85	75

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Finance whether he is aware that in February, 1922, an Act was passed by the British Parliament whereby the supplemental pension of retired Civil Servants is revised in accordance with the cost of living; whether this Act was not in force at the time the Irish Civil Servants were taken over by the Provisional Government; and, if so, whether he will now say why this British Act, passed into law after the transfer of the Irish Civil Servants to the Provisional Government, is being applied to those Civil Servants.

Mr. BLYTHE: The method of calculating bonus for the purposes of Civil Service pensions to which the Deputy refers, and which it may be observed was put in force not by an Act of the British Parliament, but by the Treasury as a service regulation, existed prior to the transfer of the Irish Civil Service.

No Civil Servant was transferred to the Provisional Government prior to the 1st of April, 1922.

NEW WRIT FOR DUBLIN CITY, SOUTH.

Mr. D. McCARTHY: I beg formally to move the following motion standing in my name on the Order Paper:—

“Go n-ordóidh an Ceann Comhairle do Chléireach na Dála a rit a chur amach chun ball do thogha chun an fholúntais a thárla imeasc ballra na Dála so de bharr Míceál O hAodha do thabhairt suas a shuíocháin i nDáil-

"That the Ceann Comhairle direct the Clerk of the Dáil to issue his writ for the election of a member to fill the vacancy which has occurred in the membership of the present Dáil, consequent on the resignation by Deputy Michael Hayes of his seat in the Borough Constituency of Dublin South."

Mr. C. M. BYRNE: I second the motion.

Motion put and agreed to.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SPEECH:

RESOLUTION OF THANKS.

Mr. S. R. BURKE: I rise to propose the following resolution:—"That the Dáil returns thanks to the Governor-General for his speech, and approves of the legislative programme of the Government as outlined therein."

On the last occasion on which this resolution was proposed, the country was confronted with dangers of a very serious and threatening kind. It was a time of doubt and uncertainty for all of us, a time when no one could say that the future was secure. We are not yet out of the wood. The dangers which confront us are still serious, though of a different nature, but by continuing to follow the path we treaded in the old days and in the manner outlined in the Governor-General's address, by continuing to tread that path cautiously and warily, but withal firmly, I believe that this Dáil and the nation it represents has every reason for looking forward with confidence to the future.

I am particularly pleased to see here that this historic nation is now a member of the body known as the League of Nations. It is only an embryonic institution at the present moment, but in it are the seeds of great things for the world and for humanity. Ireland before played a very important part in international affairs when her scholars went all over the Continent spreading the light of reason and the light of Faith, and it is a welcome thing to us to see that we are about again to take part in the same or a similar task. It is also a good thing that we have participated in the Conference of the States making up the British Commonwealth of Nations. That will strengthen us, I am sure; it will strengthen our financial position, which is a matter to be very seriously considered at the present time.

The enactment of the Electoral Act, I am sure, was gratifying to all the people who have democratic ideals before them. By the adoption of adult suffrage our Constitution takes its place as one of the most democratic in the world. We are also about to put into force a new Act which embodies reforms in the administration of law and justice. The Irish people were, in the past, reputed, even by their enemies, to be a people that held justice and law and order very dearly, and it was the abuse of law and the abuse of justice in this country that was responsible for a great deal of the disorderliness and the lack of that law-abiding spirit that we found in other countries; but those remedial measures in our judicial system will bring about a return to the old ideals in this matter. It has been an excellent thing that in the very difficult crisis through which we have passed we have been able to organise a police force. I think it was one of the most creditable performances of the last Dáil that we were able to organise such a force in the face of such tremendous difficulties. Our military forces are after going through a very critical period, a period during which, in many respects, they had to take on the character of guerillas and which is now over. We can say with confidence that we have a regular army which, from the point of view of courage and efficiency, is second to none in Europe.

The problem of unemployment confronts us. It is a problem of course that has been made, to a very great extent, by the Irregular campaign in this country. It is a problem we have to tackle with all our energies, so as to see if we can overcome it, and I am sure, if the same capacity is shown in handling this difficulty as was shown in handling other difficulties during the last Dáil, we will have no difficulty in surmounting it.

I am glad to see that a measure for the encouragement and development of agriculture has been outlined. This, as we all know, is the key industry of the country. It is at the present time, I am sorry to say, in a very serious condition, and it behoves us all, every interest in the country, whether commercial, labour or professional, to put our heads together and to see how this great industry can again be put on a sound and paying basis.

I have only looked over the Governor-General's address, and I am sorry I cannot do full justice to the various points mentioned. I will leave it now to the seconder to perform the part that I should have performed.

SEOIRSE MAC NIOCAILL: Ba mhaith liom-sa cuidiú leis an rún do chuir an Bureach os ar g-cómhair. Do chuireas rún mar seo os cómhair na Dála anuiridh a' moladh clár an Rialtais. 'Sé an Rialtas ceudhna atá againn fós. Dubhradh nach rabh meas ag muinntir na tíre ar an Rialtas acht nuair a bhi feall acu theasbanadar nar mar seo a bhi an secul. Tá súil agam go n-cireochaidh leis an Rialtas an clár seo a chur i bh-feidhm co maith agus a rinneadar 'san tearma atá caithte.

I rise to second the motion proposed by Deputy Burke, and I may say that in the last Dáil I had the privilege of proposing a similar motion to that which Deputy Burke has proposed today. It was a motion approving of the Ministerial policy. We have today practically the same Ministry as we had in the last Dáil. We heard that the Ministry were unpopular and that they were doing things that were not right. Well, the Ministry has been vindicated. Every member of the Ministry who went up for election was returned at the top of the poll, I think, with one exception. That shows to my mind that the people of the country are behind the Ministry and behind the Government. And the sooner, to my mind, the misguided individuals who think that the Ministry have not or will not have the support of the people, realise the fact that they have and will continue to have the support of the people, the better for these individuals themselves.

I am in the same difficulty as Deputy Burke, who kindly said that I would deal in detail with this address, more fully than he did. I do not intend to do so. I did deal, to a certain extent in detail, with the Address on the last occasion, but I have not had a chance of doing it this time. I know that on the last occasion we had a very long debate. I think, as a matter of fact, the debate on the Address went on for several weeks. I do not think there is any need for dealing in detail with a subject like this. The only thing I would attempt to point out is this. We have the same Ministry that laid a programme before us in the last Dáil, and it is the same Ministry that is laying the programme before us in this Dáil. They have been vindicated, and I hope they will be in the position of carrying their present legislative programme into effect, as they did in the last Dáil.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Address by the Governor-General, which has been circulated as a Paper to the Dáil, has only been before the Dáil for thirty minutes. Consequently Deputies have not had an opportunity of reading the Address, and they cannot determine whether it is deserving of thanks or otherwise. I, therefore, beg to move the adjournment of the discussion on this motion until the next meeting of the Dáil.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I wish to second that.

Agreed.

Debate accordingly adjourned.

COUNTY COURTS (AMENDMENT) BILL, 1923.—FIRST STAGE.

MINISTER FOR HOME AFFAIRS

(Mr. Kevin O'Higgins): I move that the leave of the Dáil be granted to introduce a Bill to remove certain difficulties in relation to the holding of Quarter Sessions and Civil Bill Courts, and the service of certain documents relating thereto.

This Bill will be a temporary one. It is a purely provisional measure and it is framed to meet two administrative difficulties in the conduct of the Courts. The first is the impossibility of holding Courts at the accustomed place, the place named by Statute, owing to the destruction of the building, or for some other good and sufficient reason; the second is the impossibility of personal service of documents in the usual way, owing to the absence of suitable process servers, or some other cause, and it is proposed to legalise service by post. These provisions were contained in a temporary Act which we passed in the last Session which has now lapsed. I ask for leave to introduce the Bill to meet those two difficulties.

Capt. REDMOND: Perhaps the Minister will inform me, does this Bill only refer to the interregnum between now and the time that the Courts of Justice Bill shall become law?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: That is correct.

Motion agreed to.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: When will the Second Stage be taken?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: This may be regarded as an urgent Bill and it is already in print. I would be glad if the Second Stage could be taken the next day the Dáil meets.

Second Stage ordered for Wednesday, 10th October.

LICENSING (RENEWAL OF LICENCES) BILL, 1923.—FIRST STAGE.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I move for leave to introduce a Bill to validate certain licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors which have lapsed by non-renewal, and to give effect to certain transfers of such licences.

It is a small Bill dealing with the question of the renewal of licences. Owing to the absence of Petty Sessions Courts in September of last year, certain holders of licences were unable to obtain their annual renewal, and their licences lapsed technically. The District Justices this year were in the position that they could not grant a renewal of these licences. There was no licence to renew, strictly and legally. There were similar difficulties arising out of the disturbed conditions of the last few years, and this will be a short Bill to get over those difficulties and to enable the licences to be renewed by the District Justices. I anticipate the Bill will be non-controversial.

Motion agreed to. Second Stage ordered for Wednesday, October 10th.

SPECIAL COMMITTEES.

The PRESIDENT: I beg to move:

"Go n-iarrtar ar an gCoiste Rogh-nathóireachta nuair a bheid ag ainmniú ball chun fónamh ar Choistí Speisialta cuimhneamh ar chó-dhéanamh na Dála agus ar cháilíochta na mball a toghfar amach; agus go mbeidh combacht acu chun baill de Choistí do seur mara dtagaid chun na geruinníú agus chun baill eile do cheapa in ionad na mball a seuirfar."

"That it be an instruction to the Committee of Selection that, in nominating members to serve on Special Committees, they have regard to the composition of the Dáil and to the qualifications of members selected; and that they have power to discharge members of Committees in case of non-attendance, and to appoint others in substitution for those discharged."

I do not know whether the new Deputies have read the Standing Orders, but Standing Orders 63 and 64 will be complied with if this resolution be passed. I think there is general agreement in regard to the spirit of the resolution, that it is non-contentious and that it is purely a matter of facilitating the work without having to come to the Dáil regularly to get members appointed. The main question that ought to be considered in the selection of Committees is met here, and that is that the Committee of Selection, in appointing members, should have regard to the composition of the Dáil and the qualification of members for the particular work involved in any terms of reference that would be made.

MINISTER FOR FISHERIES (Mr. F. Lynch): I beg to second the motion.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: If I rightly understand the last sentence of this motion, it is that the Sessional Committee of Selection, without reference to the Dáil, will have power to discharge members from any committee nominated by that Committee of Selection, but appointed by the Dáil. That seems to be the intention from the wording of this motion. I would like to have it made clear if that is the intention. If it be the intention, I suggest it is a rather dangerous principle to adopt, seeing that the Committee of Selection in the first instance is nominated by this Dáil and it might very easily suggest to the Dáil the discharge of members of a Special Committee for non-attendance, but this Dáil should assume the responsibility for that discharge.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The terms of the motion imply that. In the case of non-attendance the Committee of Selection will have the power to discharge members and appoint others in substitution for those discharged. It has been found to work out well in another place, I think.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE AND PRIVILEGES.

The PRESIDENT: I beg to move:

"Go gceaptar Coiste ar a mbeidh aon Teachta déag, a ainmnoidh Coiste Roghnathóireachta an tSiosóin, mar Choiste ar Nós-Imeachta agus Príbhleáidí, go mbeidh sé de chomhaacht ag an gCoiste pé aguisíní agus leasuithe ar na Buan-Orduithe a cheapaíd a bheith riachtanach do mhola agus breithniú do dhéanamh agus tuarascabhaíl do thabhairt uatha i dtaobh na príbhleáidí atá ag Teachtaí Dháil Éireann; gur lear cúigear mar quorum."

"That a Committee, consisting of eleven Deputies to be nominated by the Sessional Committee of Selection, be appointed on Procedure and Privileges, that the Committee be empowered to recommend any additions and amendments to the existing Standing Orders that may be deemed necessary, and to consider and report as to the privileges attaching to Deputies of Dáil Éireann; that five constitute a quorum."

The terms of reference were already agreed to in the last Dáil, and I think there is general approval of the appointment of this Committee.

Mr. F. LYNCH: I beg to second the motion.

Mr. THOMAS JOHNSON: On this point, while I think this is a desirable course, I was under the impression that the Dáil decided on the last occasion that the Committee which was then elected would act as a Committee on Procedure and Privileges.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: What was decided at the last meeting of the Dáil was that the Committee elected to carry out the terms of Article 55 of the Constitution would be the Sessional Committee of Selection, which is a different matter.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING ORDERS FOR PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT: I beg to move:

"Go gceaptar Coiste ar a mbeidh chúig Teachtaí, a ainmnoidh Coiste Roghnathóireachta an tSiosóin, chun Dreach do Bhuan-Orduithe i gcóir rialuithe gnó Billí Príobháideacha d'ullamhú agus do chur os cóir na Dála agus go n-iarrtar ar an Seanad a chó-oiread ball den tSeanad do cheapa chun gníomhú ar an gCoiste seo."

"That a Committee consisting of five Deputies, to be nominated by the Sessional Committee of Selection, be appointed to prepare and submit Draft Standing Orders for the regulation of Private Bill Business, and that the Seanad be requested to appoint an equal number of members of the Seanad to act on this Committee."

I think that our experience in the last Dáil was that a Committee to deal with this particular matter was essential, and I think it would give general approval if this Committee were appointed without delay.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: A draft of Standing Orders for the regulation of Private Bill business has been prepared. A practising Barrister has been engaged in preparing these Standing Orders, and they were submitted during the last Dáil to a small Committee of Deputies and Senators nominated, in the one case, by our Committee on Procedure, and, in the other case, by the Standing Orders Committee of the Seanad. What is needed now is another Joint Committee to put the draft before us.

Motion put and agreed to.

HOUSE COMMITTEE.

The PRESIDENT: I beg to move:

“Go gceaptar Coiste ar a mbeidh trí Teachtaí, a ainmnoidh Coiste Roghna-thóireachta an tSiosóin, chun féachaint i ndiaidh na n-aiseanna laistigh is cóir a bheith ag Baill an Oireachtais agus chun Seomra an Bhídh do stiúrá, agus go n-iarrtar ar an Seanad a chó-oiread ball den tSeanad do cheapa chun gníomhú ar an gCoiste sin; gur leor mar quorum.”

“That a Committee consisting of three Deputies to be nominated by the Sessional Committee of Selection, be appointed to supervise the internal accommodation arrangements for the members of the Oireachtas and to control the Restaurant, and that the Seanad be requested to appoint an equal number of members of the Seanad to act on the said Committee.”

In the selection of this Committee, I am sure that the Sessional Committee of Selection will take into consideration the age and the peculiarities of the tastes of the particular Deputies who will be appointed, as well as the different parties from which they are drawn. I think it is the desire of all members of the Dáil that we should make the new Deputies comfortable. The old Deputies did not seem to suffer any disadvantages from the arrangements made in the old Dáil, but with new Deputies coming along it is quite possible that it might be necessary to make other arrangements.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Might I ask the President why it is necessary that this Committee should only consist of three Deputies, because if there are only three Deputies it cannot possibly represent every section of the Dáil. There is the Government Party, the Labour Party, the Farmers' Party and the Independents, and I think the President will agree that this is a Committee on which it is very necessary that every section of the Dáil should have a representative. I ask him, therefore, if he would not allow the Committee to consist of five Deputies instead of three. Even with the Seanad representatives that will not make it unwieldy in size, and will allow for two Government representatives, and one from each of the other sections of the Dáil.

The PRESIDENT: I have no objection.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is leave given to have the motion amended so that the Committee may consist of five Deputies?

Agreed.

Motion, as amended, put and agreed to.

SESSIONAL COMMITTEE OF SELECTION.

Mr. GOREY: Before the next Order is taken up, I would like to know what has been done about the Sessional Committee of Selection. It has not met, and I would like to know when and where it is to meet.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I understand that a meeting of the Committee is being called for 11.30 a.m. to-morrow. It was originally contemplated that it would meet this morning, but owing to the religious services held this morning it was thought that the meeting could not be held, and, therefore, no notices were sent out. It is proposed that the Committee should meet to-morrow morning at 11.30, if that would meet the convenience of Deputies, or if the Deputies on the Committee would meet immediately after the adjournment of the Dáil they could decide it themselves.

Captain REDMOND: Do I understand that notices have been sent out? It is most important that they should.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Notices have not been sent out. It was thought necessary to consult Deputies who are on the Committee this afternoon, and if 11.30 a.m. to-morrow suits them notices will be sent out.

Captain REDMOND: I suggest that notices should be sent out in future for every such meeting.

Mr. HUGHES: I suggest that the Committee should be asked to meet immediately the Dáil adjourns. I know that some Deputies cannot attend to-morrow at 11.30.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Notices are always sent out for meetings of Committees or for the summoning of which I am responsible. I am not responsible for the summoning of this Committee, and I rather deprecate the suggestion that notices which should have been sent out were not sent out. I can assure Deputy Captain Redmond that notices are always sent out for meetings which it is our business to summon. It is the business of Deputies appointed on this Committee to meet, and it is necessary to have a very full meeting, because the quorum is very high. It was therefore necessary to wait until this evening, when Deputies met together, in order to fix a proper time for the meeting.

Captain REDMOND: Might I suggest, sir, that you would exercise your great influence, if not ex cathedra at any rate outside, and have notices sent out for every meeting. I fully realise that you are not responsible in any way for this Committee.

Mr. D. J. GOREY: I agree to the suggestion of Deputy Hughes, that a meeting of this Committee might be convened for this evening. A fixture at 11.30 a.m. to-morrow would clash with a private meeting of our party. We can meet after the adjournment or even while the Dáil is sitting.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I understand that it is not the intention of the Government to proceed with the Committee stage of The Courts of Justice Bill this evening.

The PRESIDENT: That is so.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: In that case we will adjourn in five or ten minutes. If it would be more convenient for Deputies on the Committee to meet now in the Ministerial Committee Room upstairs, we will supply them with a Clerk, and they could proceed with the business at once, or fix a date for another meeting.

Mr. JOHNSON: Unless they are all present I suppose there cannot be a meeting as it was not called?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is so.

Vol. 5.

THE COURTS OF JUSTICE BILL, 1923.

The PRESIDENT: I move: "That item 9 on the Orders of the Day (The Courts of Justice Bill, 1923—Committee) be discharged and that it be inserted on the Orders of the Day for Wednesday next." I intended to move the adjournment of the Dáil this evening for a week as we are arranging conferences and otherwise are engaged in connection with the industrial unrest in the country. It appears to us that it would be better that we should be able to devote the whole of our time to try and find an accommodation which we hope will be satisfactory. I have called one meeting for this evening. It was not possible owing to other activities to have called it earlier. I intend if possible to have another meeting to-morrow and a third meeting, if it be possible, on Friday. For that reason I would ask that the Dáil should adjourn for a week. In that case we would not take up The Courts of Justice Bill until this day week.

Captain REDMOND: On that point may I ask if it will be possible to take further amendments now, in view of the fact that the Government has thought fit to postpone this Bill?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Certainly.

Captain REDMOND: It will be feasible then to accept further amendments. I might suggest that, as far as I am aware, very few people in the country are in great haste over this Bill, and I have seen it mentioned in the newspapers that the Attorney-General is about to take his place in the Dáil. If that is so, I would seriously suggest that it would be a good thing for the Dáil and the country if the Government could wait until the Attorney-General could be present here to take part in the discussion of the Bill, and give us the great benefit of his knowledge and experience in dealing with the legal aspects of this measure.

The PRESIDENT: I do not know that the Deputy is in a position to be as closely in touch with the general opinions throughout the country as I am. I made many pilgrimages through the country during the last few months. My impression is that there is a desire for this Bill, but, apart from that desire, the Constitution is not yet complete without it. This matter has been before the country for some time. It was objected to in the last Dáil that it should be rushed, but I would say that, even in the case of measures which, perhaps, were hastened in the last Dáil, there was at all times—it may be admitted by all Deputies—very fair and considerate expressions from Ministers with regard to recommendations made about the Bills. I do not know that the Deputy is quite aware of the fact that there was very serious misgiving in certain parts of the country that this question had not been dealt with earlier, and many representations were made to us on that point. There was in general, I think, the impression that we intended to act in good faith and that the delays were not unreasonable. Even since the Bill had been introduced very little criticism or suggestions which would improve the measure have come from the business people on whose behalf application was made that the Bill should be postponed. I think there have not been material recommendations from them, and I think the Deputy will be satisfied when it is considered here that it will get very fair consideration, and it should not appear necessary to wait until any other legal gentlemen are returned to the Dáil. I think the legal gentlemen in the last Dáil were surprised at the ability with which measures were dealt with by those who have not had any association with the law.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would like to ask the President to give the Dáil some indication of what is to be the course of business.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think we have to settle what we have to do about the Committee Stage of this Bill before we take up that question. Am I to take it that the Committee Stage is to be taken on Wednesday next?

Committee Stage postponed to Wednesday, the 10th October.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE DAIL.

COURSE OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT: I move the adjournment until Wednesday next at 3 o'clock.

Mr. FINIAN LYNCH: I second the motion.

Mr. JOHNSON: The adjournment from to-day until this day week involves, as I gather, a discussion, first on the motion of Deputy Burke, the Second Reading Stage of the two Bills which have just been introduced by the Minister for Home Affairs, and the Committee Stage of the Courts of Justice Bill. I want to ask the President if he can give the Dáil some indication of what his intentions are regarding the course of business. Dáil members were given to understand that they were to come to-day presumably to carry on business, but now they may go back to the country, and that, of course, as the Minister for Finance would know if he were here, involves a considerable amount of expense. If they have to come on Wednesday, I think they would like to know if they have to go back on Thursday, and if it is to be one day a week session, and also if it is the intention to carry on continuously, say, until Christmas, in dealing with the various Bills mentioned in the Address which has been laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT: I think I would be able to promise two days' business next week and the following week, and I think it is possible that we may then have to ask for an adjournment. The course of business next week would be the consideration of the two Bills which have just been given First Reading. The third item, I think, would be the Courts of Justice Bill. I should say that the whole of the evening will be given to it. On Thursday the Courts of Justice Bill, if it survives, will be taken up, and also on Friday, and it may be possible to sandwich in during these hours, the debate on the Governor-General's speech. I take it members would like an opportunity of reading that speech fully, as many matters of legislation are dealt with in it, and I suppose the policy of the Government will be open to criticism upon it. I think it is reasonable that members should have an opportunity of studying it before making any statement.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: When will the Debate on the Governor-General's speech be resumed and how many days will be allotted to its consideration?

The PRESIDENT: In the last Dáil, at no time during its existence did we move the closure. Every subject got the fullest consideration, and we hope to be able to afford the same facilities in this Dáil, so that members will have an opportunity of discussing the Address to their heart's content.

The Dáil adjourned at 4 p.m. until Wednesday, October 10th, at 3 p.m.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.

ORAL ANSWERS.

PERMANENT ACCOMMODATION FOR OIREACHTAS.

Major BRYAN R. COOPER asked the President whether any further steps have been taken to provide permanent accommodation for the Oireachtas.

The PRESIDENT: The answer is in the negative. The Deputy may not be aware that a Committee of both Houses was formed during the last Dáil to put up proposals on this matter, but they failed to come to any agreement, and the question has been left in abeyance since then.

It is my intention so soon as the exigencies of the situation permit to take up the matter again.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: In view of the fact that the Committee appointed did not come to a decision because of the shortness of time at its disposal, before the end of the Session, would the President consider the establishment of a joint Committee of both Houses to deal with this matter?

The PRESIDENT: The facts are not quite as stated. It was not the shortness of time that was responsible for the Committee not coming to a decision as far as I am aware, because the time was extended and I was informed that there was very little likelihood of any report being presented. That was backed by a majority of those forming the Committee.

BOARD OF WORKS LOANS.

MICHEAL O hIFEARNAIN asked the Minister for Finance whether, in view of the depressed condition of agriculture, the loans formerly granted to farmers by the Board of Works for the erection of haysheds, etc., will not again be made available for such purposes.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. E. Blythe): I regret that the financial position does not yet permit of the resumption of the issue of local loans by the Board of Works.

EX-BRITISH SOLDIER'S PENSION.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Finance whether he is aware that the British War Pension Department have reduced the pension paid to Mrs. Gertrude Guerrine, 5 Charlemont Mall, and her child, from 11s. 6d. weekly to 3s. 6d. weekly; whether he is aware that this woman's husband, Geoffrey Guerrine, served in Mesopotamia, India and Palestine, for four and a-half years, and was discharged suffering from malaria and bronchitis, and is now in Grangegorman Mental Hospital under the care of Doctor C. Costello, Assistant Medical Officer, who certifies that Geoffrey Guerrine is suffering from "Acute Melancholia, following on the stress of War Service"; if he is aware that the Pensions Appeal Tribunal have rejected the appeal against the reduction; to ask that steps be taken to protect this woman and other citizens of the Free State similarly treated.

Mr. E. BLYTHE: As I stated in reply to a question asked by Deputy Byrne on the 25th September, the administration of British Military pensions is not a matter in which the Government of the Irish Free State is officially concerned. The general representations then made by the Deputy on the subject were duly brought to the notice of the British Authorities in accordance with the undertaking which I gave to this effect. It is not possible for me to pursue inquiry in individual cases affecting a branch of administration for which I am in no way responsible.

Mr. A. BYRNE: Arising out of the answer I would like to draw the Minister's attention to the fact that there is another point which arises in this question, and it is that in view of the fact that the woman's husband fought in the Great War and is now an inmate of the Richmond Asylum, and that his upkeep is a charge on the ratepayers of Dublin, will he not consider that point and make some representation to the British War Pension Department? This woman has only 3/6 a week for herself and her child—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy must not make a speech on the matter.

Mr. BYRNE: It is a matter for the Local Government Department.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy can put down a question on the matter to the Minister for Local Government, when that Minister is appointed.

INTERMEDIATE TEACHERS' INTERIM GRANT.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Education whether he will state what amount was voted in respect of the year 1922-23 as an interim grant for intermediate teachers; what amount has actually been paid to the teachers, and what sum is claimed by the Intermediate Board by way of expenses in distributing the grant.

MINISTER for FISHERIES (Mr. F. Lynch) for Minister for Education: The amount voted as Interim Grant was £63,000.

The distribution of this grant is not yet complete. The amount paid to teachers to date is £54,785.

No sum has yet been claimed by the Intermediate Board by way of expenses of distributing the grant. The cost of distribution is estimated at £100.

THE JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

Mr. JOHN GOOD asked the Minister for Home Affairs if he will issue a detailed financial statement shewing:—

(a) The estimated cost of salaries, pensions, and other expenses necessary in connection with the establishment of the proposed Judicial System;

(b) The annual cost of the present Judicial System.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. K. O'Higgins): I shall endeavour to arrange with the Minister for Finance for the issue within the next few days of a statement on the lines suggested by the Deputy. I cannot, however, promise that the part of the statement which will deal with the estimated cost of the proposed future system will be detailed. The Deputy will realise that it is a sufficiently difficult task to forecast, with precision, the future cost of even an existing system: the difficulty is, of course, very much greater when an attempt is made to estimate for a totally new system. A rough estimate has, however, already been made from which it would appear that the new system will be substantially more economical than the present system.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I was about to ask a question supplementary to this. Would the Minister for Home Affairs put the Dáil in possession of these calculations, and state exactly to what extent these economies would apply to which he refers in his answer?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I stated in the answer that it was extremely difficult to make anything in the nature of an exact forecast, but that I would endeavour to arrange with the Minister for Finance to issue a statement on the lines suggested by Deputy Good. The statement will be as ample as it is possible to make it, having regard to the other difficulties.

OBSTRUCTION BY PICKETS.

MICHEAL O h-IFERNAIN asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether he is aware that farmers from the Balingarry district of the County Tipperary were obstructed and prevented from selling their live stock by strike pickets at the fair of Kilkenny, on September 12th, and at the fair of Callan on September 19th; whether adequate steps will be taken to prevent a recurrence of such obstruction and interference, in order that the farmers in question may be free to carry on their ordinary avocations.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Adequate forces of the Garda Síochána were on duty, both at the fair of Kilkenny on the 12th ultimo, and the fair of Callan on the 19th ultimo. No complaint was made to them of any illegal interference or intimidation, nor did they observe any. My information is that pickets were present but acted in a peaceful manner, and within their legal rights.

ENNIS LADY KIDNAPPED.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether he has any information to give as to the kidnapping of an old lady, Mrs. Crowe, Moyresk, Ennis, on the 23rd ultimo, by armed men; whether her place of detention is known to the authorities; whether any arrests have been made in connection with the outrage, and if so, whether it is intended to bring them to trial; further, to ask whether, in view of the gravity of the outrage, it is proposed to take special precautions to meet this form of crime.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Mrs. Crowe, of Moyresk, Ennis, was kidnapped by masked men on the morning of the 24th ultimo, and released on Saturday night, the 29th idem. No arrests have yet been made. As police inquiries are proceeding, it is not considered desirable to state the action which it is intended to take in this case.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: Is the Minister for Home Affairs aware that this lady was held to ransom for a sum of something like £200?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I am aware that an offer or intimation to that effect was made to some solicitor. I think that it is not in the public interest that I should make any fuller statement on the matter than I have made.

CORK ROAD WORKERS— QUESTION OF INSURANCE.

TADHG O MURCHADA asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce whether he is aware that grave hardship is caused to the road workers of County Cork by the failure of the Cork County Council to stamp the Unemployment Insurance Cards of the road workers, and whether he will state what steps are contemplated to protect the interests of such workers under the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1923.

MINISTER for INDUSTRY and COMMERCE (Mr. J. McGrath): I have been aware for some time that the Cork County Council had failed to pay contributions under the Unemployment Insurance Acts in respect of their insurable employees. My Department has had some correspondence with the Council on the subject of the payment of contributions, but as non-compliance with the Acts continued, evidence has been prepared with a view to legal proceedings which will be taken in due course.

ARREARS OF RENT.

CONCHUBHAIR O CONGHAILE asked the Minister for Agriculture whether it is intended to introduce legislation to amend the Sections of the Land Act, 1923, dealing with the arrears of rent; whether, in the case of tenants against whom decrees have recently been obtained, the same terms will be given as to those who were not proceeded against; further, what is the intention in regard to costs of the decrees.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. P. Hogan): The answer to the first part of the question is in the negative.

Sub-section (5) of Section 10 appears to meet the point referred to in the second part of the question. It provides that any money, whether rent, costs, or expenses, levied or recovered by a landlord on or after 3rd July, 1923, shall, in so far as it exceeds what ever would have been due as Compounded Arrears of Rent, be credited towards any sums subsequently payable by the tenant on that head.

MOTOR TAX DISTRIBUTION.

Mr. THOMAS O'MAHONY asked the Minister for Local Government whether, as a large amount of the Motor Tax is derived from car owners in urban areas, and as Urban Councils are the road authorities in such areas, and also contribute to the main roads in the rural areas of their county, steps shall be taken to allocate to these Councils their fair share of the fund raised from this tax, and which is now being distributed for road improvement to County and Borough Councils only.

Mr. E. BLYTHE: There is no power under existing law to make grants from the Road Fund direct to Urban District Councils as such.

Grants made to County Councils for road improvement should ordinarily be accessible to Urban District Councils within the county, if such Councils have roads within their areas of the class for which grants are made.

RATE COLLECTOR'S PENSION.

SEOIRSE DE BHULBH asked the Minister for Local Government whether he will reconsider the refusal of his Department to approve the pension granted by the Kildare County Council of £250 to Mr. E. A. Coonan, Rate Collector, after 31½ years of excellent service, in view of the fact that pensions granted to an official after 10 years' service, and to many others throughout the country, have been ratified.

Mr. BLYTHE: There is no statutory power to grant a pension to a rate collector whose whole time was not devoted to the services of a local authority. When application was made by the County Council for sanction to the pension awarded to Mr. Coonan, it was stated that whilst an officer of the Council he did not devote his whole time to the service of the county.

There is no power to enable the Minister for Local Government to waive the statutory regulations in this respect.

Mr. WOULFE: Arising out of that question, may I ask the Minister for Local Government if pensions have not been sanctioned to other rate collectors who are only part-time officers and who have had much less service?

Mr. BLYTHE: No.

Mr. WOULFE: I was given to understand that there were, and I was given the names of the people.

CROOM COUNCIL'S COMPLAINT.

P. MAC FLANNCHADHA asked the Minister for Local Government whether his attention has been called to the complaint of the Croom District Council respecting the failure of the District Medical Officer to attend a sick child, and whether he is aware that the District Council, on 31st May, requested that an Inspector of the Department should be sent to hold a sworn enquiry into the matter, and whether any action has been taken thereon.

Mr. BLYTHE: I am aware of all the facts in connection with this case, and having carefully investigated them, I do not consider that a sworn inquiry is necessary.

The medical officer referred to accepted a ticket presented by the child's father for attendance on the child. After the medical officer had accepted the ticket he was assaulted by the father, for which the latter was summoned and fined by the District Justice. The conduct of the father prevented the medical officer from acting on the ticket. His failure, however, to attend to the case has been noted. The Limerick County Board of Health have been informed of the decision arrived at in this case.

POSTAL FACILITIES IN BANDON.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that, in Bandon, Co. Cork, there is now only one delivery of letters daily, and as such an arrangement is the cause of considerable inconvenience whether he will arrange for a second delivery of letters daily.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. J. J. Walsh): The matter is receiving consideration, and it is hoped that it will be possible to arrange at an early date for a second delivery, at least in the business portion of the town. The question of affording a later day mail despatch from Bandon is also receiving attention.

REPORT OF POSTAL COMMISSION.

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Postmaster-General what is the cause of the delay in the publication of the Report of the Postal Commission.

Mr. WALSH: The Report is in the hands of the Minister for Finance, to whom the Deputy should refer for further information.

BARRACK FURNITURE.

LIAM O DAIMHIN asked the Minister for Defence if he is in a position to state whether the military authorities have been furnished with a complete list of barrack furniture and other property handed over to them by the British army authorities previous to their evacuation of this country, if he is aware that a considerable quantity of such property was stolen or taken from many barracks previous to June 28th, 1922, if he can state how much of such stolen property has been recovered, whether the loss of such property or the renewal of same is to be a charge upon the general taxpayers of the Saorstát, and if he can state what steps he has already taken or intends to take in order to recover the property of the citizens.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (Gen. Mulcahy): Complete lists of barrack furniture and other property handed over to us by the British army authorities, previous to their evacuation of the country, are in our possession. I am aware that a considerable quantity of such property was stolen and destroyed by Irregulars prior to June 28th, 1922. It is not possible to state the comparative amount of such stolen or destroyed property. The loss of this property is loss to the State. It will be understood that it is undesirable to state what steps have already been taken, or it is intended to take, in order to recover whatever amount of this property may yet be recoverable. A certain amount of it has already been recovered.

A CO. KILDARE ARREST.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that, on the 7th July, 1922, Joseph Ennis was arrested near Prosperous, Co. Kildare, by a party of military, under the command of Patrick Hannon, O.C., Edenderry, who also retained his bicycle, a new Royal Enfield, value £12 10s.; that no charge has since been preferred against him; to ask that Ennis be released and his bicycle returned to him or compensation paid for same.

General MULCAHY: Joseph Ennis, of Clonecurry, Enfield, was arrested on the 20th July, 1922, on strong suspicion of actively assisting a local Irregular column. His bicycle was taken from him. In view of present conditions arrangements are being made for his release, and enquiries are being made with regard to the bicycle.

SEIZURE OF BICYCLE AND CAMERA.

TOMAS MAC EOIN asked the Minister for Defence if he will give instructions for the return to the owner without further delay of the bicycle and camera which were taken from Mr. Charles Ridgway, Organiser, Irish Transport and General Workers' Union, at Ballybay, in July, 1922, and which have been the subject of repeated unsuccessful applications to the Claims Branch of the Quartermaster-General's Department, or if the articles cannot be returned, give instructions for compensation to be paid for them.

General MULCAHY: The matter will be dealt with with the least possible further delay.

SOLDIERS KILLED IN KERRY.

TOMAS MAC EOIN asked the Minister for Defence whether any decision has yet been reached in the matter of bringing to Dublin for burial the bodies of soldiers killed on active service in Kerry, which he stated in the Dáil, on August 3rd, to be receiving sympathetic consideration.

General MULCAHY: A decision has not yet been taken in the matter.

MILITARY MEAT CONTRACTS.

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Minister for Defence what is the price of beef and mutton per pound supplied to the Dublin Command, and also the price of meat per pound, including cost of delivery, supplied by the Dublin Command to the barracks in the Midlands; whether tenders were invited by advertisement, so as to give an opportunity to the local victuallers of competing, and whether it is the intention of the Minister to continue to supply all barracks in the Midlands from the Dublin Command, and further to ask if he can state the amount of money saved on the meat supply since the arrangements were made.

General MULCAHY: The cost of beef supplied from the Army Abbatoir is between 7d. and 8d. per pound, and the cost of mutton between 1s. and 1s. 1d. per pound. Its delivery at Mullingar barracks, which is the only barracks in the Midlands supplied, is about $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per pound.

Tenders were invited by advertisement for supplies to that barracks and were received, but as the Quartermaster-General was satisfied that tendering was not free and unrestricted, no tender was accepted, and he considered it advisable for the time being to supply meat from the Army Abbatoir. Money is not being saved at the moment by this arrangement.

Mr. LYONS: Is the Minister aware that in the Mullingar Mental Hospital tenders have been received for meat at 5d. per lb., and that there would be more employment by keeping the contract locally, and that owing to what has happened in this matter in Mullingar three men have lost their employment. That is why I raised the matter.

General MULCAHY: It will be understood that it is absolutely necessary that there should be competitive tenders for supplies, or that tendering for supplies should be free and unrestricted. In the case of Mullingar it was not.

Mr. DAVIN: Can the Minister say why tenders for these supplies are not advertised for in the provincial papers?

General MULCAHY: I understood that they were, but I will have enquiries made. At any rate they were fully advertised in the daily press, which will reach all the tradesmen who are likely to tender.

A TAILOR'S CLAIM.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he has had inquiries made (as promised by him during the debate on the Appropriation Bill on the 30th July) regarding the claim of Mr. Samuel L'Amie for payment for 466 hours worked as a tailor in Newbridge Barracks, and whether he will give orders that this man be paid his wages, so long overdue, at once.

General MULCAHY: Mr. L'Amie's claim has been under consideration, and it has been decided to pay him as a civilian employee at the local standard rate for a tailor at Newbridge. Application has been made to Mr. L'Amie for the return of a time book in which is recorded the number of hours worked and the nature of the work performed by him. As soon as this book is received the claim will be settled.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

DUBLIN MAN'S ARREST.

TOMAS MAC EOIN asked the Minister for Defence whether any charge has been preferred against John Healy, of 32 North King Street, Dublin, who was arrested on the 3rd July, and who signed the usual form of undertaking some considerable time ago, and, if not, whether he will state if there is any possibility of his being released at an early date.

General MULCAHY: John Healy was arrested on the 2nd July last and was charged before a military tribunal with illegal possession of a quantity of arms and ammunition. It appears that he was caretaker of, and had the key of, premises in which he was aware that the arms and ammunition in question were concealed.

In view of present conditions, arrangements are being made for his release.

PRISONERS IN MOUNTJOY.

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that Joseph Fagan, James Fagan, and Christopher Corren, from Streete, Westmeath, were arrested on the 14th July, 1923, and are still detained in D Wing, Mountjoy Prison, and have not yet been charged or tried; whether he would state the reason for their detention; and further, if he is aware that two of the said prisoners are married, with helpless families, who are destitute owing to the detention of the prisoners; and further, to ask that these prisoners be immediately released.

General MULCAHY: Joseph Fagan, James Fagan and Christopher Curran were arrested on very strong suspicion of illegal interference with the Kilmore Estate in County Westmeath. They were believed to have been responsible for threatening letters received by the trustees on that estate; for the spiking of meadows, and for the opening of gates on to the roadway so as to allow cattle to escape. In addition, Curran made lettings of lands, to which he had no legal title, to others, so that the owner was deprived of the use of them.

The institution of proceedings against these men is at present under consideration, and in the meantime their release cannot be considered.

COMPENSATION FOR COMMANDEERED MOTOR CAR.

LIAM O DAIMHIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that the Military Authorities at Durrow, Leix, commandeered a new Ford motor car, which was the property of Edward Dollard, Rathdowney, Leix, in July, 1922; whether same was used for the purpose of removing heavy loads of furniture, and, subsequently, returned to him in a useless condition; whether he has received a claim for compensation for the destruction of this car, and if he can state when he will be in a position to dispose of this claim.

General MULCAHY: Mr. Dollard's car was commandeered from the 1st to the 3rd July, 1922, for the purpose of conveying military stores from Rath-

downey to Durrow. Inasmuch as it appears that Mr. Dollard had purchased it about a month previously for about £42 10s., and that when taken by troops the glass screen and the hood were damaged and the engine had to be put in running order, the car cannot be regarded as having been new at the time. A claim for repairs, hire, and consequential loss has been received and will be considered at an early date.

RELIEVING OFFICER'S PENSION.

LIAM O DAIMHIN asked the Minister for Local Government whether he has received repeated applications from the Laoighis Hospital and Homes Co. Committee, asking him to sanction payment of a pension to Mr. Denis Molloy, Cloneygowan, late Relieving Officer in the Mountmellick Union, and if he can now state the reason for the delay in giving sanction for the pension to which this man is entitled since October, 1921.

Mr. E. BLYTHE: The pension awarded to Mr. Molloy is governed by the provisions of Section 11 (4) of the Local Government (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1923. As the Laoighis County Council did not dispute within the prescribed time the amount of the allowance granted to him, he is legally entitled to receive that amount from the County Council, on whom the liabilities of the former Boards of Guardians in the county devolve. Sanction to the payment of the allowance is not necessary. The County Board of Health were written to this effect in June and September.

OLD AGE PENSION (CORK).

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Local Government whether he is aware that the claim of Owen Wade, Barrack Hill, Clonakilty, Co. Cork, for an old age pension, although twice passed by the Clonakilty Sub-Pensions Committee, has been disallowed, whether he is aware that claimant is totally blind, and is aged 68 years, and whether he is aware that the claim is a most deserving one, and whether he will state the grounds on which the claim has been disallowed.

Mr. BLYTHE: The claim of Owen Wade, MacCurtain's Hill, Clonakilty, to the pension under the Blind Persons Act has been twice passed by the Clonakilty Pension Sub-Committee. Appeals against the decisions were lodged by the Pension Officer, on the ground of insufficient evidence of blindness.

The first claim was passed by the Sub-Committee on the 11th January, 1923, but was disallowed on the 9th February, 1923, on appeal on the medical evidence then submitted.

The second claim was passed by the Sub-Committee on the 21st September. The appeal, received on the 27th September, is under investigation. A special medical examination of the claimant's eyesight will be made as soon as practicable.

A baptismal certificate has been produced which shows that the claimant was baptised on the 6th June, 1856, and is eligible on age for the blind pension.

CLERKS OF DISTRICT COURTS.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether any permanent appointments of Clerks of District Courts have yet been made.

Mr. K. O'HIGGINS: The permanent appointments of Clerks of District Courts have not yet been made. It would not be possible to make such permanent appointments because the Act under which the office is created and held (District Justices Temporary Provisions Act, 1923) is itself limited in duration to one year and expires next March.

RESIGNED R.I.C.

Mr. PATRICK J. EGAN asked the Minister for Finance whether he is aware that three brothers, Andrew, Thomas, and William Colgan, of Rahan, Tullamore, resigned from the late R.I.C. force, through national sympathies, in June, July, and October, 1920, after 8½, 11, and 14½ years' service, respectively; that a Commission was appointed by the Government in November to inquire into such cases, and that they were amongst the number whose cases were approved by the Commission as being entitled to pensions or compensation, and, that, up to now, they have received no such pensions or compensation; whether, in view of the fact that they are in very straitened circumstances, being unable to get work and having been refused admission to the Civic Guard, although passed as medically fit, he will take steps to have them speedily granted the pensions or compensation to which they are entitled, and, furthermore, whether he cannot throw open vacancies in the Civic Guard to them and other men in similar circumstances?

Mr. E. BLYTHE: Regulations governing the grant of pensions, allowances or gratuities to such ex-members of the R.I.C. whose resignations or dismissals are certified in the manner prescribed by the Superannuation and Pensions Act, 1923, are at present under consideration, and I am not in a position to give any information regarding the grant of individual pensions. As regards those portions of the question dealing with admission to the Civic Guard, I would suggest that the Deputy should address them to the Minister for Home Affairs.

MICHEAL O HIFERNAIN asked the Minister for Finance when the pensions which are to be, or have been granted to the ex-members of the R.I.C. who resigned from that force for national reasons during the pre-Truce period will be paid, and whether any arrangements have been made for the relief of those ex-members of the R.I.C. who may be in need owing to the delay in granting those pensions.

Mr. BLYTHE: No pensions can be granted to ex-members of the R.I.C. who resigned or were dismissed from that force on account of their national sympathies until the regulations prescribed by the Superannuation and Pensions Act, 1923, have been approved by resolution of this House. The regulations are at present under consideration.

MICHEAL O HIFERNAIN asked the Minister for Finance whether, in the interests of economy, it is the intention of the Government that employment be found in Government services for ex-members of the Royal Irish Constabulary who resigned their positions for national reasons, at salaries which would place them in positions at least equal financially to those which they vacated.

Mr. E. BLYTHE: In framing regulations under the Superannuation and Pensions Act, 1923, due regard will be had to possible reduction of pension charge in the event of a pensioner entering Government employment.

A TULLAMORE DECREE.

Mr. PATRICK J. EGAN asked the Minister for Finance whether he is aware that, in the case of James Healion, Sragh, Tullamore, applicant, versus King's County Council, respondents, a decree was awarded to applicant by the County Court Judge for £61 10s., including costs and expenses, on the 29th May, 1920, which decree was appealed to by the County Council, the appeal being heard at the Assizes on the 1st July, 1920, same being affirmed and the amount increased to £168 0s. 11d., including costs; furthermore, that the decree was duly lodged with the County Council for collection and payment in the ordinary way, the decree being destroyed with others in the burning of Tullamore Courthouse, in July, 1922, a declaration as to its existence and destruction having been filed in the Ministry of Finance and that the claim has not yet been paid, can he state when it will be paid?

Mr. E. BLYTHE: Defended decrees for damage to property sustained within the pre-Truce period are dealt with for payment as far as possible according to priority of the date of damage. In the case referred to by the Deputy the damage occurred in May, 1920, and the full amount of the decree would have been paid in the ordinary course some weeks ago but for the exceptional difficulty experienced in establishing the fact of defence. This difficulty was due to the destruction of the County Court Records when the Tullamore Court House was burnt, but has now been overcome. It is hoped to include the decree in a schedule of cases to be advertised for payment towards the end of the present month and to complete payment at a very early date after publication.

WRIT FOR DUBLIN CITY SOUTH.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The following is a notice of the issue of a writ for Dublin City South:—

TUARASGABHAIL I DTAOBH CUR AMACH RITEACH I GCOIR BAILE ATHA CLIATH THEAS.

REPORT AS TO ISSUE OF WRIT FOR DUBLIN SOUTH.

I gcó-líona Buan-Ordú 120 de Bhuan-Orduithe Dháil Éireann tá orm a thuairisciú gur dhineas ar an 3ad Deire Foghmhair, ar ordú on gCeann Comhairle agus do réir na bhforálacha ina thaobh san atá san Acht Timpeal Toghachán, 1923, mo rit do chur amach go dtí Loreán Scarlóg, Ceann Comhairimh, chun ball do thogha don fholúntas atá in ionadaíocht Dáilcheanntar Buirge Bhaile Atha Cliath Theas sa Dáil.

In compliance with Standing Order, No. 120 of the Standing Orders of Dáil Éireann, I have to report that on the 3rd October, on the direction of the Ceann Comhairle, and pursuant to the relative provisions of the Electoral Act, 1923, I issued to Mr. Lorean G. Sherlock, Returning Officer, my writ for the election of a member to fill the existing vacancy in the representation in the Dáil of the Borough Constituency of Dublin South.

(Sgd.) COLM O MURCHADHA.

PROCEDURE.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Before we enter upon the Orders of the Day, there is one matter I would like to raise which would be for the convenience of the Dáil, I think. It will be in your memory that I raised the same matter in the last Dáil on one or two occasions. On to-day's Orders I notice that item 5 deals with the Governor-General's address—there is a motion for a resolution of thanks—and then there are various matters in connection with the Courts of Justice Bill. Inasmuch as there is no definite information before the Dáil as to how long item 5 will occupy our time, Deputies have no method of ascertaining whether items

6 or 7 are likely to arise. Would it not be convenient to enter upon item 5 at, say, about 4 o'clock, and deal with the other items later? A time could be arranged so that whether this earlier business has or has not been concluded, it can be postponed. Then Deputies would be able to know at what hour certain business in which they are interested will be entered upon.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The allocation of time is a matter for the President.

The PRESIDENT: It has been the practice up to this to suit the convenience of Deputies with regard to the Agenda, or any business that has been brought forward. For example, it will be within the recollection of Deputies that certain votes were postponed or allotted to certain days in order to suit the convenience of Deputies.

In that case, unless there was pressing Government business, business pressing by reason of special circumstances, it was not insisted on taking the Agenda in the order in which it was arranged. It was left generally to the Dáil, but, personally, I would prefer if the item on the Order Paper, No. 5, came before the Dáil that it would be only for a short period, limited, say, to half an hour, and that we should then take up item No. 6, or what Deputy Milroy calls the more serious business.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It would be better, I think, to say that item No. 6 would arise at a particular time, because if what the President wishes were agreed on, that item might come on before 6 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT: If the Deputy has an appointment for any particular hour, and if he would tell us the time that the appointment is likely to occupy, we would do our best to convenience him. But if, on the other hand, he has no particular appointment, I would suggest that we allow half an hour for discussion on item No. 5.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: The President will be relieved to learn that I have no appointment. I was merely choosing this as an occasion to raise a matter that, I believe, would be for the convenience of the Dáil. I am merely raising it now because this is the first time in which this has occurred in this Session. I, therefore, suggest that certain definite business should be set down on the Orders for the Day at a certain time, and if earlier business has not been disposed of at such a particular hour, then we would be in a position to know exactly at what hour of the day certain definite business is to be entered upon.

The PRESIDENT: I would like to consult the Government Whip on that matter.

Mr. JOHNSON: I do not know what is the view of the Minister as to the relative importance of these matters on the Agenda, but I would have thought that a motion dealing with the Governor-General's address, which, of course, may be regarded as a declaration of Government policy, ought to be allocated something like a reasonable period of time for discussion. To suggest half an hour for a discussion on such a motion strikes me as rather slighting both the Governor-General, the mover of the Address, and the Dáil.

The PRESIDENT: I did not mean to limit the discussion on that particular subject to half an hour, but I think Deputy Johnson will recollect that last year it formed the subject of business for a considerable number of days, and it is our intention to allot ample time for discussion on it. The other matter is one of pressing importance, but there is no desire to bring it into relative comparison, in the matter of importance, with the motion of thanks on the Governor-General's address.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Would the President take up item No. 6 at 5.30, or would he prefer to take it earlier?

The PRESIDENT: 5.30 will suit.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Very well. Is it agreed that item No. 6 will be taken up at 5.30?

Mr. JOHNSON: I do not know what the line of discussion will take on these other items, but it seems to me to be [Mr. Johnson.] relegating the discussion on the Governor-General's Address, which will really be a discussion on Government policy, to the background, and I would not participate in the discussion in these circumstances.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: As there is not agreement, the adjournment of the debate on No. 5 can be moved when it is thought fit to do so.

FRIDAY SITTINGS.

The PRESIDENT: It will be remembered that in the last Dáil it was put up to us that it interfered very much with the convenience of Deputies living considerable distances away from the city to have an adjournment at 8.30 on Friday evenings, and the request was put forward that we should meet at 12 o'clock on Fridays. We agreed to that request, and if the same substantial body of the Deputies is in favour of an early sitting on Fridays we propose to facilitate them, and to move that, until otherwise ordered, the Dáil will assemble on Fridays at 12 o'clock, noon, and adjourn at 4 p.m.; private business to be taken at 2 p.m.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The order will be that the Dáil will meet at 12 o'clock, noon, on Fridays, and adjourn at 4 p.m., private business on the Order Paper to be taken at 2 p.m.

THE INDUSTRIAL SITUATION.

The PRESIDENT: I would ask for permission to make a short statement on the industrial situation. As I stated at the last meeting of the Dáil, we have been engaged for the past week in investigating, with those qualified to advise us, remedies for our present industrial difficulties. We have found that the matters to be considered are very wide in scope and that strong opinions are held on them by the various parties whose interests are affected. It will be necessary to devote more time to this question before a definite solution is achieved, but we have already progressed towards an understanding, and I am confident that peace and moderation will before long prevail. Special attention is being paid to the problem of the cost of living, particularly in the larger towns and cities, and it is evident that all parties recognise this to be one of the essential points on which adjustments are necessary. Recently the price of bread in Dublin has been reduced, and I am hopeful that reductions in the prices of other essential commodities will shortly follow.

In all the consideration we have been giving to the industrial position, one great obstacle to an early adjustment has presented itself, and that is the trouble at the ports. This stoppage of work has had a paralysing effect on trade, and until the ports are again fully open no settlement designed to promote commerce and industry can take practical effect. The position at some ports is worse than that at others. Where the position is exceptionally grave various intermediaries, members of the Dáil and others, have exerted themselves to bring about a settlement that would relieve hardship and distress. They report, however, that there is little prospect of progress being made at present except on a national basis, and so the Minister for Industry and Commerce, in view of the information he has received and with grateful appreciation of the services of those intermediaries in the cause of peace, is communicating to both parties to the dispute a proposal designed to secure an immediate opening of all the ports and a detailed investigation into this question of dock labour in an atmosphere conducive to reliable conclusions.

The proposal which the Minister for Industry and Commerce is making is, briefly, as follows:—

1. That on resumption of work there should be a reduction in wages of 1s. per day, with consequential reductions in tonnage and overtime rates and in the wages of men who have previously followed the settlements relating to dock labour.
2. That the Minister, in the exercise of his powers under Part II of the Industrial Courts Act, 1919, should, as soon as possible after the resumption of work, set up a Court of Inquiry to report on this question of dock labour.

The proposal to set up a Court of Inquiry is particularly appropriate, since I understand that the practice under which questions relating to dock labour are now dealt with on a national basis originated from the report of a Court of Inquiry which sat in London some years ago. We are now independent of Great Britain in these matters, and it is right and proper that we should now adopt our own enquiries for ourselves with a view to such arrangements as the circumstances of our own case require.

If these proposals are accepted, they will re-open the ports and enable our Christmas trade, which is soon beginning, to be conducted in a normal way. For the future, the Court of Inquiry may be trusted to make such recommendations as will safeguard the interests of all concerned. I would deprecate any detailed discussion of the matter now, but I trust that the feeling of the Dáil is in favour of the Minister's proposals which I have outlined and which, without any excessive sacrifice on either side, will terminate a deplorable situation.

MINISTERS AND SECRETARIES BILL—FIRST STAGE.

The PRESIDENT: I am scarcely ready to move for leave to introduce this Bill unless it were to be understood that the second reading should not take place for a fortnight. If so long an interval is not desired, then I would propose to leave the matter over, and give notice of the introduction of the Bill for another day.

Mr. JOHNSON: Would it not be better, if the formalities have been

i. Do ceapadh an Coiste do réir Rúin do rith an Dáil ar an 20adh Meán Fhómhair, 1923, mar leanas:—

“Go dtoghtar Coiste den Dáil, ar a mbeidh cúig teachtaí déag, chun molta a dhéanamh don Dáil do réir Airtíogal 55 den Bhunreacht i dtaobh na n-Airí i geóir Talmhaíochta, Iascaigh, Rialtais Aitiúla agus Oifig an Phuist; go dtoghtar an Coiste do completed, that there should be as long a period between the first and second reading as possible?

The PRESIDENT: Very well. Then I shall move for leave to introduce “A Bill for Constituting the Ministers and Departments of State, in Saorstát Éireann, pursuant to the Constitution, and for enabling the appointment of Parliamentary Secretaries, and for purposes incidental thereto.”

I do not think it is necessary to enter into a detailed explanation, but it is necessary to put this matter on a satisfactory basis. The Bill, although simple in many of its details, has, nevertheless, imposed a considerable burden on those engaged in its construction by reason of the number and distribution of the various departments and the necessary consideration which must be given in associating Departments in particular Ministries. I do not think it is necessary to say any more in regard to the introduction, and I beg, therefore, to move formally for leave to introduce the Bill.

Mr. PETER HUGHES: I beg to second.

Question put and agreed to.

Second reading ordered for Wednesday, October 24th.

MINISTERS NOT MEMBERS OF THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL.

Mr. PETER HUGHES: I beg to move that the report of the Committee elected to make recommendations as to Ministers who shall not be members of the Executive Council be adopted by the Dáil.

1. The Committee was appointed in pursuance of a Resolution of the Dáil passed on the 20th September, 1923, in the following terms:—

“That a Committee of the Dáil consisting of fifteen deputies be chosen to make recommendations to the Dáil in accordance with Article 55 of the Constitution as to the Ministers for Agriculture, Fisheries, Local Government, and the Post Office;

- (a) Pádraig O hOgáin chun bheith ina Aire um Thalmhaíocht;
- (b) Fionán O Loingsigh chun bheith ina Aire um Iascach;
- (c) Séamas de Búrea chun bheith ina Aire um Rialtas Aitiúil; agus
- (d) Séamas Breathnach chun bheith ina Aire Puist.

PEADAR O hAODHA,
Cathaoirleach an Choiste.

3 Deire Fomhair, 1923.

This report has been circulated to Deputies, and I do not think it necessary for me to do more than formally move its adoption.

PADRAIG O MAILLE: Cuidighim le sin.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I would like to ask the Chairman of the Committee be elected by the single transferable vote; that the quorum of the Committee be eleven."

2. In accordance with the above Resolution an election was held on Tuesday, the 25th September, 1923, when the following Deputies were chosen to act on the said Committee:—

Deputies: Johnson, Redmond, Wilson, O'Mahony, Hughes, MacCarthy, Scars, Beamish, Davin, Gorey, P. S. Doyle, C. O Broin, P. Cosgrave, McCabe, and Nicholls.

3. The Committee met on Wednesday, the 3rd October, 1923. All Members of the Committee were in attendance.

4. Deputy Hughes was elected Chairman.

5. The Committee took into consideration the matters referred to them in the above Resolution.

6. It was decided to make the following recommendations to the Dáil for nomination to the Ministries in question:—

- (a) Deputy P. J. Hogan to be Minister for Agriculture;
- (b) Deputy F. Lynch to be Minister for Fisheries;
- (c) Deputy J. A. Bourke to be Minister for Local Government; and
- (d) Deputy J. J. Walsh to be Postmaster-General.

mittee whether it is his intention in moving the adoption of the report that the names of the four Ministers proposed should be taken together, or whether each should be proposed separately. I think the previous procedure was that each name was submitted separately, and I think it might be better to continue that procedure.

Capt. REDMOND: Before this motion is disposed of I would like to make my own position perfectly clear. I was elected a member of this Committee of Selection for the purpose of selecting external Ministers. I want it to be clearly understood, as a member of the Committee, that I accept no responsibility whatever for the nomination of these gentlemen. The Committee was elected on the principle of proportional representation. Of course, the Government, having a majority in this House, naturally had a majority upon the Committee, and, therefore, I want it to be realised that these gentlemen, strictly speaking, are Government nominees. Now I regret, very much, that the Committee and the Government did not see their way to take advantage of the Constitution whereby they could have appointed gentlemen who are not members of the Dáil, but who might be experts in the various Departments over which they might be called upon to preside. I think that is a pity. However, the Government have a majority in this House, and the Government had a majority on this Committee, and the Government are perfectly entitled to make whatever choice of Ministers they choose. They have made their choice; the responsibility is with them; and I want personally to disclaim, and to dissociate myself from any responsibility for the Ministers who have been nominated.

The PRESIDENT: I would like to say I do not accept that interpretation of members duty in this Dáil, nor of members of a Committee of this Dáil. As I understand public business—and I presume I have some experience of it outside of this House in other institutions than this—I understand a member's duty is not to wash his hands of every responsibility that comes before him, if he has not got a majority, but on the contrary to table better proposals, and, in this case, to have tabled the names of persons he considered more expert in the discharge of the administration of these positions than those who are named here, and then to come along here if his proposal was not accepted in the Committee, and say to this House: "We put on the paper the names of better people for consideration than those who have been selected, but we have been beaten because the Government have a majority, and we have been beaten because they are filling up positions with the aid of their majority, and so on." But what has occurred here? Not a single suggestion is made; no constructive proposal whatever is put forward, but the Deputy simply comes here and says: "I wash my hands of all responsibility in this matter." That is not my interpretation of the duty, or the responsibility of a member of this House.

Mr. JOHNSON: The remarks I want to pass on this motion are somewhat different from those made by Deputy Redmond. I want to express my regret, and to enter a protest, that the spirit of the constitutional provision in respect of the appointment of external Ministers was not entered into in the discussion in the Committee. The object, I understand, of this particular provision was to make possible, the appointment of Ministers for certain offices who would be outside the ordinary political parties, and their operations and jurisdiction. It might have been possible, no matter what enquiry had been made, or what examination there had been of possible Ministers, that the same four names would again have been recommended.

The objection that I make is that there was no pretence or no attempt even to consider qualifications; there was no attempt at enquiry into possibilities. The decisions were made at Party meetings beforehand and the names were tabled. Of course the rights are there for the majority and the minority have to accept the decisions of the majority. The point is rather that the intentions of the Constitution were not carried through, and if the same procedure is to be taken as a precedent for future action, then I think that the provisions of the Constitution in this respect are entirely misapplied, and the responsibility for nominating Ministers for these External Departments ought to be, as is the case with the Executive Council, upon the President of the Council. If that responsibility is to be taken by the Dáil under the terms of the Constitution, then, at least, some examination should be made by the Committee of the possibilities and Party decisions that have been come to beforehand ought not to be applied. That is all I have to say.

Mr. BEAMISH: As a member of the Sub-Committee, I was surprised to see two red herrings drawn across the track. Generally one red herring is sufficient, but we have here two red herrings drawn across the track of what happened in that Committee. The Committee were perfectly prepared to listen, however much they might have disagreed by a majority regarding the other nominees, but practically no names were brought forward. It was destructive criticism. It was not constructive criticism. It was a distinct attack made by means of these unfortunate red herrings as to the procedure we should adopt. Certain names were proposed. I had the pleasure of proposing one name myself. I heard a murmur, a wave of dissent, with regard to the Deputy I proposed, but no better man was proposed. In fact, no name at all was proposed. The red herrings remained. I think under those circumstances we will all agree that unless better men are proposed the men who are proposed will be generally accepted by the Dáil.

Mr. DAVIN: As a member of the Committee, I desire to protest against the procedure that was adopted by the Government Party in regard to the selection of their nominees. It was quite apparent that a Government Party meeting was held and that certain selections were made. That may be quite right in its own way, but on the morning of the day that Committee was summoned to meet, on very short notice, the newspapers that had the ear of the Government side published the names of the selected nominees of the Government Party. I suggest, with all respect to the Ministers, and with all respect to those who were responsible for giving that information, that it was very discourteous treatment of the members of the Committee who did not belong to the Government Party. That is my protest in the matter. I think it a very discourteous way for the members of the Committee to be treated. The names selected by the Government Party were published on the morning of the day of the meeting and in that way prejudiced the decision of the Committee. I hope those who are elected to serve on any such Committee in the future will not be treated in that discourteous manner by the Government Party who are responsible for giving away that information.

Mr. D. McCARTHY: I would like to endorse what the President says. This is absolute hypocrisy. No suggestion at all came from the other members of the Committee. They had no other candidate to put up. We put up our candidates, we voted for them and they were elected and they come before the Dáil now. They want to wash their hands of it. Why did they not put up their nominees? I think the members of the Government Party who were on that Committee were open to examine any nominations that were put before them. They did nothing of the sort, but they now come to the Dáil and say we have nothing to do with this.

Mr. WILSON: The last speaker has misrepresented what happened, because I put up an alternative name for one of the Ministries, knowing full well that no matter what particular qualities the member I nominated had he had not the slightest chance of being accepted. However, to try the thing, I put him up and he was turned down, and I take it what happened in that case would happen in every other case.

Mr. HUGHES: As Chairman of the Committee, I wish to point out that some of the statements of the last speaker are not quite correct. He put up a name and when he was asked if he had the authority of the man whose name he put forward he said "No." If he had persisted a vote would have been taken, but the Deputy withdrew his name rather than have a vote taken. I do not like this kind of thing, that men should sit down, come to a decision and then try to wriggle out of it. I do not think that it adds to the dignity of the Dáil or the dignity of those who undertook public responsibilities. It is what you might call "sharp practice."

Mr. T. O'MAHONY: Surely all this is a pretence of piety. I wonder what would the Labour members do if they were in a majority? I wonder what would the Farmers do if they were in a majority? I wonder what would the Independents do if they were in a majority? They would do exactly what they accused the Government members of having done last week.

Mr. WILSON: Question.

Mr. O'MAHONY: There is not a shadow of doubt about it. I am particularly surprised at Deputy Redmond, who has had so much experience in that direction, coming here and catechising us. Our memories are not so short as to forget when it was a political sin to rebel against the Irish Party or against a nominee of theirs. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. To the victors the spoils of war. The Government Party has only done in this case what the high priests who are condemning them, in all the moods and tenses, would do if the same opportunity turned up for them.

Mr. GOREY: As one member of the Committee, I would like to say that I have heard a good number of inaccuracies, even from the gentleman who was Chairman of the Committee. He said that Deputy Wilson withdrew his nomination. That is not true. As a matter of fact, a vote was taken. I think the Minutes will show that ten were for and three against that motion. I only intervene on a question of accuracy. I have nothing to say to the decisions that were made. Deputy Redmond did not vote on this particular division that was taken. We admit that we had not alternative names to put up. The thing was rushed, at half an hour's notice. As a matter of fact, we were sitting there and we did not know that the meeting was to go on, and it would not have been held only that Deputy Beamish was fished up in some part of Dublin. By fishing him and hooking him and landing him at the table the meeting was able to go on. I knew the decision of that meeting would be the same, in any case. I hope Deputy Hughes will accept my statement that a vote was taken.

Mr. HUGHES: I accept that statement, that a division was taken, but the members asked that it should not be recorded.

Mr. GOREY: They did not ask—

Mr. WILSON: On a point of personal explanation, I moved this gentleman's name. The nomination was not withdrawn. There was a vote. The decision of the Committee was that the matter was not to be published in the Press, that it was to be recorded in the Minutes. I wish to ask the Ceann Comhairle in what part of the Constitution it is specified that where a member of the Selection Committee puts forward a name he must get the consent of that particular candidate. How can we get the best men in Ireland, if, say, we had to go down to Cork, where all the good men come from, and ask for their consent? The thing is impossible. We did the best we could in the circumstances. The nominations are practically the nominations of the Government, and they must accept responsibility.

The PRESIDENT: May I intervene for a moment to suggest that, in order that the matter be properly discussed, I should move each one of these members for a particular office and then if there are any alternative suggestions we can hear them.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That must be done in any event. We have to agree with the Committee in their report, and then each name will be taken separately. The motion is "That the Dáil agree with the Committee in their report."

Agreed.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: On a point of order, I wish to deal with the suggestion made by the President that the names here having been proposed, alternative suggestions may be put before the Dáil. I suggest that the Constitution clearly does not permit of any such course of action. The Constitution definitely states that each such Minister shall be nominated by Dáil Eireann on the recommendation of a Committee chosen by Dáil Eireann. That means that every nomination must come through the Committee and [Mr. Darrell Figgis.] cannot come before the Dáil in any other way. I ask if that is not the case, according to the Constitution?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: First and foremost we had to get this report adopted. That has been done. When the proposal is taken that Deputy Hogan be elected Minister for Agriculture that proposal can be rejected or accepted. What is Deputy Figgis's point of order?

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: My point is that under Article 55 of the Constitution, the report may be accepted or rejected, but it is not in order for any other name to be placed before the Dáil except such name comes from and through the Committee.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is so.

The PRESIDENT: When I move that Deputy Hogan be elected, it should be open to an intellectual prodigy to select a better man, and back that up with reasons as to why a better man should be selected. If Deputy Hogan's nomination is turned down, all this pabulum goes to the Committee again, and they will have to select another name and get a man who will be up to the standards that have been set by some of the critics of the proposals which have been made. I think the Constitution will permit of that. I think it is within the knowledge of Deputy Figgis that a course of that kind is open under the Constitution. If Deputy Figgis extended his view somewhat and took a larger outlook on broad constitutional questions, I think the Dáil and the country would benefit, and we would make some progress instead of showing up and exaggerating the little infirmities that are in our character and the little mistakes that we make now and then.

Speaking to this particular motion, that Deputy Hogan be elected, I have to say that from my experience of something like twelve or eighteen months, that he held the position of Minister for Agriculture, I am perfectly satisfied that if left to the free vote of the people concerned—in this case the farmers of the country—Deputy Hogan would be their nominee. I think it is right Deputy Redmond should know that.

Captain REDMOND: I know that already. I have great regard for Deputy Hogan.

The PRESIDENT: It is unnecessary, then, to waste the time of the Dáil. I move the motion.

Mr. GOREY: I second the motion. I think it is within my right. I took the same action at the Committee, and I am proud to take the same action here. I do not desire to make a speech, but Deputy Hogan has filled the office of Minister for Agriculture and has administered it as it should be done. His ability has met with the approval of the farming community. We differed with Deputy Hogan in connection with some matters under the Land Bill, but that was an honest difference. We recognise his abilities and we recognise that there is no man in the Dáil able to take his place.

Captain REDMOND: I am afraid that the President rather misunderstands my attitude. My attitude is in no way an objection to the personnel of the nominees, but my attitude is to make it perfectly clear to the country, beyond all sham, that these are the Government nominees, and that it is the Government who are responsible for them. I do not think it is very dignified or worthy of a Government to be endeavouring to shift its responsibilities on to others. Deputy Hogan was proposed at this Committee meeting, and, like Deputy Gorey, I signified my assent because, strange as it may appear to the President, I had heard of Deputy Hogan before. I had heard also of the esteem and regard in which he is held by the agricultural community. But, apart altogether from Deputy Hogan's character and his ability, the point that I want the Dáil to understand is that these gentlemen are the Government nominees, and that it is the Government, who have the majority here, and who have the majority on the Committee—and who are entitled to have the majority on the Committee, and who are entitled to nominate their own Ministers—it is they, and they alone, who are responsible to the country for the nomination and support of the Ministers whom they have named.

Mr. P. HOGAN (Galway): This is the right time for me to make a speech, and I make it apropos of the statement Deputy Redmond has just made now. This is a storm in a teacup from start to finish. I think I am expressing the truth when I say that the Government and the Government Party did make up their mind as to whom they would propose for certain offices. That is the truth. I think it is equally true to say that not a single Party in the Dáil wish to take the responsibility of putting forward a nominee for any of these offices. I say "wish to take the responsibility." I do not think the Labour Party wanted to fill any Ministry and stand over that Minister and his policy for the year. I have never been told that they did or that they did not, but I think what I have stated is the truth, and that the Dáil will realise it is the truth. I do not think the Farmers' Party wanted to take the risk of putting forward anyone for any particular Ministry, and standing over the policy and taking responsibility for the Minister for a year or two. It is not going to be a bed of roses. I do not think that the Independent Party desired to do so either. That is the spirit of the Constitution. The spirit of the Constitution is not so much that a number of men should be chosen from any one Party for any one office, but that the various Parties in the Dáil should put forward men representing their point of view. That was never done. There is no use disclaiming responsibility at this stage. The Government Party took the responsibility of making certain suggestions. The other Parties did not wish to take the responsibility of nominating any members of their own. What is happening just at the moment is that the other Parties see a chance of getting a score and they are making a virtue of necessity. Every Party in the Dáil knows that if we offered them Ministries at present, they would not take them.

Mr. GOREY: Question! Make the offer.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think it is necessary to say that there are different interpretations of the intentions of the Constitution from those mentioned by Deputy Hogan. Everything that was said in respect of the method of appointing Ministers who would be responsible to the Dáil and not to the Executive Council, and who would not go out of office if the Executive Council lost the confidence of the majority, suggests that the appointment should not be a Party or a group appointment. It was possible to examine the qualifications whether members were in the Dáil or outside the Dáil. That is the intention of this clause, and it is quite apparent to everyone who was present when this discussion took place. Deputy Hogan, however, tells us that this is, and ought to be, a Party question, and that the names ought to be put forward as Party names—

Mr. P. HOGAN: On a point of order I never said anything of the kind. What I did say was—

Mr. O'CONNELL: Is that a point of order?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It is a point of personal explanation.

Mr. P. HOGAN: What I did say was that not any Party except a Government Party—and this is not a mere technicality—ever seriously put forward a nominee of their own over whom they were prepared to stand and for whose policy they were prepared to stand. That was the spirit of the Constitution. They should have done that and the failure to carry out the spirit of the Constitution was not due in this instance to the Government Party.

Mr. JOHNSON: There is no question of the responsibility of Party at all. Deputies go to this Committee to make a selection and presumably to discuss the merits and not Party allegiances. When we were approached on the necessity of such a meeting we were informed plainly by the majority that it would be over in half an hour. There was no question then of considering the merits of any nominee or any Party or individual. A decision had been made and the Committee was a farce.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The motion is that Deputy P. J. Hogan be nominated Minister for Agriculture. When the Report of the Committee was being adopted there was sufficient opportunity for discussing the operations of the Committee. Speeches will now have to be confined on this motion to the fitness or otherwise, as Deputies may possibly think, of Deputy Hogan as Minister for Agriculture.

Mr. SHAW: It is perfectly evident to the Dáil that the reason the other Parties outside the Government Party did not put on anyone was because they were well aware they could not find any more competent man than Mr. Hogan. Motion put and agreed to.

MINISTER FOR FISHERIES.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. Kevin O'Higgins): In the absence of the President I move that Deputy Píonán Lynch be nominated Minister for Fisheries.

Mr. HUGHES: I beg to second that.

Mr. GOREY: I do not know that I should go into details about this question. This is one of the Ministries that a vote was taken on, and a good deal of discussion has been raised here about the motion and as to why members of the Committee did not put up candidates or did not nominate men for the position. As I said earlier, as a matter of hard fact, the Committee did not know it was going to meet until half an hour before the actual time of the meeting, and then when the Committee had met, it did not know it was going to do any business until ten minutes before the nomination was made. So I think that point should not be laboured at all. With reference to this question of the Ministry of Fisheries—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It is the Minister for Fisheries.

Mr. GOREY: I think our people cannot consent to an appointment at all unless with the addition of an Advisory Board. This is not like Agriculture. It is not like Trade and Commerce. It is not like any of the beaten tracks or departments that have been in existence and whose lines are definitely marked. The fishery industry is one of the things that is, practically speaking, unknown in this country or in the Dáil. I do not think we have an expert within the walls of this Assembly this evening, and we need an expert. If expert advice is going to be given us, if the money expended on this Ministry is going to be of any use at all, it can only be of any use by being intelligently applied. It can only be of any use when the two great questions in fisheries are going to take effect—when we have experts on propagation and protection.

Mr. BEAMISH: Is the Deputy in order in discussing this matter on the motion before the Dáil?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I have the advantage of knowing what Deputy Gorey is going to say. He told me what he was going to say. I told him that the business of this Committee was to nominate somebody to be Minister for Fisheries, and the motion now is that Deputy Lynch be nominated. I think the point that he is now making would be applicable to any individual.

Mr. GOREY: Yes.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think that should be raised when the question of the creation or the continuance of a Ministry of Fisheries was under discussion. The question now is the fitness of the person nominated for this Ministry, and unless Deputy Gorey has something to say on that matter, he cannot, at this stage, discuss the question of a Board to assist a Minister.

Mr. GOREY: If I propose an amendment that this particular name be not accepted, can I speak to that and can I use the argument I have been using?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I do not think so.

Mr. GOREY: I am absolutely in your hands, I bow to your ruling.

Mr. JOHNSON: Would it not be in order to discuss the question whether the Deputy named is capable without an Advisory Board to conduct this Department satisfactorily?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I understand from Deputy Gorey that nobody is capable of doing it without an Advisory Board, at least he has told me so, and I understood—

Mr. GOREY: You need not understand anything from my remarks. Can I continue?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Not on this matter of an Advisory Board. That was relevant when this Ministry was being created.

The PRESIDENT: It would be no harm to tell the Deputy that when the Ministries Bill comes up for consideration it will be open to him to raise the particular subject he wishes raised now. And that is whether we ought to have a Minister for Fisheries at all. I have intimated to my friends that if any Ministry was not continued we would expect that the Minister affected would retire. Under the Constitution he could hold on to the end of the period, but I think you may rely upon it that in the case of any of the four Deputies now nominated, should it be decided to abolish the Ministry to which any of them is assigned, the person so assigned will retire then.

I should like to say also that as I understand the nature of the criticism that has been made, it amounts to this: it is not against the Government but it is against the people for having returned the Government.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I have explained with great care that that is out of order.

The PRESIDENT: I accept that.

Mr. GOREY: On a point of personal explanation, I wish to say, with reference to the name put forward, that I have nothing at all personal against the Deputy. I believe the Deputy is as capable—or as incapable if you like—as anyone else in the Dáil, to fill the position, and in suggesting the appointment of an Advisory Committee I wish to say there was no reflection cast on the Deputy. He knows my view and he knows how intensely interested I am in this matter. I hope nobody thinks that there is anything personal in my remarks.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy will have other opportunities for making his point about an Advisory Board.

Motion agreed to.

MINISTER FOR LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

The PRESIDENT: I beg to move that Seamus de Burea be nominated Minister for Local Government. This particular post is one that will require very great attention from the person appointed, and while it may be urged that Deputy Burke has not had much association with the administration of Local Government, he has been a member of the Dáil since 1918. This office, and indeed most of those offices, during the next couple of years will depend very largely upon the individual appointed and upon the policy of the Government. Local Government itself will require, perhaps, the most attention of any of the Ministries for some time to come. There has not been any great development in the last year or two, so far as able and capable administration are concerned, and it will be the study and the work of the persons who are appointed to try and mark some improvement in regard to this particular Ministry in the years to come. A considerable amount of arrears is outstanding in rates in the country, and the rates generally of local authorities are more than the people can bear. In a sense it can scarcely be urged that that is a responsibility of the Ministry, but I take it that the Minister, while concerning himself with that particularly in future, will see that particular service will be conducted throughout the country in such a manner that the rate-payers will get full value for their money.

Mr. DOYLE: I beg to second the motion.

PADRAIC O MAILLE: Ba mhaith liom cuidiú leis an rún san. Tá a fhios agam gur fear cliste é agus táim deimhnithe go ndéanfaidh sé an obair go maith. Theasbain muinntir Tiobraid Arann sa Toghachán Mór an meas a bhí aca air, agus táim cinnte go bhfuil an meas céadna ag lucht na Dála air,

Mr. OSMOND ESMONDE: I am, I think, the only Deputy in the Dáil who was associated with Deputy Burke some years ago in the arduous and thankless job of trying to obtain the sinews of war in America and in trying to conduct a campaign for the establishment and recognition of this State. I have a knowledge of the qualities which Deputy Burke displayed during that period, and I would like to associate myself with the proposal that he be accepted as Minister for Local Government. I am confident that he will display the same qualities as he displayed in America, in the arduous and perhaps the unpopular task of conducting and controlling the Local Government affairs of this country.

Motion agreed to.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

The PRESIDENT: I move that Deputy J. J. Walsh be nominated Postmaster-General. I think this is a nomination that will be unanimously approved by the Dáil.

Mr. C. BYRNE: I beg to second the motion.

Mr. O'MAHONY: I have very great pleasure in supporting this nomination—

Mr. GOREY: Cork.

Mr. O'MAHONY: He is last but by no means least. When it was not a popular thing to support Irish ideals, the present Postmaster-General was in the fight. He risked his life and lost his liberty and his employment. These, though they may be strong recommendations in his favour, would not be recommendations that should absolutely impose him on the Dáil if he were unfitted for the position; but what stands most in his favour is that the Dáil and the country have had experience of his administrative abilities as a Postmaster-General. Before I became a member of the Dáil one of the pleasant experiences I had was to read the report of the Postmaster-General's Department—

Mr. WILSON: The deficit.

Mr. O'MAHONY: He effected great economies and he has laid the foundation of an extremely successful postal system in the country. At present we suffer from disadvantages, but these are the legacies that have been left to us. I am assured that within a year our experience of the operation of the Post Office will be one that we will all have reason to congratulate ourselves on.

Mr. GOREY: I rise to support this proposal. I think the pleasant recollections that Deputy O'Mahony referred to are not the pleasant recollections that I have experienced. I have had pleasant recollections in my time, but certainly one of them was not the cutting down of the daily delivery and collection of letters to three deliveries and collections in the week, as has been done in the rural districts all over the country. That is not a pleasant recollection. It is done at the expense of the rural population. We hear of two and three day deliveries in the towns, but in the country, where the people bear as much of the taxation and the burdens of the country as anyone else, it is not pleasant to be told that they would get fewer deliveries than they were previously accustomed to. It is not pleasant for people to have to pay portage on every telegram they receive. I hope that the Postmaster-General will see that the rural population is not victimised and that the people in the towns will not be made parasites on the rural population. A citizen ought not to be penalised by the fact that he lives a certain distance from the post office. If that is to be the basis of Government it will not be satisfactory. I have great pleasure in supporting the nomination.

Mr. NAGLE: I desire to associate myself with what Deputy Gorey said about giving greater facilities to the people in the rural districts as regards the delivery of letters. I would also like to jog Deputy Gorey's memory, and to point out, if my recollection is accurate, and it usually is, that he advised the Postmaster-General in the last Dáil that the farmers of Ireland, in the interests of economy, would be quite willing to drive to the towns and collect their letters, and that the Postmaster-General's department could economise by doing away with the rural postmen.

Mr. GOREY: On a point of personal explanation.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Order! Deputy Gorey must sit down, and allow Deputy Nagle to continue. We can take Deputy Gorey's personal explanation when Deputy Nagle is finished.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Might I ask if we are in order in discussing the administration of the Post Office?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: We certainly are not.

Mr. NAGLE: I was going to say, when Deputy Gorey interrupted me, that I hope the Postmaster-General will take the advice Deputy Gorey has offered him on this occasion, and that he will put in the waste-paper basket the advice that he offered him on a previous occasion.

Mr. GOREY: I am afraid that Deputy Nagle has not been stating facts, and I challenge him to produce the records of the Dáil to support the statement he has made. I never made the suggestion that he has referred to, and I challenge him to produce the records of the debate on that occasion to confirm one word he has uttered in connection with my name.

Mr. NAGLE: I will have great pleasure in delving into the records, and I will do my best to get the statement that I have referred to.

Motion put and agreed to.

MINISTER FOR EDUCATION.

The PRESIDENT: I desire to say that I have received the approval of the Governor-General to the appointment of Deputy Eoin MacNeill as Minister for Education.

COUNTY COURTS (AMENDMENT) BILL, 1923.—SECOND STAGE.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. Kevin O'Higgins): I beg to move that this Bill be now read a second time. This Bill is short and simple, and very necessary. It is a temporary Bill, its object being simply to see that no technical difficulties shall prevent the present County Courts from proceeding with their functions, pending the re-organisation of the Judicial system under the Bill that is at present before the Dáil. Section 1 provides that a Court may be held anywhere in a particular county and not necessarily at what was the Statutory court of assembly. The necessity for this arises from the fact that many court-houses throughout the country are in ruins, or otherwise unfit for use. Section 2 gives to the Judge discretion to waive the usual formalities with regard to the service of documents, summonses, etc., provided he is satisfied that the service was, in fact, effective. Deputies will understand that, in some areas through the country, it has not been possible to serve documents of that kind personally. On the Committee Stage of this Bill I will ask for permission to insert a Section to get over another difficulty arising out of the fact that Jury Lists, in some counties, are out of date. Section 3 of the Bill is merely a definition Section, and Section 4 gives the period, or the lifetime, of the Bill. The Act shall be deemed to come into force on, and shall have effect as on and from the 1st day of September, 1923, and the Act shall continue in force until the 31st day of August, 1924, and shall then expire. I now beg to move that the Bill be read a second time.

The PRESIDENT: I second the motion.

Question put: "That the County Courts (Amendment) Bill, 1923, be read a second time."

Agreed.

Committee Stage ordered for Tuesday, 16th October, 1923.

LICENSING (RENEWAL OF LICENCES) BILL, 1923.—SECOND STAGE.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I beg to move that this Bill be read a second time. This Bill is also short and is necessary to get over certain technical difficulties arising out of the disturbances in recent years. It is not a comprehensive Licensing Bill, but a Bill confined simply to the question of the renewal of licences. In many areas through the country there were not available a sufficient number of Justices to deal with the question of the transfer of licences, and the annual licensing sessions were not held. Owners of licensed premises continued to trade in spite of the fact that they did not hold a certificate of renewal of their licences, but they continued to pay the Excise duty. The police then, in these circumstances did not interfere with those who had done that, but the District Justices found that they could not legally renew these licences. As there was no licence renewal, the licences lapsed. It would have been legally possible for the owners of these premises to apply to the Quarter Sessions, but that would involve considerable expense upon them and the Court might possibly refuse the application. This Bill, then, is simply a Bill brought in to remove these hardships and provides that in such a set of circumstances the licence shall be deemed to have been renewed, and to be in existence up to the present.

There is one other point dealt with under Section 3 in the Bill. Certain premises throughout the country were burned down, both in the struggle with the British and in more recent times, and it is proposed to provide that an owner opening his business in adjacent premises, provided he pays the licence duty in respect of them, in such a situation the District Justice or the Quarter Sessions shall have power to grant him a licence in favour of the new premises. This difficulty is dealt with in the Bill, and the licence is deemed to be transferred to the new premises provided that they are in the same town or village as the old premises, and provided also that any necessary alterations to the new premises requiring to make them fit for the purpose, are made within twelve months. It is our view that there is scarcely material for contention or opposition to this Bill. It is simply a measure of justice, and raises no point on which there can be any serious contention. I now beg to move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. BEAMISH: I second the motion.

Question put: "That Licensing (Renewal of Licences) Bill, 1923, be read a second time."

Agreed.

Committee stage ordered for Tuesday, 16th October, 1923.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S ADDRESS (MOTION FOR A RESOLUTION OF THANKS).

Debate was resumed on the following motion: "That the Dáil returns thanks to the Governor-General for his Address and approves of the legislative programme of the Government as outlined therein" (Deputy Burke).

Mr. JOHNSON: There is one remark that one might make in opening this discussion, and that is that in drawing up the Address the Ministry apparently did not desire that this session should be behind the last in legislative output, and that the record of about one Act per week ought to be reached in this coming session. The Dáil will have no fear of unemployment if the proceedings suggested, and the Bills suggested in the Address are to be carried through and fully considered.

There are so many points that might be raised, and which I have no doubt will be dealt with by various Deputies, that I propose to confine myself mainly to one paragraph, prefacing that by expressing my regret that the reference to the possibility of the release of the prisoners shows so little confidence in the ability of the Government to bring about a state of peace as is suggested. "It is hoped that it may be found compatible with public security, gradually to release the majority of those persons at present detained for the public safety." "Gradually to release the majority," and there is still only three or four months to run before the extension of the present powers of detaining prisoners without trial will have expired. The suggestion that you may gradually release the majority carries with it the complementary suggestion that the minority have no right to expect or hope for release within the period dealt with in this Address. That, I think, is very unsatisfactory, indeed. I propose to leave Deputy Alfred Byrne to follow the discussion upon this matter, inasmuch as he has interested himself very heartily with the case of these internees. I intend to deal with the succeeding paragraph, or the paragraph dealing with unemployment, and the general industrial economic condition of the country, and while one may express one's pleasure at the announcement that the Government is paying very, very close attention to this problem; that they are confident that stable conditions and enterprise will find many opportunities, one cannot but feel regretful that the Government is not taking the problem in hands as seriously as I think the problem warrants. We are told that developments are at present hampered by disagreements between employers and employees. Undoubtedly that is so, but it is to be regretted, and it is a great pity, indeed, that at the time when peace had more or less come upon the country, that employers should have insisted upon destroying the peace of the country by promoting these disagreements which have occurred and which have hampered developments, and that they should have insisted upon certain changes in the industrial arrangements as to impose these impediments in the development of the peaceful character and prosperity of the country. We know that it is commonly spoken and written that the men who are in disagreement with their employers or with the terms of their employment are to blame for not accepting the prices which the employers have offered. That runs through every speech, every advertisement, every leading article in all the newspapers, forgetful, as it seems to me, that the active agent in promoting these disagreements has been, not the men, but the employers. We do not blame the merchant or the manufacturer when he offers an article to a customer at a price, and the customer refuses to take it at that price, we do not blame the seller for the discomfort that is entailed by his refusal to sell at that price, but that is what is done in the case of the men and the employers. We are told it must be recognised that the condition of the times prohibits the maintenance of the inflation caused by the European war artificially prolonged by our domestic strife, and that high profits and high wages can no longer be sustained by a country whose economic life has agriculture as its basis and foundation.

I am glad to recognise in this sentence that the Government is impressed with the fact that the economic life of the country has agriculture as its basis and foundation. I am sorry to know that the assertion of high prices, high profits, and high wages does not include in this Address high interest charges, which were included in the items referred to by the President in the speech he made in the Dáil a week or two ago.

I hope there is no significance in the omission of that. We are told that a recognition of facts is of the first necessity if industrial friction is to be allayed. I am very anxious that the facts should be laid before the Dáil and before the country, so that they may be recognised as facts. It is not enough to produce a few figures, publish advertisements in newspapers, and treat them as facts, and the only facts. It is not enough only to take the immediately obvious facts and treat them as though they were the only facts. There are mountain ranges behind the hills that are immediately within our vision. There are things that we have experience of that are not the things that are only now coming into notice. You cannot form a right judgment on a question if you are only to consider those facts which are of immediate moment and which appear to be the only ones that are causing action to be taken. There are other facts. I submit that it is not only the facts of to-day that have to be taken into account; you must take into account the facts and the conditions of five years ago, ten years ago, fifteen years ago, twenty years ago. I want to ask the Dáil to bear with me when I put some of the facts that are not frequently dealt with for their consideration. If we are to be persuaded that high prices, high profits, and high wages cannot be sustained then I suggest that as many facts as can be gathered together ought to be made public and placed before the country and the Dáil. The case is made—it is even made in the statement made by the President a little while ago—that there must be reductions in wages. He is proposing to submit suggestions about a reduction in wages of 1/- per day, and consequent reductions to piece-workers and the like. I am not going to prejudice that proposal in any way, but it seems to me unfortunate that the proposal should be to reduce wages by 1/- a day and then to set up this Court of Inquiry to deal with one particular class of employment.

We are told very clearly by those speaking on behalf of one of the Parties to these disagreements that costs of living have no relation to the prices in the market and ought not to be considered in fixing the rates of wages. I hope I am not overstating the proposition that was made a few days ago and assented to by Deputy Hewat with enthusiasm. But the point was made, to which he assented, that the price in the market, the price to be got for products, was a factor that ought to be taken into account in fixing wages, not the cost of living to the workman. I wonder will it be conceded to the workman that in that which he has to sell he has to take into account the cost of living. This whole question seems to me to require some kind of an assent to a proposition that human labour must not be treated in the same way, and by the same logic, the same arguments, as an ordinary marketable commodity. We have the very highest authority for disclaiming any such way of looking upon human labour. It must not be treated as a commodity in the market, to be bought and sold as ordinary marketable goods. If we are to proceed, as one would gather from the speeches, leading articles, advertisements and letters that we read, on the assumption that what are called "inexorable economic laws" are to prevail in dealing with the price of human labour, the wages paid to the men for their work, so-called laws which are only valid if we accept the proposition that the dominating factor in economic life is human greed and acquisitiveness—if we are to accept any other assumption than that then we have no right to consider the price of labour in the same category with any other commodities that are bought and sold in the market. I believe that we ought to have an understanding of our respective positions on that question. If we are to deal with these problems in that light as though human labour is to be considered as boots or pig-iron, supply and demand determining the price to be paid for it, then we know where we are, and I suppose we have to fall back upon the usual methods of getting the most you can at the opportune time, taking advantage of any opportunity, whether buying or selling.

If that is to be the position, then, of course, the moral factor does not enter into it, and we are forced back upon the "dog fight," as somebody called it—the scramble in the attempt to hold what one has in any circumstances, except fear or hunger, no other considerations being taken into account. I wondered, when I read the reference to the necessity for deflation—presumably not referring to currency, but to high prices, high profits and high wages—I wondered whether the agriculturist would accept the proposition that high prices could not be sustained, and ought not to be. Is it to be accepted generally that the price of wheat or beef, or bacon or butter, ought to be brought down still further, and that the high prices of those products are bad for the country, because that is the proposition in this address? I have had my attention called to one firm's interest in the question of high profits, and I am going to ask the Dáil to listen to a few figures.

took the Chair at this stage.

Mr. JOHNSON: A factor of very considerable importance in this matter is the price of the produce of Guinness's brewery. I find that, for the years beginning 1918 and ending 1922/23—for those five years—the net profit of that firm amounted to £14,497,450—roughly, fourteen and a half millions—on an actual capital of two and a half millions. Of course, that is not the 5 o'clock. present nominal capital. It has been increased. It was doubled in 1908 by the capitalisation of reserves, and it has again been very greatly increased. But when one thinks of a net profit of fourteen and a half millions in five years out of the barley growers and consumers, one thinks there is need for a reduction in high profits.

I make bold to say that a reduction in the price of porter and stout would have an effect much greater than a similar reduction in the case of any other commodity. In fact, I am rather dubious of the prophecies about reductions in retail prices as the result of any reasonable reduction in wages that might, by any means, be brought about. Our friends, the Cork employers, for instance, told us that the total wages paid by the grocery establishments in Cork averaged only eleven per cent. of the price. A reduction of ten per cent.—or, shall I say, twenty per cent.—in wages in those establishments could obviously only mean a reduction in retail prices of 5½d. per 20/-. From enquiry into the cost of flour-milling and bread-baking and selling, I find that, taking the wheat from the ship's side, the milling of the wheat, the carrying of the flour to the bakery, the baking of the bread, the wholesale distribution of the bread and the retail distribution of the bread—taking the whole process from the wheat at the ship to the bread at the consumer's house—the total of the wages expended, according to the figures provided by the employers, was twenty-seven per cent. of the retail price. I am giving these figures because I am rather hopeful that when we are asked to recognise the facts we shall be provided with the facts from all the various industries in which there are disagreements or where disagreements may be possible. A recognition of the facts is very, very important, and a disclosure of the facts is equally important.

I have, for instance, certain figures, which are not very recent, regarding an industry, but they will illustrate what I am trying to persuade those who may speak on behalf of employers to do for their industries. A certain inquiry was made by a very competent expert accountant and statistician some years ago—pre-war—as to the costings from beginning to end of a certain production, and the segregation of those costs to the various heads.

The result of that analysis was as follows:—£60,200 worth of wearing apparel was taken into account, and this particular class of wearing apparel was produced entirely in this country, except the seed from which the flax was grown. The flax was grown, pulled, retted, scutched, and put through various processes and carried from one operation to another, and all the processes were analysed. Taking into consideration wages, salaries, rentals, interest and all the miscellaneous costs right to the preparation of the cloth into articles of apparel, the articles cost, retail, as I said, the sum of £60,200. An analysis of this kind is very important, and it is very important that analysis of this kind should be divulged. In this case the percentage allocated to wages paid to workmen right from the sowing of the seed to the handing over the counter of the finished article, was 36 per cent. of the retail price; salaries and commission, 17.5 per cent. of the retail price; rent 5 per cent. of the retail price, and interest charges 15.6 per cent. of the retail price.

I would like to invite the representatives of some of the other industries of the country to allow analysis of this kind to be made and published so that the facts that we are asked to recognise may be made available. We are told very often, and I think quite rightly and wisely, that we should look to Denmark for an example of how to carry through certain agricultural operations, or at least certain operations regarding the preparation and marketing and sale of agricultural produce. They have done extremely well. They have improved the country in a manner which is an example to the world, and it is important to bear in mind the conditions in Denmark, because of the very fact that it is Denmark which may be said to be the keenest competitor with the Saorstát in the chief market.

I think Deputy Hewat told us that the whole prosperity of the country lay in our export trade. Ireland, he said, could live only on its power to export produce, and he said they would have to get down to principles and recognise that an agricultural country exporting its produce could not live and pay a rate of wages in excess of that paid in competing countries. It is a country very like Ireland, inasmuch as its population is, to a very great preponderance, agricultural. It has a few towns just as Ireland has, and some industries; it has more industries, in fact, than Ireland has, of a productive character. Nevertheless, it is perhaps as good an example for comparison as any other country that could be found, and it is more appropriate for a comparison because of the fact that so large a proportion of its agricultural produce is sold in the same market as our agricultural produce is sold.

What are the facts in regard to urban rates of wages in that country, which is the competing country, bear in mind? The Dublin Employers' Association published a table—perhaps I may be wrong in that. The table was published in the "Independent" a week or two ago, and it contained a comparison of the wages and hours of unskilled labour in Dublin, Northern Ireland and England. The table was forwarded to the "Independent" for publication. It may not be the Dublin Employers' Association which is responsible, but we will take it that the figures are fairly accurate. I have not got a close comparison of the various classes of employees in Denmark or Copenhagen with all those on this list, but I have some, and I think they are very important and worthy of consideration, especially in view of the statement made by Deputy Hewat regarding the impossibility of an agricultural country exporting its produce and paying a rate of wages in excess of those in competing countries.

The building trade is often held up as a flagrant example. Skilled workmen in Dublin in 1914 earned 38/-; there were some slightly more, but the general rate was about 38/-. Six months ago to-day their wages were 82/6. In Copenhagen, if we assume the same rate in 1914, and the rate of the increase to-day as compared with 1914, as against 82/6 to-day in Dublin you would have, for bricklayers, £5 3s. 7d.; the actual rate would be £5 5s. 7d., taking the current rate of exchange of a few months ago. The case of carpenters is not quite so strong to my argument, but whereas in 1914 carpenters received 38/- and now receive 82/6 in Dublin, the present rate for carpenters in Copenhagen is £4 10s. Let us deal with the labourers, which is the class of employee dealt with in this table. We have in the table engineers' wages for 1914, 20/-; that is, I take it, engineers' labourers. In 1923 it is 53/-. The Copenhagen rate of wages paid six months' ago was 58/6. Builders' labourers in 1914 in Dublin were 20/10, to-day it is 55/-, while in Copenhagen it is 82/-.

Labourers in flour mills in 1914 were paid 18/-; in January, 1923, they were paid 57/-; in March, 1923, it was 54/6. The increase in Copenhagen, taking 18/- as the base, was to 54/6, which is practically identical with Dublin rates. The bakers' rate has risen from 34/- in 1914 to 94/- in 1923, in Dublin for skilled men. The equivalent rate in Copenhagen was 91/8, a slight advantage from the employers' point of view over Dublin. I have quoted this to show that notwithstanding all that has been said with regard to the rates of wages paid in Dublin, in the country which is quite acknowledged to be that which is in strongest competition with Ireland in its capital, the rates of wages are even higher on the whole than they are in Dublin, and the increase since 1914 has been higher than the increase over 1914 in Dublin. It is well, therefore, to bear in mind that there are other facts to be taken into account than those which are made much of in the newspapers. Those seem to be very striking to the uninitiated.

I have desired in dealing with this matter to-day and at other times that we should try to avoid, if we can, or rather we should try to get away from the proposition which has been generally accepted, or acted upon at any rate, that conditions in Ireland must be determined by the conditions in England, and that we have got to think in circumstances in this country as far as possible in a detached way. I see signs that there is a pretty widespread reaction growing against the very idea of nationality and that the movement towards national freedom is to be undermined by forcing people to consider economic affairs in the light of British conditions. Now I think that if we are to be carried away by that thought, then the last state of this country is to be worse than the first. There were certain advantages perhaps for urban interests at any rate, in thinking of this country's economic life as being part of the economic unit of Great Britain and Ireland, and we see evidence of that reaction in the discussions that are centring round the Judiciary Bill, the salaries that are to be paid to Judges, and the necessity for keeping up certain standards. I am very strongly of opinion that standards have to be readjusted. There has to be a revaluation here, and I believe that if with the revaluation standard the adjustment of people's thoughts in regard to their relative positions were to be made, taken in conjunction with the proposition with which I started, that human labour must not be treated as a commodity in the market, then we can discuss the matter with some hope of finding a point of agreement. Without that preliminary acceptance I do not see where there can be any point of agreement, and I can only see in front of us a continuous turmoil with each side trying to take advantage of its immediate temporary advantage.

I take the view that the country is, as a matter of fact, top-heavy in the sense that there is altogether too large a proportion of the population engaged in non-productive services or engaged in no services at all. I believe it is quite wrong and quite unjust that urban conditions should be so modelled, or attempted to be modelled, on urban conditions in England, which is an industrialised country. I believe it is wrong that we should attempt to fashion our lines upon an industrialised country, or that the relations between urban and rural Ireland should be fashioned upon the relations between urban and rural England. I think it is wrong that the agricultural producer should be placed in a disadvantageous position, economically, from the urban producer. I believe also it would be right and proper for the community, urban and rural alike, to set itself the task of ensuring the agricultural producer against loss owing to causes over which he has no control. These things are done, and can be done, provided the burden is fairly evenly adjusted; but when we are compelled, as we are by the attitude of mind and the arguments that are used in favour of a reduction of wages, to conclude that it is only because of certain temporary disadvantages that the workman is under, or certain inabilities that the employer is under, inabilities to make a sufficient rate of profit to keep things going, that when it is only these arguments are used in favour of any change in wages or in economic relations, then we are forced to conclude that we simply must make the best of our chance and resist change as long as we can resist a change. I submit that this whole question has been dealt with from the wrong angle. It would have been a much wiser proceeding if employers had set out to say: "We are prepared to maintain the present rate of wages and conditions, but give us greater effort and we will join with you in giving our minds and our hearts to the work of organising production and in improving output by one means or another, with better organisation and even better human effort." If the whole problem of economic disadvantage had been approached in that way, in my opinion it would have led to a very much better result, and with more of a chance of success and less risk and danger to the State. I said before that I have not been disabused of the fear that the future was dark enough—as dark as one could imagine a country of this kind could go through and as it has gone through—if we are simply to go ahead on the road that we have travelled in regard to economic relations. "The resources of the nation are limited and the needs of many of its members great," the Address states. "It is hoped with confidence that each citizen will take a full measure of the present burdens and expend a full measure of his or her energy or powers in bringing success to the efforts of the Government." I fear that the method of approach that the Government is bent on is not calculated to bring that desirable end. I would say that the facts that we are asked to recognise should be made known, that there should be an appeal to all sides to state fully and frankly and fearlessly everything they know about their business, about the prospects of their business, and of the risks that there are to the State and of the economic life of the community, and that the appeal should be made having divulged the facts and having made known the dangers, if there are dangers, and if these dangers can be proved with reasonable satisfaction. Then, I say the appeal should be made for the co-operation asked for in this final paragraph of the Address. I do not believe that the support that was asked for is likely to come by any piece-meal attempts to settle the present disputes. We have been told too often in everything that has been said on the one side, perhaps also on the other side, that those who have taken the initiative in driving down wages supported their action by the argument that wages must come down because they say their business will not stand the present rates. We are told on the one hand that because costs of living have come down, men should be willing to accept lower wages, and on the other hand we are told that costs of living have nothing to do with it—that it is the cost of the article in the market which is the factor that determines and must determine the rates of wages. When the employers' side in these discussions takes two divergent views we are naturally led to the conclusion that, quite apart from the merits, the object is to get down wages at any cost, and with any argument and for any purpose. I ask for a presentation of the facts and I ask for the appointment of a court, such as is suggested, to deal not with one enquiry only, but to deal with all the trades that are in question. I believe if that proposition were acceded to and if matters were held in abeyance for a while until such courts could pronounce upon the position, the very fact of the enquiry pronouncing, without any question of compulsion, would be sufficient to satisfy all those engaged in the operations concerned. I believe further, and I suggest to the Dáil, that that being done, that there should be set up a Ministry or a Committee of a Ministry of Reconstruction and Development which would be composed, say, of a Minister as Chairman with two or three or four others to act with that Minister, such body having considerable powers to proceed with the necessary work of development and of restoration, or rather to proceed with the stimulation of that work. That Ministry should also have considerable powers, if it has not got them already, to deal with over-charging, or profiteering as it is called, where flagrant cases can be shown.

I am glad to hear that the Minister is moving in that direction and that it is proposed to use such powers as he has. As I said earlier, I am not quite so confident of the effect upon retail prices as the Minister seems to be and as the public is, but there are, no doubt, very many flagrant instances of over-charging, and still more instances of uneconomic methods of distribution. I feel that the conditions which we deplore—the unemployment of forty thousand people recorded, and one does not know how many more unrecorded—is not going to be met by the programme outlined in this paragraph. I would like to see the whole question dealt with very much more radically than seems to be suggested in this paragraph.

I hope my pessimism will prove to be unfounded. No one would be more delighted if that were so than I. I would like to see the basis of this hearty co-operation which is suggested laid by a full and complete disclosure of the financial needs of the country, the prospects before the country, the prospects before industry, the prospects before agriculture, and the prospects before the working men, if the evils which I fear do come into effect, and I am sorry that the paragraph in question does not give more promise of the improvement which I would like to see.

DEBATE ADJOURNED.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I move that the debate on this Motion be adjourned until to-morrow.

Mr. WOULFE: I second the motion.

Question put and agreed to.

Debate adjourned accordingly.

THE COURTS OF JUSTICE BILL (MOTION BY DEPUTY DARRELL FIGGIS).

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I beg to move:—“That the Order committing ‘The Courts of Justice Bill’ to Committee of the whole Dáil be discharged, and that the Bill be committed to a Special Committee, consisting of twelve Deputies, to be nominated by the Committee of Selection; that the Special Committee so appointed be charged specially to consider Part II of the Bill, dealing with the proposed institution of Circuit Courts; that the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records; that the quorum be eight, and that it report to the Dáil not later than the 19th of this month of October."

In moving this resolution, I wish to say——

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

I must rule this motion out of order, because according to Standing Order 38, "a motion to rescind or amend a Resolution can only be made on notice, that shall specify the Resolution to be rescinded or amended, and furnish the terms of the Motion to be made; but no motion shall be allowed to appear on the Order Paper to rescind any Resolution of the Dáil within six months of the date of its adoption, except with the written assent of not less than 25 members of the Dáil."

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: On that point of order I had the opportunity of discussing this matter early in the day with the Ceann Comhairle himself, and I would draw your attention to the fact that on two occasions Motions of this kind have been accepted by the Ceann Comhairle.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE (at this stage) resumed the Chair.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I was relating to Leas-Cheann Comhairle the point I have already mentioned to you that the word "Resolution" in the Standing Order there, not merely by interpretation, but by previous practice, means some legislative Resolution, and not a Resolution applying to the business of this House. I was about to draw his attention to the fact that on two earlier occasions Resolutions of this kind were before the House, one in the name of Mr. Gavan Duffy, who was then a member of the Dáil, and the other in the name of Deputy Seán Milroy, one of which was defeated and the other accepted, but they were both allowed and this rule was not used against them.

It could quite clearly be interpreted that that rule would apply to a resolution of this kind, not a resolution touching legislation, but a resolution definitely affecting the business of the Dáil. The point I am putting to you now is a point of ordinary fairness, because when my resolution was handed in ten days ago there would then have been an opportunity for me to have got the requisite number of signatures, or to have attempted to have got the requisite number of signatures, but when you drew my attention to this possible interpretation of this Standing Order in spite of the previous practice of the Dáil, it was then already after half past one to-day, and very little opportunity was given me to comply with the Standing Order, as you yourself very fairly and courteously acknowledged. I am, therefore, submitting, if this is to be the interpretation to be given to the Standing Order, that the interpretation should be given after to-day and not on this occasion, when obviously I could have no opportunity to have complied with the Order, inasmuch as my motion was handed in ten days ago and accepted by you, and put on the Orders of the Day, without drawing my attention to the fact that Article 38 would be likely to be interpreted now and in the future in a sense different from the interpretation placed upon it in the past.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I do not think that we can be absolutely held to our previous practice in all matters, because obviously we were learning a great many things, and our practices and our decisions when we look back upon them enable us to see that possibly we may have made mistakes. It appears to me that in the case of Deputy Gavan Duffy, I allowed him to move a motion such as Deputy Figgis desires to move now. In the case of Deputy Milroy, Deputy Milroy was the promoter of the Bill in question, and I think a certain amount of latitude should be allowed to the promoters of a Bill in endeavouring to persuade the Dáil to adopt a procedure different from the procedure which had already been agreed upon. In this case, Deputy Figgis desires to alter the procedure which the promoters of the Bill desire to follow. It seems to me that unless there is a reasonable prospect of his succeeding the time of the Dáil should hardly be occupied with the discussion of such a motion. It was with that in view that Standing Order 38 was originally framed, so that a motion to rescind a decision already come to would have to have the support of 25 Deputies, indicating that it had fair support in the Dáil.

In this particular case I am prepared to agree to a decision of the Dáil in the matter, but I think it is only fair that a certain number of Deputies should support the idea of discussing this motion before we allow it to be discussed. I would be inclined to waive the matter of the twenty-five names in writing, and to say if 25 Deputies supported Deputy Figgis in his desire to have this matter discussed it may be discussed. It is merely a matter of preventing the Dáil being occupied with a debate which could have no useful conclusion. If we adopt as a practice that when we decide to consider a Bill in Committee of the whole Dáil, a Deputy can give notice to rescind that decision, it is obvious that two Deputies could occupy us for a considerable time on practically every Bill. It is in order to avoid such a contingency that I think some stop should be put to such procedure by insisting that the motion should have a certain amount of support before it could be discussed.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: There were just two points, with your permission, sir, that I would like to put before you, and with your further permission I would like to put them in succession, because what you have to say on one will affect the other. My friend, Deputy Wilson, had drawn my attention to the fact that Standing Order 38, to which you referred, does not say that the matter shall not be discussed. Standing Order 38 does specifically say that it shall not appear on the Order Paper.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Peccavi.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: But it has appeared on the Order Paper.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I am endeavouring to remedy my own defects. Standing Order No. 80 specifies that "a Bill which has passed its second reading shall, by motion made without notice of debate, be referred to the Dáil sitting in Committee, or to a special Committee for detailed consideration." The Bill was referred to the Dáil sitting in Committee. Deputy Figgis I think was present and he did not raise this point then.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I bow always to your ruling, and in this matter I sympathise with your desire to preserve order, and with the impartiality of your decision. The only point I would like to put to you, and I appeal therefore to your impartiality, is that I have spoken to one or two Deputies since you drew my attention to Standing Order No. 38, and their reply was that they presumed that I would be setting forward the reasons behind this resolution in moving the resolution. Within a matter of a few moments, without the reasons having been stated and made apparent by their statement, I suggest it would be hardly fair to call upon Deputies, without having heard reasons, either privately or in the Dáil, to express their consent before this resolution be proceeded with.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I will endeavour to meet Deputy Figgis by asking those who are in favour of the motion being proceeded with to stand up. Would that meet his point?

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: It is in the knowledge of one or two members of the Dáil that my attention has been drawn to this within the last half hour, that if this resolution of mine were to be debated, discussed and carried, that the Courts of Justice Bill would not come back again, or could not come back again to the Dáil in Committee, and they desire it to be discussed by the Dáil in whole Committee.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The report of a special Committee, if appointed, could be considered in Committee of the Dáil.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: There are a number of Deputies who are not in the House at the moment and who, when they had that possibility referred to them, were willing to support this, but without it they would not have been willing. Therefore, I say to put it in that form would not be very fair, in view of the fact that this motion appeared on the Order Papers.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Would those Deputies who are in favour of this motion now coming before us stand up?

Mr. Darrell Figgis stood up.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The motion has no support.

THE COURTS OF JUSTICE BILL, 1923.—COMMITTEE.

Section 1 put and agreed to.

SECTION 2.

This Act shall come into operation on such day or days as may be fixed therefor by any order, or orders of the Executive Council, and different days may be fixed for the commencement of the Act for different purposes, provided that no such day be later than months after the passing of this Act.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move amendment No. 1: "In line 24, immediately after the word 'than,' to insert the word 'five.'" You will find that there is a blank in the print of the Bill for the period within which the Act is to become operative. It is suggested that five months would allow a reasonable time for the preliminary organisation of the Courts. That would be the maximum.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question put: "That Section 2, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Section 3 put and agreed to.

SECTION 4.

A High Court of Justice in Saorstát Éireann shall be constituted under this Act, consisting of not more than six judges (namely, a President and five ordinary judges), who shall be styled in their respective appointments "President" or "Judge" as the case may be "of the High Court of Justice of Saorstát Éireann."

TOMAS O CONAILL: I dtaobh an Ailt seo, ba mhaith liom a rádh go mba cheart an teideal a bheith i nGaedhilg agus teideal gach Breitheamh an agus gach Cúirt fósta. Mar tá sé fé láthair ins an mBille, ní fhuil teideal Gaedhealach ach ar aon Bhreitheamh amháin— an Príomh-Bhreitheamh. Mar gheall ar sin, molfainn do'n Uachtarán an Alt seo agus Alt a cúig a athrú agus teidil Gaedhealach a chur isteach in ionad na dteideal atá ann fé láthair. What I have said in regard to this Section would also apply to Section 5. It is only right, in my opinion, that Irish titles should be given to all the Judges in the Courts. It is within our knowledge that the title Dáil Éireann, is now not looked upon as a translation of anything. That is because it was adopted right from the beginning. We have a case in point in the Garda Síochána. We hear people talking about a force called the Civic Guard, which does not really exist. I suggest that if we put in here the Irish titles and use them right from the beginning, they will come to be known and to be used by everybody as a matter of course. I do not presume to suggest what the titles should be, but I would urge the President to refer the matter to some of the Irish scholars whom he has at his disposal here, and to look into the question as to whether or not Irish titles for all the Judges of the Courts should not be designed and used right from the beginning.

FIONAN O LOINGSIGH: Táim ar aon intinn leis an Teachta ar an gceist seo. Creidim go bhfuil Coiste ag obair fé láthair ag socrú na h-ainmníochas nGaedhalach. Sin é an fáth nach bhfuil na h-ainmníochas i nGaedhilg ins an mBille go fóill. Nuair a socróchar na h-ainmníochas cuirfear isteach iad.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: An bhfuilir sásta le sin?

TOMAS O CONAILL: Táim.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I would like to put one question, with regard to Section 4, that is more or less applicable to many other parts of this Bill. The Bill has been drafted upon the report of the Judicial Committee and, unfortunately, the drafting in connection with the Bill is so nearly like, in general essentials, the report itself, that fundamental matters that ought to be provided for are not provided for at all. I take this Section 4 as an instance of what prevails in many other parts of this Bill (Section 4 quoted). The moment this Act is passed the old Judges cease to exist, because there is no Court in respect of which they can continue to exist until all of them, or some of them, are transferred to the new Court that has been created. But it is equally true that all the other officers of the Court are dispensed with. This Clause

6 o'clock. creates a new Court and attaches to it six judges, but attaches to it no other officers whatever. Neither the Registrar nor any of the other permanent officers is provided for. Of course, it will be said that rules of procedure at some subsequent date will provide the officials, but between the enactment of this Act and the adoption of these rules of procedure, there will be no officers for these Courts whatever. That is a fact that, I think, Deputies here little suspect. I think I am correct in saying that this matter was drawn to the attention of the Ministry in the last Dáil by Deputy Fitzgibbon, who intended to have raised it very forcibly on this occasion. Not only will there be no officers, in the ordinary static meaning of the word, but no officers in the general sense in which solicitors are officers of the Court. No provision has been made for them.

Captain REDMOND: There is an amendment down in connection with that.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I am dealing with Section 4. Is there an amendment to that?

Captain REDMOND: We have an amendment which deals with solicitors remaining officers of the Court.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I am dealing with this particular Section, and I do suggest, in respect of Section 4, that when the new Court has been created and the Judges have been attached to the Court, all the officers of that Court should, at the same time and in the same words, be created, in order that on the enactment of this Section the entire High Court shall come into being fully equipped not only in respect of Judges, but in respect of all the other officers, who are just as essential a part of the Court.

The PRESIDENT: I take it the Deputy has not read the whole of the amendments. If the Deputy had read the whole of the amendments he would have found provision for what he is addressing himself to the Dáil about. On page 13 of the amendments, Part 5, Miscellaneous Transitory Provisions, he will find this matter dealt with.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I am sorry. That is a new body of amendments. I had the old list of amendments in my hand and I had not read the new list.

Question put: "That Section 4 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Question: "That Section 5 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 6.

"The President of the High Court shall be ex-officio a Judge of the Supreme Court, and the Chief Justice shall be ex-officio a Judge of the High Court."

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move: "In lines 21 and 23 to delete the word 'a' and to insert in lieu thereof in each line the words 'an additional'." The object of this amendment is to make it clear that the ex-officio Judges are in addition to and not included in the Judges mentioned in Sections 4 and 5.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question: "That Section 6 as amended stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 7.

"The Chief Justice may, from time to time, request any ordinary Judge or Judges of the High Court to sit or the hearing of any appeal in the Supreme Court, and any Judge so requested shall sit on the hearing of such appeal and be an additional Judge of the Supreme Court for such appeal."

Professor MAGENNIS: It may have come under the notice of some Deputies that by an oversight I tabled an amendment which was, of course, out of order, dealing with the later section setting out the remuneration of those Judges. That was, to be more accurate, Section 14. The purpose I had in view in that amendment was not so much the fixation of a salary as bringing under notice a doctrine. It occurs to me that that doctrine could be brought under notice quite as effectually as a criticism of Section 7. We have here two orders of Judges of the higher jurisdiction. One of them is, in a sense, an inferior order to the other, and yet the onerous and highly special duties of the higher orders, to wit, those of the Supreme Court Judges, are to be discharged on occasions by Judges of the High Court, by Judges of the Court of first instance. There is to be a distinction between them in regard to salary and also to precedence, and yet it is contemplated that they may discharge the same duties under the same responsibilities. I would respectfully suggest that it would be a slight improvement of a very admirable measure if the Judges of the Supreme Court were kept apart and their duties reserved to the Judges of that special class. Two very different sets of endowment or human quality are called for in regard to these two orders. A Judge of the Court of first instance is largely dealing with juries, dealing with counsel who are arguing matters of fact as well as of law in the presence of juries. His knowledge of human nature enables him to appreciate by the demeanour of a witness under examination the credibility or otherwise of the testimony submitted, the power of handling counsel, and of discharging some of those duties, which you yourself, Sir, so excellently discharged—these call for a particular kind of training, and they are looked for in an advocate in the Courts. On the other hand, special aptitude and experience in the procedure of the Supreme Court are required to deal with more abstract things and with critical questions of law and the interpretation of law. The type of training and experience that fits a man for the position of a Supreme Court Judge is very special and this interchangeability of the two seems to me to be somewhat of a blot on the Bill. A Judge of the Court of first instance might very well be a part of the constitution of the Court of Appeal, but that he should, under certain circumstances, officiate as a Judge of the Supreme Court seems to me to be highly undesirable. I would press that upon the attention of the Minister in charge of the Bill in the hope that the matter will be re-considered.

The PRESIDENT: The justification for this arrangement is that we cannot afford to set up a larger Court of Appeal. If it were possible it would have been desirable to get a Court of Appeal quite independent from what the Deputy calls the inferior Courts by having a larger number of ordinary Judges. This particular practice is not unknown in this country. It may not be at all necessary to resort to it, and I should say, from all the expressions of opinion which we have got on this Bill, there must be a plethora of useful material out of which it may be possible to man the Bench, and if it is well-manned in the inferior Courts the necessity for an appeal to the Superior Courts may not arise so often in the future.

Question: "That Sections 7, 8 and 9 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 10.

"The Judges of the High Court and the Supreme Court shall be addressed in the manner to be determined by the Rules to be made under this part of this Act and shall have, in all respects, save as in this Act is otherwise expressly provided, equal power, authority and jurisdiction, one with another."

Professor MAGENNIS: I move: "In line 47 to insert after the word 'addressed' the words 'officially by titles in Irish'." I have been anticipated by Deputy O'Connell to some extent in the idea and spirit of this amendment. My purpose was to draw attention incidentally to the letter addressed by the President to the Judicial Committee on whose report much of the present Bill was founded and, if you will permit me, I will read it.

“In the long struggle for the right to rule in our own country there has been no sphere of the administration lately ended which impressed itself on the minds of our people as a standing monument of alien government more than the system, the machinery, and the administration of law and justice, which supplanted in comparatively modern times the laws and institutions till then a part of the living national organism. The body of laws and the system of judicature so imposed upon this nation were English (not even British) in their seed. English in their growth, English in their vitality. Their ritual, their nomenclature, were only to be understood by the student of the history of the people of Southern Britain. A remarkable and characteristic product of the genius of that people, the manner of their administration prevented them from striking root in the fertile soil of this nation.”

Our determination was to keep Ireland Irish and, just as a beginning has been made in the Dáil and had already been made in the University by promoting, or attempting to promote, the general use of the ancient language of the country, it is desirable that in the law courts especially a beginning should be made to use the national language for business purposes. It will be in the recollection of Deputies that not very long ago one of the Courts refused an affidavit in Irish unless it were stamped again, and we had a debate on the subject in the Third Dáil.

I do not want to repeat what I said then, but I may briefly say that I drew a parallel between the situation here and what was the case of the Anglo-Saxon under the Norman settlement. All the respectable people during the Norman period used Norman French. It was the language of the higher clergy. Above all it was the language of the Law Courts. In that way the native speech of the people was supplanted. It is most desirable that in the education of the barrister and solicitor, Irish should be included, and as an inducement to that the purpose here was to set up the practice, a very small thing, of addressing Judges by Irish titles in terms of respect of Irish character. On consideration of the amendment I feel satisfied that, inasmuch, both in the recommendation of the Judicial Committee, and further in the later section of the Bill setting out the constitution of the rule-making authority and the matters to be dealt with by the rule-making authority, there is provision taken which ought to be deemed sufficient provision for arranging under the form of rules and regulations the title and mode of address. Therefore, I would ask permission to withdraw this amendment inasmuch as it is unnecessary for no other purpose than the purpose of propaganda, the purpose for which I used it just now.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Question—“That Sections 10, 11 and 12 stand part of the Bill”—put and agreed to.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: With the permission of the Dáil, I wish to withdraw the new Sub-Section to be inserted after Section 12. I find there is an article, 68 of the Constitution, whereby the safeguard I sought to embody has already been provided. The amendment is, under the circumstances, superfluous.

Amendment not moved.

SECTION 13.

The declaration to be taken by every judge of the High Court and the Supreme Court on appointment shall be as follows:—

I, _____, do solemnly and sincerely promise and declare that I will duly and faithfully and to the best of my skill and power execute the office of President (or Judge as the case may be) of the High Court of Justice of Saorstát Eireann (or Chief Justice or Judge of the Supreme Court of Justice of Saorstát Eireann as the case may be).

Such declaration shall be made and subscribed by the Chief Justice in the presence of the President of the Executive Council, and by each of the other judges of the High Court and the Supreme Court in the presence of the Chief Justice.

Professor MAGENNIS: I beg to move to delete the section and to substitute therefor:—

“ Every Judge of the High Court and of the Supreme Court shall on appointment be duly sworn in manner to be determined in manner appointed by Rules to be made under this part of this Act.”

I may seem, by the repetition of this amendment through the three parts of the Bill, to be particularly bent upon the administration of an oath. My objection—I should put it in this way—is rather to the precise form of declaration, inserted in the Bill. I want something which will mark the solemnity of the appointment of a Judge, and in that way shall be indicative of the high responsibility attaching to the office, something to impress the popular imagination with the character of the Court as the administrative instrument of law and in fact as the protection of whatever of civilisation we can achieve. With all respect I submit that this declaration savours rather of the kind of formula which anyone appointed to a minor office might repeat—his undertaking to do his best while in office and that at the end of the term it shall not be a reproach against him that he did not do his best. I shall be told, no doubt, that the whole trend in recent years is against the taking of an oath on the assumption of public offices. That is a fact, I know, but it is precisely because it is a fact that I wish to resist the tendency in so far as regards Ireland at any rate. In England the so-called education that prevails there has been productive of an attitude of mind which is now politely called agnosticism. People have thrown over religious beliefs, and politeness requires that those who still cling to religion in some form or another should speak as if they had none. If we are casting away English traditions in other respects why should we go out of our way to adopt them now? We are doing away with the old Courts and old procedure. Is it not more in consonance with the tradition of our own past that God and His government of the world should be recognised on solemn occasions such as are dealt with here? No doubt men will take an oath intending to interpret it according to their own peculiar fashion. There is no binding declaration that could be framed that would have a coercive force over those who are unconscionable. On the other hand it will have a binding force. It will have even a useful force inasmuch as those who listen to the judgment of a Judge will remember that he has solemnly called upon God to witness that he administers the law of the land without fear, favour or affection between all the citizens, and they will recognise at any rate in some measure that he is there not as the mere private individual they know him outside the precincts of the Court, but officially clothed with more than ordinary office and discharging in the name of the State one of its highest functions as a sacred trust. It is as part of the ritual and impressiveness on the part of public imagination that I contend for this and not because I conceive that any Judge who would be disposed to abuse his high office would be restrained by the fact of having an oath of a different form administered to him.

The PRESIDENT: I will undertake to reconsider this matter to see how far it is possible to meet the point raised by the Deputy on the next stage.

Professor MAGENNIS: I am satisfied.

Amendment withdrawn.

Question: “ That Section 13 stand part of the Bill,” put and agreed to.

SECTION 14.

The remuneration of the judges of the High Court and of the Supreme Court shall be as follows:—

The President of the High Court shall receive £3,000 per annum, and each ordinary judge thereof £2,500 per annum, and the Chief Justice shall receive £4,000 per annum, and each judge of the Supreme Court £3,000 per annum.

Amendment by Mr. BEAMISH:

In line 23, at the end of the Section, to add the following words:—

“ Provided that where under the provisions of Section 17, a Judge of the Superior Court of Judicature in Ireland is appointed a Judge of the High Court or of the Supreme Court, the person so appointed shall receive a salary not less than his existing salary and his appointment as a Judge of the High Court or the Supreme Court shall not prejudice any right of retirement or pension on retirement which such person would have enjoyed if he had not been so appointed."

Mr. BEAMISH: In view of an assurance which I have received from the Attorney-General, I beg to withdraw this amendment.

Amendment not moved.

Captain REDMOND: On Section 14 I would like to say, in conjunction with my friend, Deputy Magennis, that I had an amendment down which was distinctly out of order but which, at any rate, showed how we stood in regard to the proposed salaries of these Judges. What I would like the Committee to understand is that my view was not so much that these salaries should be increased, but rather that the practice adopted elsewhere should be put into operation here, and that is that all Judges should be placed on an equal footing with the exception, perhaps, of the President of the High Court and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. That is a practice in operation in England to-day. It works very well there, and we have just passed Section 7, which renders it possible for the Chief Justice to obtain the assistance of the Judges of the High Court. Therefore, they are to that extent interchangeable, and I think that it would be advantageous to the State if it could be possible to have all Judges placed upon an equal footing, with the exceptions that I have mentioned, and I would ask the Government to take this suggestion into their consideration.

The PRESIDENT: I do not know whether the Deputy has seen the Report of the Judiciary Committee. There were two or three Judges on it, and one of them an ex-Lord Chancellor, and the Bill contains their recommendations. On page 23 the Report states that the salaries of the members of the Supreme Court be as follows:—The President, £4,000, and each Judge £3,000 per year. On the previous page the salary for the President of the High Court was £3,000, and of the other members of the High Court £2,500. On this Committee there was certainly a large majority of the legal profession, and ordinarily one would expect that they would make recommendations which, in their opinion, were fair recommendations. We know that Judges are paid much higher salaries in England than here, but this is certainly a country which cannot compete, I think, even in such an important profession as the legal profession, with the salaries paid in England, and I should say that I think, on examination, it will be found that in other countries they are not so well paid as in England. It is a time for economy. We have very large sums to meet under Article 10 of the Treaty, and even if the sums were inadequate—and our advice is that they are not; that they are fair—we are certainly approaching a period in the history of our country when economy must be practised, and I think that the Deputy ought not to press his recommendation in this case. Generally speaking, these salaries compare favourably with the salaries that were paid before, and having regard to all the circumstances, I do not know that there would be any justification for the Government to recommend to the Dáil higher salaries than the Committee recommended, so that I am afraid I cannot undertake to give favourable consideration to the recommendation made by the Deputy.

Major COOPER: The President has not quite met the case that Deputy Redmond put in one respect. I am absolutely certain that the Government wishes to do what is fair to the Judges, but he has not met the case. We think that they should get equal pay for equal work. Certainly I do not wish to increase the salaries of the Judges of the High Court, and I would rather reduce the salaries of the Judges of the Supreme Court, but as long as there is the possibility of promotion for a Judge that Judge to a certain extent loses his independence, and for an extra £500 a year a man might be inclined to become what people might think to be unduly subservient to the people who have it in their power to promote him to an extra £500 a year. That is why I should like to see all the Judges placed on the same level. I think the principle of giving Judges employed on similar work a similar rate of pay is a sound one on the whole, and I wish the President would consider whether something could not be done on the Report Stage or in another place.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Deputy Cooper has stated what I was about to state, that the President has entirely misconceived Deputy Redmond's point. I only wish to add that there should be nothing that would induce the question of promotion from the High Court to the Supreme Court being considered except on the one question only, the fitness of the Judge for that other kind of work, and no question of promotion with regard to salary. I think it is a principle that has been generally adopted in the other countries to which the President has appealed, that Judges ought to be paid on an equal basis. It does not necessarily mean any extra expenditure. It might mean a reduction in the expenses, but it does enforce a very salutary and very wise principle.

Mr. HEWAT: In considering this matter the Committee gave very great consideration to the question of the Judges' salaries. The point that has been raised that they should be all equal would, I think, be wrong, because the different Courts are on a different level, and must be so in the ordinary administration of justice. The amounts put down as salaries are not as high as in Great Britain, but I think that that principle, and the President's remarks on that, apply a great deal more widely than in this case. In our Free State we cannot aim to give any men the enormous salaries they get on the other side of the water.

Captain REDMOND: It was never suggested.

Mr. HEWAT: I thought it was in your amendment that was withdrawn.

I would like to say that I think the body of the people will recognise that the status of the Judges, as defined in the Bill before us, is safeguarded, that the salaries attaching to the positions are adequate, all things considered, and that the Circuit Judge promoted to the Supreme Court would naturally look for additional emoluments in connection with his higher status.

Captain REDMOND: Perhaps I may be permitted to explain that I never suggested for a moment that Irish Judges should be paid a salary equal to that of English Judges. What I was suggesting was that the system which was in force there, namely, that all Judges, with the exception of the three I mentioned in England—and it may be two in Ireland—should be placed on an equal salary, and on an equal footing. All Judges in England are paid £5,000 per annum, with the exceptions I have mentioned. I have never suggested and would not dream of suggesting that any Judge in Ireland would be paid that sum.

The PRESIDENT: I do not understand Deputy Cooper's and Deputy Figgis's criticism of my statement. This Bill represents as nearly as it is possible to represent the opinions presented to us by the Committee asked by us to advise us on this matter. These recommendations are their recommendations, and if Deputy Figgis has any misgivings about it, if he looks up page 23 on the constitution of the Court, he will find that one or more Judges, on the invitation of the President of the Supreme Court, may act in the Court of Appeal, and immediately underneath that the two salaries are mentioned, and on the preceding page £2,500 a year. If that has not a bearing on the question raised I do not know what would have.

Surely we are not going to start on such business as this on the principle and on the general line of argument that because a certain recommendation has been made in a certain way by the Judiciary Committee, that, therefore, we as a legislature are rendered helpless in face of that suggestion. We retain, surely, our rights here as a legislature. I know from members of the Committee that it is not their desire that they should be used, or that their report should be used, here in any way as a cudgel. The principle is not the question of the size of the salaries, whether they be large or small. The principle that has been stated is the principle that has been adopted as a result of experience in other countries, and that principle is that all Judges in the Central Courts of the State should be placed upon an equal level. If the President states that the country cannot afford high salaries, very well, let the Supreme Court Judges be reduced to the rate of the High Court Judges, but at least keep them on the same basis.

Mr. GOREY: If the Deputies who have spoken would suggest that the salaries should be £2,000 a year for all the Judges, I think they would have the support of the Deputies on these benches. It would be something definite, at all events, to go upon. I do think, though, that it makes for fair administration and that the Judges would be more independent of the Executive by putting them on the same level. I think that is the point that Deputy Redmond makes, and it would appeal to most people. I will not agree if they are going to be raised to the Supreme Court standing. I think the point put forward is a sound point, and would make the Courts of Justice more independent of any Executive that might be, and that they would not use their position to please the Executive in order to get promotion. That, I think, is the point made.

Professor MAGENNIS: The amendment was tabled at the special request of the representatives of the Bar Council of Ireland, and the case as presented by them to us who tabled the amendment, which was out of order by the way, was that through their experience of the past history of the Bar in Ireland there were men of this temperament, that so long as there was a salary higher than that of which they were in receipt their energies will be devoted by intrigue and by every variety of device that they could encompass to secure that high salary, and that that was not a healthy spirit to develop in the future Bar. They pointed out that the representation that the money would come out of the taxpayers' pocket was a mistake, that a large part of these expenses are defrayed out of the litigant's pocket. There is scarcely a step that a man engaged in litigation can take in which he is not called on to disburse heavy fees, stamp duties, and what not, and it is from these well-springs of finance that the monies are procurable, and that, therefore, it is the interest of the litigant who has to pay through the nose for the law he receives to have the highest and best type of Judge that the money is able to secure. It is true that the Judges in Great Britain receive a uniform salary of £5,000 a year, and that is spoken of as if it had no influence on or no relation to our present problem, at the very moment when the cream of the Bar, or a large part of it at any rate, is migrating to the other side. From the very first moment that Irish independence was in the air distinguished members of the Bar began to get called to the English Bar, and have taken up residence there, and everyone has to admit that the attraction of higher emoluments, and of greater dignity held out within two and a half hours' steaming of where we stand, has an important effect, and will, in spite of patriotism, continue to have an important effect in diverting from the service of the Free State the better legal brain. Whether we like it or not that is a fact we have to face. Are we going to retain in the service of Ireland the best legal minds and training and experience? I have no doubt we shall be told this represents something like the average of the highest incomes at the Bar in Dublin. It possibly does, but let us remember that in the past, and more particularly in England, men in receipt of huge incomes at the Bar did not take judge-ships until they were considerably advanced in years, until their medical adviser had told them they could no longer endure the strain of the work that was necessitated for the earning of these incomes, and that the medical practitioner would not be responsible for their health unless they went on the Bench. Then you had the spectacle of very ancient lawgivers, on the Bench, with criticism in the Press and Parliament with regard to their mental incapacity.

Again I say, let us not follow British traditions in these things, but let us try to get younger judges from the beginning, men who are in the prime of life, and who are able to give their best. With a view to that, which I think is a laudable object, we should have the remuneration of the High Court Judges something which has a real relation to the amount of income that it is within the competence of such men to earn. There is another thing, too, which will arise later on, by which this matter can be prejudiced, to wit—the relative position of the Circuit Court Judge and the Judge of the Higher Judicature Court. £2,500 for the High Court of first instance is, I suggest, at any rate as a venture, by way of a guess, arrived at, as Deputy Hewat himself almost told us, in order to have something for the Circuit Judge to move up to in his ascent by way of promotion. I shall have something to say, later on, with regard to the salary of the Circuit Judge, with a view to showing that it is not such as to secure the services of the men we wish to secure. You will not be able to take away from the practice of the Bar the man whom you would like to seduce from practice, and to put on your Bench.

Why not meet the equities of the situation by increasing their salary in the inferior courts? I use the word inferior, I would remind the President, in its technical sense in regard to the Court below. I am not disparaging it in any way. I think in many ways it is the more valuable court. You must have some distinction between them, and if £2,000 and allowances for expenses were an equitable salary for a Judge in the Circuit Court, then there is no reasonable relation between that and the £2,500 set down here. These are some of the considerations that weighed with members of the Bar. No doubt all this seems pleading for one profession. It looks like an attempt to raise the wages on behalf of a trades union.

Mr. GOREY: The oldest trade union.

Professor MAGENNIS: Yes. But on the other hand, remember that by a very natural propensity the member of the Bar is anxious to have an income comparable with that of his rival in medicine or in trade and commerce. There is the public advantage or utility to be considered also, and I have tried to impress upon the Dáil, as far as I could, that point of view. I do not care personally whether the remuneration of the Bar be high or low. It does not concern me as an individual. But, looking at it from the point of view of how it affects the State, I do suggest to you that personal ambition, personal striving, men's sense of their value ought to be taken into account when we are considering legislation with the idea of doing the best for the country. £2,500 for one set and £3,000 for another set, and yet the Judges who are to receive £2,500 are to be in their own sphere like the British Jack-Tar who is soldier and sailor, too. They are to be Judges of the Supreme Court and to officiate in the Courts of Appeal as well. Yet prudence and status are to be determined, and one of the factors must be salary. Therefore, for all purposes they are equal except for the purpose of remuneration. When it comes to be a question of the pay they are to receive they are inferior judges; when it comes to the question of the discharge of duty to the State, they are superior judges. That seems to me an anomaly.

Question put: "That Section 14 stand part of the Bill.

Agreed.

SECTION 15.

There shall be granted to each Judge of the High Court and the Supreme Court who retires after 15 years' service or upwards in the said Courts or either of them, or vacates his office owing to age or permanent infirmity, a pension to be continued during his life of two-thirds of his salary at the time he ceases to act as judge.

Professor MAGENNIS: I move:

"In line 25 to insert after the word 'retires' the word 'voluntarily' and to delete from the words 'or vacates' to the word 'infirmity,' lines 26 and 27, inclusive. And at the end of the section, line 29, to add the words 'any Judge, however, of the said Courts, or either of them, who by reason of age or permanent incapacity is obliged to vacate his office shall be granted a pension according to a scale to be determined by Rules to be made under this part of this Act, and sanctioned by the Minister of Finance'.

The first part of the amendment is a very small thing. It is a proposal to introduce the word "voluntarily" after the word "retires." The only reason for that is that a Judge who has retired is retired, but the Judge who has retired is not eligible for this Superannuation Allowance, and, therefore, for the sake of greater clearness and unmistakability, I suggest to make the reference to the Judge who voluntarily or spontaneously withdraws from office. It is not of great consequence, I must confess. But the second part of the amendment is one for which I do claim more value inasmuch as, unlike the contention of the Bar Council of which I made myself the mouthpiece in the last Section, this is an effort to save the public purse. It is obvious to anyone that a barrister might be elevated to the Bench and then within a few years, possibly within a few months, may develop an incurable disease. He might have paralysis or might suffer from dementia, or he might be incapacitated in some other way, and under this provision as it stands he would be eligible for a retiring allowance of two-thirds of his salary. Therefore, I propose that the retiring allowance in such cases should be calculated and should be determined upon some scale, and I suggest that that scale should be drawn up by the Rule-making authority. I do not know that the amendment is in the best possible form, but I recommend the idea of it at any rate to the acceptance of the Minister.

The PRESIDENT: The first part of it is certainly acceptable. The second part I would undertake to have considered on the next stage and see if it is possible to meet this by either adopting this amendment or putting up one on the same lines.

Professor MAGENNIS: Then I beg leave to withdraw it.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Question: "That Section 15 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 16.

The remuneration and pension payable to every Judge of the High Court and of the Supreme Court under this Act shall be charged upon and be payable out of the Central Fund of Saorstát Eireann. Such remuneration and pension shall grow due from day to day, but shall be payable to the persons entitled thereto or to their executors or administrators on the usual quarterly days of payment or at such other periods in every year as the Minister for Finance may from time to time determine.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move the following amendment:—

"In line 33, to insert immediately after the word 'Eireann' and before the full stop, the words 'or the growing produce thereof.'"

The effect of it is that the Judges' salaries and pensions will be paid out of the revenue of the Central Fund and not out of capital.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 16, as amended, put and agreed to.

Sections 17, 18, and 19 put and agreed to.

SECTION 20.

There shall be transferred to the Chief Justice and exercisable by him all such jurisdiction in lunacy and minor matters as was lately exercised by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and is at the passing of this Act exercised by the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland.

Professor MAGENNIS: I was proposing to insert, in line 2, after the words "minor matters," the words "and all other matters," but the point intended to be covered by my amendment is better dealt with in the amendment that follows, and consequently I withdraw my amendment in the interests of the other. It is not desirable to transfer jurisdiction in general terms, and the later amendment transfers it specifically in detail.

Amendment, by leave. withdrawn.

Capt. W. A. REDMOND: I beg to move the addition to the Section of two new Sub-sections, as follows:—

(2) "There shall be transferred to the Chief Justice and exercisable by him all such jurisdiction in relation to solicitors as was lately exercised by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and is at the passing of this Act exercised by the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland."

(3) "There shall be transferred to the Chief Justice and vested in him the appointment of Notaries Public and of Commissioners to administer Oaths of the High Court and Supreme Court."

I have been anticipated in this regard by Deputy Figgis, but I think I have also been followed by Deputy Duggan, and if Deputy Duggan can assure me that Part 5 covers this amendment of mine, I shall have much pleasure in withdrawing it. In Part 5 other officers are mentioned. These two new Sub-sections are only transferring jurisdiction in relation to solicitors from the present authorities to their future substitutes, and also in regard to number 3 it is transferring the appointment of public notaries and commissioners to administer oaths from the present authorities to the future substitutes.

The PRESIDENT: In the last Dáil I think Deputy Fitzgibbon raised this matter. We will accept these two new Sub-sections.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Section 20, as amended, put and agreed to.

SECTION 21.

From and after the commencement of this Act the several jurisdictions which by this Act are transferred to the High Court, and the Supreme Court, and the Chief Justice, shall cease to be exercised except by the High Court and the Supreme Court and the Chief Justice respectively. Provided that in all proceedings which shall have been fully heard but in which judgment shall not have been given, or having been given shall not have been perfected at the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, such judgment may be given and perfected respectively after the commencement of this Act, in the name of the same Court and of the same judges and officers and generally in the same manner as if this Act had not passed; and such judgment shall take effect as if it had been duly perfected before the commencement of this Act, and every order of any court or judge whose jurisdiction is hereby transferred to the High Court or to the Supreme Court or to the Chief Justice (which order shall have been duly perfected at any time before the commencement of this Act) may be executed and enforced, and, if necessary, amended or discharged by the High Court and the Supreme Court and the Chief Justice respectively, in the same manner as if it had been an order of the High Court or of the Supreme Court or of the Chief Justice and all proceedings whether civil or criminal which shall be pending in the Courts, whose jurisdiction is so transferred as aforesaid, at the commencement of this Act shall be continued as follows:—(that is to say) in case of proceedings on appeal pending in the existing Court of Appeal, the same shall be continued before the Supreme Court, and in case of all other proceedings (save proceedings in lunacy and in minor matters) the same shall be continued before the High Court, and in case of all proceedings in lunacy and in minor matters the same shall be continued before the Chief Justice. The said Courts and the Chief Justice respectively shall have the same jurisdiction in relation to all such proceedings as if such proceedings had been commenced before them respectively and continued before them respectively down to the point at which the transfer takes place, and so far as relates to the manner of procedure such proceedings or any of them may be continued either in the same or the like manner as they would have been continued, in the respective courts from which they shall have been transferred, as aforesaid, or according to the course of the respective courts to which they shall be transferred, so far as the same be applicable thereto.

Capt. REDMOND: I am moving to insert the following new Sub-section before Section 21:—

“ All existing solicitors of the Supreme Court and all existing Commissioners to administer Oaths shall be transferred to and become Solicitors and Commissioners respectively of the High Court and of the Supreme Court.”

I think that has been dealt with by the new amendment.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I do not think that would come under Part 5.

The PRESIDENT: No, but it is acceptable. Deputy Fitzgibbon raised that point.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Section 21, as amended, put and agreed to.

SECTION 22.

The jurisdiction vested in and transferred to the High Court and the Supreme Court and the Chief Justice respectively shall be exercised so far as regards procedure and practice generally, including liability as to costs, in the manner provided by such rules of Court as may be made pursuant to this Part of this Act, and where no provision is contained in any such rules of Court and as long as there shall be no rule with reference thereto, it shall be exercised as nearly as possible in the same manner in which it might have been exercised by the respective Courts from which such jurisdiction shall have been transferred, by this Act.

Capt. REDMOND: I wish to move the insertion of the following new Section before Section 22:—

“ If in any case not expressly provided for by this Act a liability to any duty or any authority or power not incident to the administration of Justice in any Court whose jurisdiction is transferred by this Act to the High Court or to the Supreme Court respectively shall have been imposed or conferred by any Statute, law or custom upon the Judges or any Judge of any such Courts, every Judge of the High Court or of the Supreme Court as the case may be except where otherwise expressly directed by this Act shall be capable of performing and exercising and shall be liable to perform and exercise every such duty, authority and power in the same manner as if this Act had not passed and as if he had been duly appointed the successor of a Judge liable to perform such duty or possessing such authority or power before the passing of this Act. Any such duty, authority or power imposed or conferred by any Statute law or custom in any such case as aforesaid upon the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland or the Master of the Rolls shall be performed and exercised by the Chief Justice.”

The members of the Committee may think that this is a very formidable Section, but in reality it amounts to very little. Words, they say, sometimes are given to us to conceal our thoughts, but in this case the thought is a very simple one. This Section is really only a continuing Section. It proposes to continue certain powers that are already conferred by former enactments on holders of high judicial office, such as the present Lord Chief Justice and the present Master of the Rolls, and to continue those powers to their successors. The present Master of the Rolls, for instance, is ex-officio head of the Charity Commissioners and I should think it would be most desirable that his successors should occupy the same position. He is also Keeper of the Rolls. The Lord Chief Justice of Ireland is ex-officio the Governor of several public institutions. Among other positions he occupies is that of a visitor to Trinity College, and, I am reminded by Deputy Sir J. Craig, the College of Physicians. The new Section that I propose means merely that these powers which are not exactly incident to the administration of justice in the various Courts should be transferred to the successors of these existing judges.

Mr. HEWAT: Is this a matter that really comes under this Bill at all?

Capt. REDMOND: I think it does come under this Bill, because in virtue of their present office the holders of these offices occupy the positions and have the power that I refer to. When the existing judgeships shall be abolished these positions shall be vacant, and I am only suggesting that their successors should be those in the same position.

Mr. HEWAT: I suggest that this is a matter for the institutions referred to by Deputy Redmond. If alterations are necessary they should be made by those institutions rather than that we should provide successors. I presume these offices were filled in an ex-officio capacity by resolution of these bodies, and they appointed the Lord Chief Justice or somebody else as ex-officio members, and the appointments were not made by the Dáil or its predecessor in any Act of Parliament.

Sir JAMES CRAIG: The arguments used by Deputy Hewat do not apply as far as some institutions are 7 o'clock. concerned, because under the Act of Parliament, in connection with Trinity College, and under the Act of Parliament in connection with the College of Physicians, these men are appointed ex-officio—the Lord Chief Justice and the Master of the Rolls. If disputes arise they have to go before these gentlemen, and also questions of finance, for instance, in the case of the College of Physicians, which deals with Sir Patrick Dun's estate. The accounts of this estate have to be submitted to these visitors of the College, who were appointed by Act of Parliament.

Professor THRIFT: I think the statements made are not quite accurate because the visitor to Trinity College is not appointed by Act of Parliament at all. He was appointed by King's Letter. I think the question raised by Deputy Redmond is a very important one and deserves more consideration than we can give to it on this, the first time that the Bill has been before us. I would suggest that the point raised should be reserved for further consideration and taken, say, on the Report Stage.

Mr. HEWAT: I submit that what Deputy Sir James Craig has stated has confirmed rather than contradicted what I said. He states distinctly it was the Act of Parliament that Trinity College has got that confers this ex-officio position on the Judge. Now this is not a private Bill for Trinity College or otherwise. It is a Judiciary Bill, and I submit that the ex-officio appointments that are referred to have absolutely nothing to do with our Bill here, and that the proper way to approach that subject would be to get their Bills altered or amended if it is thought desirable.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I think if you were to accept Deputy Hewat's reading of this amendment you would have ruled it out of order in the first instance. If it has nothing to do with this Bill, therefore it should never have appeared on the Order Paper. It must be remembered that many of these institutions carry on charitable work, and are you, I ask, going to put them to the expense of coming here to get a special Act of the Dáil to do a certain thing when you can put in an omnibus clause in this Bill that would give them the same powers and save them all this expense?

Captain REDMOND: In reply to Deputy Hewat, I just wish to say that we are now abolishing these existing Judges, and one of the powers appertaining to the holding of the office of these judges was the exercise of these ex-officio powers and duties. Surely when we are abolishing the existing office it is only right that we should make some provision whereby their successors should be in precisely a similar position in regard to these most important institutions, as some of them are. Take, for instance, the Charitable Donations and Bequests. That is a most important institution, and I think it would be unfair for us not to place the new substituted judge in a similar position and to give that institution the benefit of his experience and knowledge, just as it had the previous benefit of the existing judges.

Professor MAGENNIS: There is a consideration that I suggest has been overlooked in the argument of Deputies Redmond and Hewat. It is so long since some Deputies read the report of the Judiciary Committee that it is easy to understand that they have forgotten some of its details. The recommendation there, which is acted upon in the framing of the Bill, gets rid of separate jurisdictions of every sort in the sense of having no more Masters of the Rolls in Equity Jurisdiction, no Bankruptcy Judge sitting in a Bankruptcy Court, and all the rest. They are all, by a Section of this Bill, placed on an equal footing as Judges of first instance. In other words, the reform which was begun in the eighties in the English Courts has been carried out to the last letter. There was a time when there was a Court of Exchequer and a Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and there was a Court of Common Pleas, the President of which had his own distinctive title. These things were abolished, and the Lord Chief Baron was known in a friendly jocular manner as "the last of the Barons." The title remained to him after the office had gone. In this present Bill the reform has been carried still further. The method of one Court, one Judge, if I may put it that way, is carried out thoroughly, and so if there were functions or duties attached to the Master of the Roll's position ex-officio, with the disappearance of that separate jurisdiction that ought to disappear, rather than be renewed in a Judiciary Bill on the assumption, which is not sustainable, that there will be someone among the Judges of the new Court who will occupy a position comparable with the office of the Master of the Rolls. With all respect, I submit that there is a mistake underlying the contention that there is anyone to continue in the office of Master of the Rolls, but there is one office that does persist—the one that was formerly known as the Lord Chancellor. The office persists, but the title is that of Chief Justice or Chief Judge of all the Judges, and the jurisdiction which belonged to the Lord Chancellor, and which was recently transferred on the extinction of that office to the Lord Chief Justice, now passes by a special operation of this enactment to the equivalent office. That, so far as I can see from a study of the report prepared by the Judiciary Committee and of this Bill, is the only thing in this measure that is a continuation of anything in the nature of separate powers. I would suggest, with all respect, that this amendment, as Deputy Hewat has contended, is not germane to this measure.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: The point made by Deputy Magennis is only correct in what may be described as the strictly judicial functions of the Judges concerned, and not in respect of the extra-judicial functions—functions attached, as it were, by passing. One of them that I am concerned with more particularly, and one of very great importance, and one that may prove of very great importance in the future—affects the records of this country, which ought to be published and are published under the authority of the Master of the Rolls, as he is at present known. That is strictly not a judicial capacity at all. His judicial capacity, I believe I am correct in stating, has grown out of the other functions he held originally. But the fact remains that whereas the exercise of his judicial capacity is merged in the new Court, this other function is not so merged, and should be merged and should be definitely attached either to the whole body or to certain persons of the whole body.

Major COOPER: On a point of order am I right in saying that on Wednesday evenings Government business stops at 7 o'clock, and I suggest that as it is after 7 now this business should be adjourned?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: That is so if private business was down on the paper, but as there is no other business on the agenda Government business proceeds until half-past eight.

Major COOPER: Standing Order 74 says: "The Order Paper shall be confined to questions and Ministerial business on Tuesdays and Thursdays, during the entire sitting, on Wednesday until 7 o'clock p.m., and on Friday till 6 o'clock p.m. Motions or Bills, if any, moved by private Teachtaí, and appearing on the Order Paper, shall be taken during the remaining period of ordinary sittings on Wednesdays and Fridays: Provided that a Minister may move after Questions on any Wednesday or Friday, that, on that day, specified Ministerial business shall not be interrupted if under consideration at the time fixed for taking up motions or Bills to be moved by private Teachtaí. Such motions may be proposed without notice and shall be decided without amendment." I hope the President does not think that I want to obstruct the Bill, but I think that we have got into a tangle, and if I am right in suggesting to report progress that would enable him to find a way out of it, and tell us to-morrow what he is going to do.

The PRESIDENT: The usual practice when private members table business on Wednesdays or Fridays is to take it at 7 o'clock. Unless Government business is pressing we allow private business to go on on these days. Towards the end of last session we had to make an appeal for the whole time for Government business, but ordinarily private business will go on at the time indicated. I would say that this particular amendment appears to me to be very far-reaching in character, and I do not think I could recommend the Dáil to accept an amendment without seeing precisely where it is that we are going. If there are emoluments, duties and offices other than those we prescribe in this Bill, we ought to have them defined, and knowing what they are, see how best to distribute them if it is considered advisable to distribute them. If they are duties of an onerous character, taking up a considerable amount of time of a Judge, it might be well that they be re-distributed between three or four Judges, but I do not think that I could advise the Dáil to pass an amendment so sweeping in its character as this without much closer examination.

Captain REDMOND: Perhaps the President would consider it further, Vol. 5.

and I might again bring it up on Report stage.

The PRESIDENT: I will have some enquiries made into it.

Professor THRIFT: Perhaps in considering the matter, as other public bodies are involved, the President would consider the advisability of consulting these other bodies.

Professor MAGENNIS: Perhaps the President would also consider the fact that the title of the Bill is "The Courts of Justice Bill."

The PRESIDENT: Yes, it was my impression that this matter could not come in in any case.

Professor O'SULLIVAN: I think you would require a separate Bill to transfer the powers that are referred to by Deputy Sir James Craig.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I take it the amendment is withdrawn. Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Major COOPER: Would the President consider my suggestion to report Progress? He has got a good many clauses, and we are coming now to the most important ones. I think that strictly under Standing Order 74, to which I have already referred, he is not in order in taking Government business after 7 o'clock.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: It was the usual practice when there was no private members' business down on the agenda to go on. Of course, it is open to the President to move to report Progress if he likes.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: It is open to any Deputy to move to report Progress.

Professor MAGENNIS: Is it not clear that the rule referred to by Deputy Major Cooper is meant to deal with the situation where there is private business to be transacted, and where the Minister asks for the time of the Dáil for Ministerial business? That, I submit, has no application whatever in a case such as the present, where there is not on the Paper any private business whatever. I submit that in a case like this the business in progress continues automatically; there is nothing to stop it until we come to the ordinary hour for adjournment.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

This question was never raised before. The Dáil sits according to the Standing Order between the hours of three and half-past eight p.m., and I think it is quite in order for the business to proceed.

Professor MAGENNIS: I beg to move:—

To add at the end of the Section the words:—

“ Provided that nothing in this Act, nor in any rule made under its provisions, shall take away, or prejudice, the right of any party to an action to have questions of fact tried by a jury in such cases as he might heretofore of right have so required, nor upon any trial before a Jury to have the issues submitted and left to the jury before which the same shall come for trial with proper and complete direction by the judge upon the law and as to the evidence applicable to such issues; and provided that such right may be enforced by motion in the High Court, or by motion in the Supreme Court, in accordance with the practice at present existing in the respective Courts; and provided that subject to all existing enactments limiting, regulating, or affecting the costs payable in any action by reference to the amount recovered therein, the costs of every action, question, and issue tried by a jury shall follow the event, unless upon application made the Judge at the trial, or the Court, shall for special cause shown and stated in the Order, otherwise direct, and any order of a Judge as to such costs may be discharged or varied by the Supreme Court, and provided also that in all actions for Libel where the jury shall give damages under forty shillings, the plaintiff shall not be entitled to more costs than damages.”

This amendment contains two provisos, and those provisos are copied out of the Judicature Act. The first proviso is from Section 48 of the Judicature (Ireland) Act. It is meant to preserve the right of any party to an action to have questions of fact tried by a jury. The second proviso was put into the Irish Judicature Act advisedly after the English Judicature Act had given to the Judge a discretion with regard to costs. It has been the practice in Ireland under a rule of the Benchers to make the costs follow the event in an issue tried by a jury. Inasmuch as these things are already provided for by Statute, to seek to introduce them into the present measure seems a work of supererogation, and quite unnecessary.

But it was in the mind of certain members of the Bar that under a decision given some time ago in England it might be possible for the rule-making authority to make a rule which would in effect supersede this provision of the Judicature Act, but a rule-making authority cannot supersede by a rule an enactment of the Act which confers the rule-making authority upon them. Consequently it was to make this provision of the Judicature Act stand firm against any assault that the provisos were borrowed and introduced here. In England—we will make England be the bad example for this purpose—it was not unknown, when a judge had taken offence with regard to the too independent demeanour or conduct of counsel, that though the jury found for the offending counsel the judge refused to give costs. Some of those who advocated this amendment were fearful that in coming years something of that kind might happen and they sought to preclude it. Personally, when I look at the composition of the rule-making authority, and when I find, moreover, that the rules made are to be submitted to this Dáil for criticism, and may be annulled in consequence of criticism, I think that the amendment is not at all necessary. However, as I tabled it on behalf, as I have said, of those who had this special interest in the matter, I am discharging my duty to them, who are in large part constituents of mine. So that in one sense I am putting their arguments before you as their mouthpiece, and in another way expressing an individual opinion that the case is already provided for and, therefore, unless Deputy Redmond seeks to press the matter, I would withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question, "That Section 22 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Section 23 put and agreed to.

SECTION 24.

In the trial of all civil cases before a judge and jury, a majority vote of nine of the twelve members of the jury shall be necessary and sufficient to determine the verdict. The judge shall so inform the jury, and the verdict of such nine members or upwards shall be taken and recorded as the verdict of the jury, without disclosure of the dissentients if any such there be.

Professor MAGENNIS: I beg to move: In line 2, to delete the words "of the twelve." This is a small point. The Section says: "In the trial of all civil cases before a judge and jury a majority vote of nine of the twelve members of the jury shall be necessary and sufficient to determine the verdict." The wording implies that there must be twelve. By consent in practice there may be only eleven, and it was to obviate that interpretation that this amendment was put down. Some formula of this tenor would meet the case: "In the trial of all civil cases before a judge and jury a majority vote in the proportion of nine to twelve," or something of a similar nature.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Deputy can hardly arrive at a proportion in the case of eleven jurymen.

Professor MAGENNIS: That is already dealt with in proportional representation. A fraction of a man counts as a whole man.

The PRESIDENT: I do not think I can accept this amendment. There are cases, I believe, in which agreement may be arrived at between the parties to the suit under which less than twelve jurors are taken, but I take it if that be the case that it would also be a matter of agreement between them as to what proportion should be taken. That, I suppose, would meet the Deputy's point.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question, "That Section 24 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 25.

When any action shall be pending in the High Court which might have been commenced in the Circuit Court, any party to such action may, at any time before service of notice of trial therein, apply to the High Court that the action be remitted or transferred to the Circuit Court, and thereupon, in case the Court shall consider that the action is fit to be heard in the High Court, it may retain such action therein, or if it shall not consider the action fit to be heard in the High Court it may remit or transfer such action to the Circuit Court in which the same might have been commenced, or to any Court that may appear suitable and convenient, upon such terms, in either case and subject to such conditions, as to costs or otherwise as may appear to be just.

Provided that the High Court shall have jurisdiction to remit or transfer any action, whatever may be the amount of the claim formally made therein, if the Court shall be of opinion that the action should not have been commenced in the High Court but in the Circuit Court or in the District Court if at all.

Professor THRIFT: I beg to move: In lines 12 and 14, to delete the word "heard," and to substitute therefor the word "prosecuted." This amendment is purely verbal.

The PRESIDENT: Yes, I accept that amendment.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Professor MAGENNIS: The next amendment is: In line 21, after the word "amount" to insert the words "subject, or nature." I withdraw this amendment inasmuch as the words "subject or nature" might be taken to be at variance with Section 56 later on, which excludes from the jurisdiction of the Court to which the case would be remitted a number of important things, for example the habeas corpus quo warranto and the rest.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Professor MAGENNIS: I move after line 24 to add a sub-section as follows:

“ When any action shall be pending in a Circuit Court, any party to such action may, at any time before service of notice of trial therein, apply to the High Court that the action be transferred to the High Court or to some other Circuit Court; and thereupon if the Court shall consider that the action is fit to be tried in the High Court, or owing to the special circumstances of the case ought to be transferred to such other Circuit Court, it may order such transfer upon such terms in either case, and subject to such conditions as to costs or otherwise as may appear to be just; and every action so transferred to the High Court shall proceed therein in the same way as if it had originally been instituted in the High Court subject to such rules as may be made regulating the utilization of the pleadings already provided for the Circuit Court; and in the event of an action being transferred to another Circuit Court the judge thereof shall have the same jurisdiction as if it had been commenced in his own court.”

Fortunately for the Dáil this amendment speaks for itself. As regards Part I. of the Bill, it deals properly with matters relating to the High Court jurisdiction, but this Sub-Section refers to cases pending in a Circuit Court, and empowers any party, before service of notice of trial, to apply to the High Court to have it transferred to the High Court or to some other Circuit Court. Now, in the place where more logically it might be introduced on page 6, in these amendments, Deputy Duggan has tabled an amendment covering the whole ground and some more perhaps. It is, therefore, practically unnecessary for me to move this amendment, inasmuch as the same matter will arise again on his amendment.

The PRESIDENT: I would undertake to have it examined in the meantime. The principle of it is acceptable. I am not sure if it is covered by the other amendment. We might have a little change in the wording.

Mr. JOHNSON: Before passing from this it strikes me that the effect of this amendment, or any alteration of it, would be to defeat one of the intentions of the Bill, and that is cheap litigation. If either of the parties apply to the High Court for transfer from the Circuit Court, it seems to me, and I am very innocent of those legal questions, that you are inviting the wealthier of the two parties to penalise the poorer by going from the Circuit Courts to the High Court. You thereby defeat, to that extent, the purpose of the Bill. You are rather encouraging the wealthier litigant, on either side, to defeat the purpose of the Bill by simply adding to the expense.

The PRESIDENT: That was not the intention in accepting the principle of the amendment. It was that a Court may think and decide that it is a proper case for transfer, and certainly not to benefit the wealthier litigant against another who is not wealthy.

Professor MAGENNIS: Besides Deputy Johnson overlooks that the applicant would have to give security for costs. If he lost his case he would be mulcted in the higher rate of costs, so that he must very carefully consider beforehand in which Court he will have the venue.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Question, “ That Section 25 as amended stand part of the Bill,” put and agreed to.

SECTION 26.

An appeal shall lie from the High Court to the Supreme Court in all cases from the grant or refusal of any application to remit or transfer any action from the High Court to the Circuit Court, and from the exercise of the discretion of the High Court or any Judge thereof in the matter

Professor MAGENNIS: The next amendment reads:—In line 28, after the word “ Court ” to insert the words “ or from the Circuit Court to the High Court.” This was merely a drafting amendment. It was consequent on the acceptance of the other amendment, if it had been accepted, and therefore goes out with the other. It is met later by Deputy Duggan's amendment.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Question, "That Section 26 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 27.

From and after the commencement of this Act no indictment need be preferred to or found by a Grand Jury, and no Grand Jury shall be summoned to the Central Criminal Court or to any Court of the High Court Circuit for the consideration of indictments.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move: In line 34, after the word "indictments" to add the words "but every indictment shall be preferred directly to the jury which tries the accused."

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question, "That Section 27, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Section 28 put and agreed to.

SECTION 29.

The determination by the Court of Criminal Appeal of any appeal or other matter which it has power to determine shall be final, and no appeal shall lie from that Court to the Supreme Court, unless the Attorney-General shall certify that the decision involves a point of law of exceptional public importance, and that it is desirable in the public interest that an appeal should be taken to the Supreme Court, in which case an appeal may be brought to the Supreme Court, the decision of which shall be final and conclusive.

Professor THRIFT: I move: To delete all words from "shall," at the end of line 48, to the word "which," at the end of line 54, inclusive. I think this is rather important in principle, but it does not require very much to explain it. The effect of the amendment would be to make the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal final and conclusive, and prevent the possibility of a further appeal, provided the Attorney-General sanctioned it. I believe that is the practice adopted in certain other countries, particularly America, and that it has been found to be most disadvantageous. I suggest that we should not follow it. It would throw upon the prosecuting counsel the duty of saying whether a decision ought to be challenged further or not. Certainly it does not seem to me a thing to be recommended. I suggest, for the consideration of the Government, and the President in particular, that the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal should be final and conclusive.

Captain REDMOND: I desire to support Deputy Thrift in this amendment, and in doing so I would like to remind the Committee that this is an entirely new departure, the establishment of a Court of Criminal Appeal. Having that Court of Criminal Appeal, I venture to suggest it should be final and decisive. According to this Section, it shall rest with the Attorney-General whether the appeal shall be taken from the Court of Criminal Appeal or not, and one is bound to realise that the Attorney-General is a party to every criminal proceeding. He is the law officer of the State and, without in any way disparaging the occupier of the office, whoever he may be, it must be recognised that he is a biased party and in some cases it is possible that the Attorney-General might feel hurt if he had not been successful in his prosecution and might desire to take it to a further Court. That is really only a small point, but the question whether there should be an appeal at all from this Court of Criminal Appeal is a very important point and should be very carefully considered by this Committee. What is the necessity to have two Courts of Appeal from a criminal conviction? At the present moment we have none. I gladly welcome the proposal to institute one. I think it is most proper and humane, but why not finish there with that one, and make it final and conclusive? It is true, I understand, in England and elsewhere, that there is an appeal, but, as in other matters we have been already appealed to to stand upon our own in these affairs, I suggest that our Court of Criminal Appeal should be the final and decisive Court to determine an appeal that has come from a previous conviction.

Mr. HEWAT: I would like to oppose the amendment. The clause as set out here leaves appeal to the Supreme Court, which will have to take an exceptionally high position in the new order of things. There is abolition of the appeal to the House of Lords and unless our Supreme Court takes up a very high position we will miss the decision of the House of Lords and the atmosphere surrounding such decision in the future. We all know that the law and the lawyer may define the law in a very technical sense, and will have some hesitation in going outside the law to do justice. The great strength of the appeal to the House of Lords in the past has been that you got out of the technicalities of the law and got broad justice. I think that is what is wanted here, and that is what I would hope our Supreme Court would fulfil in the future.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I suggest that a good part of what Deputy Hewat has stated hardly applies, because the House of Lords has no decision in respect of criminal appeals at all. There is one additional argument, and it affects what Deputy Hewat has said, and bears also on what Deputy Redmond has stated. Bias may not exist in the Attorney-General. I should hope that in very few cases would there be any question of bias existing in the Attorney-General, but, inasmuch as he would be a party to the proceedings if he gave his certificate so that the matter should be carried from that Court, which is already a Court of Appeal, to a higher Court, bias would unquestionably be imputed.

As to the point about the Supreme Court, if the Attorney-General were to give a certificate from the Court of Criminal Appeal to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court happened to support the Attorney-General in that specific instance, bias may also happen to be imputed to him and also to the Court. Generally, I think there is everything to be gained that there should be now a Court of Criminal Appeal in Ireland. Having created that Court let it be a final court, and let its judicial review be final, with no prospect of appeal further. Appeals upon appeals must necessarily be bad and injurious.

Captain REDMOND: Perhaps I might remind the Committee that my attitude in this is not at all favourable to my brethren at the Bar, because the more appeals there are the better it is for them. On the contrary, the attitude I adopted in this is to curtail and make final the decision of the Court of Appeal. It might be said that a higher appeal would lie to the Privy Council. That is a matter which would require consideration, but whether that further appeal did lie according to our Constitution or not I feel confident at any rate that the Privy Council, who are the final and only arbiters as to what shall be taken by them and what shall be heard by them, would never dream of accepting or of hearing a case on appeal from an Irish Court of Criminal Appeal, which had been made final and conclusive by this Dáil. Therefore, it is with that feeling of confidence in regard to any future action by the Privy Council that I ask you to approve of this amendment.

The PRESIDENT: I did propose to accept amendment 21. If we are giving let us give generously, and I would have the Supreme Court of Appeal the final tribunal before whom any person should have an opportunity of appearing if he thinks injustice has been done to him. That, I think, is fair, and the person is entitled to it. There is just the possibility that an attempt might be made to skip the Supreme Court if it were not there, and to go direct to the Privy Council. I do not think that is desirable. It will not make for confidence in the institutions we are putting up, and I do not think that the Deputy should press this particular case.

Professor THRIFT: I beg to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON: I move: "After the word 'unless,' line 50, to insert the words 'that count or.'" The statement made by the President that he is going to accept this amendment makes it unnecessary for me to say very much. The Clause provides that the certificate of the Attorney-General would justify an appeal to the Supreme Court. The point is raised that the Attorney-General should not be the only decider as to whether the matter in question was of exceptional importance. The Judges of the Courts would be capable of deciding upon such a question just as well as the Attorney-General, and the Clause should allow, I submit, the Court to give such a certificate. As the President has declared his willingness to accept the amendment, I say no more.

Amendment agreed to.

Question, "That Section 29, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: I beg to move to report Progress, and ask leave to sit again to-morrow.

THE DAIL RESUMES.

The PRESIDENT: I move the adjournment until Thursday, 11th October, at 3 o'clock.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.

ORAL ANSWERS.

THE UNEMPLOYMENT DOLE.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN asked the President what steps the Government has taken or contemplates taking in the near future to give effect to the policy outlined in his election programme of using the money required to pay the unemployment dole for useful constructive work.

The PRESIDENT: The discussions on the industrial position, to which I referred yesterday, have as one of their objects the securing of such stability as would justify the Government in putting forward a programme of constructive works. The Government has the main heads of such a programme already developed, but the extent to which it can be put into effect depends on whether the necessary accommodation is finally secured from all parties.

WORK OF SURVEY DEPARTMENT.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Finance whether, owing to the doubts existing in engineering and other scientific circles as to the accuracy of the work performed by the Survey Department of the Saorstát, the Minister will appoint a Committee to investigate and report on the general management, administration, and working of the department.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. Hogan): I am answering this question as the work of the Survey Department at present comes within the Department of Agriculture. The Ministry have received no evidence as to the alleged doubts in engineering and scientific circles as to the accuracy of the work performed by the Survey Department, but if specific evidence to this effect from authoritative sources is supplied the Ministry will be glad to have the matter fully investigated. Meantime, no facts have been brought under the notice of the Ministry which would justify the appointment of the suggested Committee.

A COOTEHILL COMPENSATION CLAIM.

Mr. JOHN J. COLE asked the Minister for Finance when he expects to settle the claim granted by the County Court Judge to Mr. T. Godfrey, Cootehill, for the sum of £200 and £17 costs.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. Blythe): As the Decree referred to by the Deputy was not opposed by the Monaghan County Council it is subject to review by the Compensation (Ireland) Commission. No award has yet been notified by the Commission and the question of payment does not, therefore, arise.

Mr. COLE: Can nothing be done to expedite this matter, as the proprietor of a Cootehill garage is not in a position to be without his car?

Mr. BLYTHE: I do not know what could be done.

Mr. A. BYRNE: Is the Minister aware that such complaints spread all over the country, and all motor agents are in difficulties as the result of not being paid accounts due to them by the Government? Would the Minister take steps to speed up payments?

Mr. BLYTHE: I must ask for notice. There is nothing in this question to indicate that this was even a motor case. The question was put in such a vague form that there was great difficulty in tracing the case at all to-day.

CAVAN POSTAL FACILITIES.

Mr. JOHN J. COLE asked the Postmaster-General whether he can give any idea as to when postal arrangements for the County Cavan will again assume normal conditions; whether he is aware that it frequently takes two days to get a letter from Dublin to either Cavan or Belturbet, which two years ago only required twelve hours; whether the first delivery of letters (except local) in either towns mentioned is not before 12 (noon), when formerly letters were delivered from the local offices at 7.30 a.m.; whether a similar state of affairs prevails in Ballyconnell district; to ask whether it is intended to restore to normal the times of despatch and delivery of letters in those districts.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. J. J. Walsh): Letters posted in Dublin in time for inclusion in despatches thence by the 6.30 p.m. train fall into deliveries at Cavan, Belturbet, and Ballyconnell commencing at 7.0 a.m., 7.30 a.m., and 1.45 p.m., respectively, on the following day. If posted too late for despatch by that train they are forwarded by the 6.45 a.m. train on the following day and fall into deliveries commencing at Cavan at 12.30 p.m., and at Belturbet at 12.45 p.m. on that day. One delivery is the normal arrangement at Ballyconnell, and the time of delivery is dependent upon the train service. With the present train service an earlier delivery is not practicable. There are two despatches from Cavan and Belturbet and one from Ballyconnell on week-days, and this is the normal number. Despatches are made from these offices by the latest trains which afford connections to Dublin, etc.

Mr. COLE: Is the P. M. G. aware that previously the collection was made at 7 o'clock in the evening? At the present time letters are not delivered until two, and the collection is made at 4. This leaves little time for business-men to answer their letters. In other places the letters are delivered at about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and collected at 12, so it takes a day to answer letters. Would it be convenient to collect the Cavan letters to get connections by the night goods trains as formerly?

Mr. WALSH: It is unusual for us to utilise goods trains for the conveyance of mails, and I do not think any good purpose would be served by the utilisation of this particular one, because there are no connections to be made.

RE-ARREST OF AN INTERNEE.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that John C. Kenrick, National Teacher, Cahir, Co. Tipperary, was arrested in August, 1922, and detained until August, 1923, when he was unconditionally released; whether after a short time he was re-arrested and detained; to ask what are the reasons for his re-arrest and whether any charge has been or will be formulated against him; and whether, in view of the impaired condition of Mr. Kenrick's health, the question of his early release will be considered.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): Mr. Kenrick was arrested on the 16th October, 1922. He was "on the run" for some time prior to that date. In view of the suspension of hostilities, and as it appeared that his complicity in the Irregular campaign was not of a very serious nature, he was released on the 8th August last.

Since his release Mr. Kenrick openly encouraged the Irregular movement, and in consequence of statements made by him at a public meeting in Ballyporeen, on the 26th August last, he was re-arrested on the 13th September. In the interest of public safety, it is not intended at present to release him.

TIRCONAILL FISHERIES.

SEAN DE FAOITE: I beg to ask the Minister for Fisheries the following question, of which I have given private notice:—Whether he is aware of the constant poaching inside the three-mile limit off the Tirconail coast line from Killybegs to Lough Foyle by English, French and Scotch trawlers; that as a result the inshore fishing grounds have been ruined, and the local long-line fishermen are unable to follow their calling; whether he proposes to take steps to ensure efficient and constant patrol of the coast line to protect these fishing grounds.

MINISTER for FISHERIES (Mr. Fionan Lynch): I have received complaints of British steam trawlers fishing off the Tireonaill coast in areas where that method of fishing is prohibited by By-Laws of the Irish Fishery Authority. I have had no reports of French trawlers fishing on that part of the coast, but French lobster boats have been there from time to time. The Tireonaill coast has been patrolled as frequently as possible by the Fishery cruiser (she spent some days on two occasions there during September) and assistance has been received from the coastal patrol vessels of the Ministry of Defence. I have, within the past week, entered into an arrangement with the Minister for Defence by which a certain number of patrol boats of that Ministry will be devoted entirely to fishery protection, and I propose to have a base for one of these vessels in Tireonaill, so that there may be a constant patrol of the Tireonaill coast. In all cases, whether detected by the Government's officers, or by local fishermen, in which evidence likely to secure a conviction is forthcoming, the Ministry of Fisheries is prepared to institute proceedings.

Mr. JOHNSON: Would the Minister say whether the various vessels engaged in these operations are fitted with wireless installations, and what is the speed of the "Helga," and how does it compare with that of vessels that are poaching?

Mr. LYNCH: I am not quite sure if the ordinary patrol boats are fitted with wireless. The speed of the "Helga" is some knots more than that of poaching vessels, and the speed of the patrols is also slightly greater.

Mr. JOHNSON: Has the "Helga" wireless?

Mr. LYNCH: Yes.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Would the Minister consider the bringing in of legislation for the making of fines such as would preclude such poaching? Is he aware it has been asserted by English trawler captains that they would be able to pay the price of a fine after two hours' successful trawling?

Mr. WHITE: Would the Minister consider the necessity of forfeiting the trawler on a second conviction?

Mr. LYNCH: We cannot do that legally now. We are contemplating legislation with regard to fisheries generally.

Mr. WHITE: I hope the Minister will not lose sight of my suggestion to forfeit the trawlers.

WRITTEN REPLY.

COMPENSATION CLAIM.

TOMAS MAC EOIN asked the Minister for Defence if and when it is proposed to pay compensation to Mr. N. H. Walsh, 17 Leinster Road, Rathmines, in respect of his being knocked down by a military Crossley car in August, 1922. (Q.T.O. 2/30/22 and B.T. 112/98/23.)

General MULCAHY: As neither the car nor its driver has been identified after prolonged enquiries even as being connected with the Army, it is not proposed to make any payment in respect of Mr. Walsh's claim in regard to which, in any case, my Department has no legal liability.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Major COOPER: Before we proceed to public business, may I ask the President is he in a position to make a statement, such as he made yesterday, as to the hour at which the debate on the Governor-General's Address will be resumed? Does he propose to go on with the Courts of Justice Bill to-day? That would perhaps be more convenient and he could leave to-morrow for the debate on the Governor-General's Address.

The PRESIDENT: If that be the general view of the Dáil, I am agreeable. It was my intention to take up the debate on the Governor-General's speech at 5 o'clock, but if it is the desire of Deputies to postpone it until to-morrow we can do so.

Major COOPER: I think it would be more convenient to have it to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT: Very well. Might I ask the Dáil to consider a proposal that the two Bills, which were given a Second Reading yesterday, will also be taken to-morrow. They are formal Bills, and it is advisable in the case of one of them that it should be passed into law without delay. It was our intention not to meet next week in view of the many circumstances which I suppose it is not necessary to go into. At least two members of this Dáil will be absent next week, possibly for seven days. It would be advisable that some consideration should be given to the absence of important members of particular Parties whom public business calls elsewhere, and if the Dáil would facilitate us in the taking of those two Bills to-morrow it would, I think, avoid a meeting next week and would give us much more time to deal with matters of pressing importance which are rather difficult to settle while the Dáil is sitting.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Does the President propose to adjourn for one week?

The PRESIDENT: Yes, for one week, but I will make a statement on the matter to-morrow.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Does the President propose to finish the Courts of Justice Bill before the adjournment to-morrow?

The PRESIDENT: If possible.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Then the arrangement would be to continue the Courts of Justice Bill in Committee for the whole of to-day's sitting to see what progress is made?

The PRESIDENT: Yes.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That meets Deputy Cooper's point. Now with regard to the order for Committee for next Tuesday.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I think the President has asked whether the Dáil would be prepared to take the Committee Stage of the two Bills read yesterday a second time. They are non-contentious. There would be an official amendment to one of them, which I could circulate this evening if the arrange is to take the Committee Stage to-morrow.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is that agreed?

Agreed.

NATIONAL UNIVERSITY REPRESENTATION.

Mr. McCARTHY: I beg to move the following motion which stands in my name:—

“That the Ceann Comhairle direct the Clerk of the Dáil to issue his writ for the election of a member to fill the vacancy which has occurred in the membership of the present Dáil consequent on the resignation of Deputy Eoin MacNeill of his seat in the University Constituency of the National University of Ireland.”

Mr. MacCABE: I beg to second the motion.

Motion put and agreed to.

THE COURTS OF JUSTICE BILL, 1923—THIRD STAGE (RESUMED).

Sections 29, 30, 31, 32, and 33, put and agreed to.

SECTION 34.

The Court of Criminal Appeal shall have jurisdiction to affirm or to reverse the conviction in whole or in part, and to remit, or to reduce, or to increase the sentence, and generally to make such order, including any order as to costs as may be necessary for the purpose of doing justice in the case before the Court.

Captain REDMOND: I beg to move in line 26 to insert the words “or otherwise vary” after the word “increase.” I do not think this requires any explanation. It really means that the Court of Criminal Appeal shall have the full power to revise a sentence of the Court below it. I think that is only a reasonable thing for a Court of Appeal.

The PRESIDENT: I would be prepared to accept that amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Question: "That Section 34, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Question: "That Section 35 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 36.

The Minister for Home Affairs may at any time and from time to time after the passing and before or after the commencement of this Act, but with the concurrence of the Minister for Finance in respect of any matter affecting public revenue or expenditure make rules to be styled "Rules of Court" for carrying Part I. of this Act into effect (including the hearing of appeals from the Circuit Court and cases stated by the District Court) and may annul or alter the said rules and make new rules. In particular rules may be made for all or any of the following matters:—

- (vi) The mode of address to be adopted to the Judges and the robes and official dress to be worn by the Bench and the Bar.

Captain REDMOND: I move in page 10 sub-clause (VI.) at the end of line 10 to delete all words after the word "judges" to the end of the sub-clause. Now, this Section, which is a rather lengthy one, gives certain powers of rule-making to the Minister for Home Affairs, who may, with the concurrence of the Minister for Finance, and with the further concurrence of the majority of the Judges of the Supreme Court and the High Court, the President of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland and two practising Barristers, make rules with regard to various items, among others being an item which is the mode of address to be adopted by the Judges and the robes and the official dress to be worn by the Bench and the Bar. I have put down an amendment to sub-section (6). My object in putting down this amendment is in no way to insure the continuance of the existing robes or costume now worn by the members of the Bench or the Bar. Rather, my object is that the determination of the future dress, if any, and I see there is also an amendment on that point, should be at the discretion and in the hands of the Bench and the Bar alone. I really cannot understand what the Minister for Home Affairs has to say to what costume is worn by members of the Irish Bar. Neither can I see at first sight at any rate what the Minister for Finance has to do with the matter, except, perhaps, that he will give the members of the Bar the guarantee that as well as having the supervision and the decision of their costume, he also will make provision for that. There would be something then to be said for his interference in the matter, but, as far as I am aware, the costume worn by members of the legal professions in every country in the world is not controlled by outside bodies, but is at the entire discretion of the members of those professions themselves.

It may be put forward that members of the Bar are privileged to plead in public Courts, and that upon being granted that privilege by the State the State should have some say in the manner in which they robe themselves. As far as that goes, I am in agreement with the principle that both judges and members of the Bar should be decently clothed, but what I do say is this, that apart from that I claim, and I claim it in no trivial manner, the right for the Irish Bar, Bench and Barristers, to determine for themselves the costume that they should appear in. Take, for instance, a similar case. The National University, founded only a few years ago, and which you, sir, so ably represent, was founded by public statute; it is paid for by public money; it is controlled by the State, but there is no provision, as far as I am aware, whereby the State through the Minister for Home Affairs, the Minister for Finance, or any other of its Ministers, shall determine what form of mortar board shall be worn by a Professor of Philosophy, and what form of gown shall be worn by a Professor of Dialectics. No, the National University is entitled in that matter to self-determination, and I claim, therefore, on behalf of the Irish Bar, that they are in a similar position, and that it is rather casting a slur upon that learned profession to place in outside hands the future control of their legal costume.

I might even go so far as to say that when any of us pay our entrance fee at a football match, when we go to Croke Park to see a great football final, we pay our entrance fee and we pay our entertainment tax as well, so I am told.

A DEPUTY: You do not.

Captain REDMOND: We do not?

A DEPUTY: Not at Croke Park.

Captain REDMOND: Well, we do elsewhere. I believe, by the way, that we do at Trinity College, but not at the National University. So I am told. But, at any rate, we pay something, and we pay something towards the bringing about of the entertainment. We have no say—I do not know who has—as to whether Tipperary shall wear yellow, white and blue, and Cork shall wear orange and green, and I do not follow the line of argument that because the State pays for, and because members of the Bar exercise certain privileges allowed them, and granted to them by the State in addressing Courts of Justice, that the State, or any outside authority, should have anything to say to the mode of dress to be worn by that profession. I move this amendment.

Mr. MAHONY: Does not the latter part of that Section imply that the Judges and members of the Bar shall have a decision as to dress? I look upon this as a pure waste of time.

Captain REDMOND: I beg to point out that it implies nothing of the kind. It implies that it must be done in concurrence with the majority of the judges, and two practising Barristers; also the President of the Incorporated Law Society, but that—

Mr. O'MAHONY: Let the Deputy read it, and that will settle it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Order. The Deputy must be allowed to proceed.

Captain REDMOND: That does not get away from the fact that the Minister for Home Affairs is the person who will be responsible for the making of these rules, and I contend that the Minister for Home Affairs has nothing to do with it, and he should have no more to do with it than the Deputy himself.

Mr. JOHNSON: This question raised by Deputy Redmond really has more in it than he himself has stated. It seems to raise the question of what is the relationship between the Judiciary—the Institutions of the Law—and the State. Is the Judiciary subordinate to the State; is the Judiciary subordinate to the Ministry, or any part of the Ministry, or is it, as some theorists would contend, and I think with a great deal of sound reasoning, that it is of an equal status with the political institution of the State, and it should be self-governing, subject only to the legislation passed by the Oireachtas, not under the Ministry of the time being in any respect? That is really underlying the proposition made by Deputy Redmond, and while it is only dealing with the subordinate matter of the attire of the officials of this Judiciary, the important question is rather the relations of the Judiciary to the political State. Perhaps one ought to say, if that is the point of view, that this question should have been dealt with, not merely in respect of the robes, but of the whole clause, as to whether the Ministry, through the Minister for Home Affairs, should have this authority, or whether the whole of the job should be taken in hand by the Judiciary itself. If the contention that Deputy Redmond is making is sound it seems to me to apply equally well to the other rules as the mode of address or the robes to be worn. I would like to have heard Deputy Redmond, or any other Deputies that have knowledge of the procedure regarding Courts of Justice, to have dealt with it from that point of view. It is a comparatively small matter what robes or official dress should be worn, or even the mode of address to be adopted to the Judges. I do not know whether it is possible, on this amendment, to discuss that aspect more generally, but if it is I would like to hear some of the Deputies enlarge upon that subject.

The PRESIDENT: I do not know exactly whether the purpose of the amendment is directed towards item 6, "the mode of address to be adopted to the judges, and the robes and official dress to be worn by the Bench and the Bar," or to the general principles underlying this particular section. In the letter which was addressed to the Chairman and members of the Committee, who were requested to report on this whole matter, particular stress was laid upon the fact that it was desirable to set up a Judiciary in accordance with the Constitution, and to mark a considerable difference to what had been in the public mind associated with the late alien Government in this country. I have noticed for some time past that a good deal of criticism has been directed not so much to the particular details of the new machinery, but rather to the purpose of any change at all, and it would appear to indicate to my mind that there was a desire on the part of certain persons, particularly those who criticised this Bill, not to mark the setting up of an independent Government here by interfering at all with the Courts as such. I think it is the general impression amongst the people we have been in contact with that there was perhaps closer association between the administration of justice and the British Government than there was with any other service in the country and the British Government.

I believe it is the desire on the part of practically the entire country that there should be certainly a marked difference between the Courts that have been dispensing justice here for a very long time and the new institution that it is proposed to set up under this Bill. There is, it will be observed from an examination of this measure, all the way through a desire to mark the independence of the Bench, but Parliament is entitled to certain safeguards, and the safeguards that are set down with regard to this particular clause are very light. They do not infringe in any way the independence of the Bar or Bench or the legal profession, but they do secure to Parliament, at any rate, the power to review such rules as would be made which might possibly leave the new institutions, if we do not reserve that power, under the shadow of the allegation that they were exactly the same institutions as it is proposed to change entirely by this Bill. I do not think that a case has been made for removing from the control of the Oireachtas the review of any such Rules as would be made, particularly rules which would not mark that great change which in the general opinion of the people ought to be effected. Therefore, I say, so far as I am concerned, I am not impressed with the advisability of adopting this amendment.

Captain REDMOND: As regards the rule-making authority it is very noticeable that in this report of the Judiciary Committee, which has so often been referred to, that the rule-making authority for the District Justices' Courts is proposed to consist of five District Justices, to be nominated by the general body of Justices, and so on, and no reference whatever is made to the Ministry of Home Affairs. Also in regard to the Circuit Courts, the rules are to be made by an authority which does not include the Minister for Home Affairs; and as regards the rule-making authority of the High Court, strange to say no recommendation has been made, which strikes one as rather ominous. If the rule-making authority in regard to each of these other Courts is not to include the Minister for Home Affairs, I cannot see why the rule-making authority for the High Court should, and it surely is inconsistent that the rule-making authority should be the Bench and the Bar in the one case alone and not in the other.

I quite agree with Deputy Johnson when he states that this amendment of mine raises specifically only a small point, but this point, though it may seem small to the Deputies, is a point that is of considerable importance to the dignity and also to the status of the Irish Bar. I quite agree that it is a minor matter, and I also quite agree that it does raise, as he suggests, the point in regard to the whole section, namely, whether the Judiciary are to be considered as subordinate to the Government, or whether they are to be considered, as they are considered in most other countries, as being independent of the Executive Government of the country. That, indeed, raises a very serious and a very thoughtful issue, but there are further sections in this Bill which also raise that issue, and which, as I intend to dwell upon it much further, I will not trouble the Committee with at the moment. I would like to say, however, that with regard to this particular amendment the members of the Irish Bar at a meeting held sometime ago, unanimously decided that they should put forward their claim on behalf of the Bench and Bar to have the sole right to determine what form of robe should be used by them when addressing one of the State Courts.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I would like to call the attention of Deputies to the method of taking Divisions. Divisions are taken by the procedure laid down in Standing Order 52. Those who are in favour of the Question say "Tá," and those against say "Níl."

The names will be called in alphabetical order, and not by order of constituencies. The names will be called in the form in which they have been given to the Clerk by Deputies themselves. This particular method of taking Divisions is a difficult one with a fairly large Dáil, and I would, therefore, request Deputies to fulfil the terms of the Standing Order by rising from their places when recording their votes, by remaining in the Chamber until the result of the Division has been announced, and by refraining from conversation so that the names can be distinctly heard. This particular method has difficulties which we may be able to get over later on, but for the moment I hope Deputies will rise in their seats and remain until the result of the Division has been made known, and that there will be no talking.

Mr. THOMAS NAGLE: I desire to move amendment 24 standing in my name; the amendment is as 4 o'clock. follows:—"In Sub-Clause (vi.), page 10, line 11, after the words 'official dress' to insert the words 'if any'." The Sub-Section as it is makes it imperative that official dress should be worn, and the amendment leaves the question open, and makes it possible that the Bench and Bar may attend in ordinary walking costumes if they wish.

Professor MAGENNIS: The Deputy has not made it quite clear that the reservation "if any" refers to "official" and not to "dress."

Mr. JOHNSON: Does the Deputy desire to leave it optional whether a dress shall be worn?

Professor MAGENNIS: It is already in the hands of the rule-making authority.

The PRESIDENT: I would not be disposed to accept the amendment. My information is that there is a universal consensus of opinion that the dignity of these institutions is enhanced by having an official dress. I think in most of the pictures or records or descriptions that occur of judicial institutions all over the world, there is reference made to the particular style of dress, and I do not know why there should not be here in this country also an official dress. It is a matter for the institutions that have been set up to make recommendations with regard to that. I think that the last month or two shows that there has been a determined effort on the part of certain persons to ensure that the dress shall be exactly as it was in the old days. There are various methods of ensuring that that will happen, when one gets no information whatever from official sources that such is the case. A man or Minister or official having been approached for information on a given subject does not give any information, refuses to discuss the subject and so on. Then some enterprising journalist immediately publishes what is alleged to be a statement, either of the Minister, the official or the secretary, thinking at once that immediate qualification or denial or affirmation must be issued. I have observed recently many such devices having been adopted, not alone with regard to this particular question of dress, but with regard to other questions. I would advise such diligently minded people not to adopt such methods in the future. It is scarcely fair. There has been no official statement made with regard to the abolition of any particular form of dress, official or otherwise, in connection with the Courts. I think the machinery that is outlined in this Clause provides for what is perhaps the best possible method of deciding what it should be. I think that it should be left there, and the Deputy should not press this matter.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am surprised at the information that the President has given to the effect that universally, in Courts of Justice, there has been adopted certain official costumes. I thought that was not the case in America, and I think it is not the case in some Continental countries.

The PRESIDENT: It is not the case in America, and I believe it has been abolished in Russia.

Mr. JOHNSON: I doubt if it is the case in France.

Professor MAGENNIS: It is.

Mr. JOHNSON: I accept that. It is certainly universal in these countries which have been held up to us on the one side or the other as being models of propriety because of having adopted this archaic procedure. I think I have heard rather frequently, in the course of the discussions, or I have read statements made in support of the Bill that is now before us, as to the extraordinary success of the Dáil Courts, and of the prestige that they gained, but I had not heard that they were obliged to wear any particular costume, whether sitting as Justices or practising as pleaders. The proposition here, of course, is that we should not decide finally that there must be an official dress, and I suggest that it is very well worthy of discussion whether we ought to lay down that there must be some official dress for those who plead in the Courts, and also as to whether we should leave it as a probability that the distinction between a Barrister and a Solicitor, and between one Court and another, should be maintained. I am inclined to think that the Solicitor appearing in the law Court is just as effective without a wig as the Barrister with a wig. Of course he may not be able to frighten a timid witness as effectively, and after all it seems to me that the purpose of the official robes and dress has been rather to overawe the ordinary, common citizen, who is supposed to be coming into an atmosphere which is far and away above mundane things. I support the amendment, because I think that we ought not to decide here that there must be a uniform for those who plead in the Courts.

Professor MAGENNIS: Deputy Johnson gives us an example of a very famous and over-used form of sophistry. The Dáil Courts were highly successful; neither Judge nor pleaders in them wore an official costume; therefore official costume adds nothing to the dignity or success of the proceedings. Would it not occur to the Deputy that it was in spite of the absence of these habitual and traditional elements of State that the success was achieved, because they were the Courts of our own people established to supersede the Courts of the alien? Now he appeals to the practice in America. That, I daresay, is because he shares the general belief that to be democratic is to be plain, because regal splendours have become associated with official costumes, then we who advocate democracy must cry out, "Away with all robes and fripperies, they belong to an obsolete form of civilisation in which the vulgar and the low and the baser population were to be awed into subjection and obedience by the majesty and state of this artificial type." Well, the same proposal has been made with regard to the ceremonial and services of the Church, and I should like to know where Deputy Johnson proposes to draw the line. Why not do away with titles, with precedents and status, and let us all get down to the dead level of the Fijian Islanders. I have read the new policy of the Labour Party, but I did not read that in their manifestoes at the last election.

Now, we all know what an undignified procedure is followed in some of the Western Courts in America, where the State Attorney borrows a plug of tobacco from the prisoner in the dock and expectorates over the whole Court to add emphasis to his legal argument. I do not think that in establishing new [Professor Magennis.] methods and traditions for our country, which we have always claimed was a highly civilised country when certain others, of which we wot, had their inhabitants painting themselves with woad, it is a good thing to recommend to us barbarous and semi-baked communities from which to borrow. Deputy Johnson quoted the case of France. There is an official costume there of very long standing. Of course I plead guilty to a certain amount of inconsistency in upholding robes, because it is traditional with Universities to wear academic costume, and I am afraid that I am sadly wanting in that respect, even on official occasions. That is because the salary of professors is so low and so insufficient that I cannot afford one of these highly-coloured or multi-coloured robes required for academic purposes.

The question of robes is, after all, to be determined by experience, and everyone who has any experience of the Bar practice is well aware that the country litigant feels he has got a great deal more value for his money when the argument was conducted by a man with a wig on his head before another man with a bigger wig on his head. That may be very faulty, very lamentable, and very regrettable, but it is incident to human nature. It is a psychological fact that people are impressed by costume. The clown in the circus might perform to practically empty or unappreciative audiences if he did not wear the robes of a clown. Without his fripperies and his bangles what would be the effect on the other performers? Why, one of the newest stunts in the music hall is for the highly trained acrobat to go through the traditional acrobatic performances in dress clothes and silk hat, which is an unconscious tribute to the fact that the public expect the ceremonial to which they were always accustomed.

Now, we are establishing new Courts and new procedure, and it is highly essential that they should succeed, but we should not throw away any of the established machinery by which we are aware trials, especially in country localities, are made impressive. Deputy Johnson will have to change the face of the earth very considerably before he will have created a new race of men whose imagination could not be affected by ritual. If it is the purpose of the Labour Party to replace the present race of humans by a newer race it would be an excellent thing to hear how they propose to set about the removal of what appears to every observer to be ingrained in humanity as such.

Mr. JOHNSON: To go back to the time of Methuselah.

Mr. T. J. O'CONNELL: Deputy Magennis would have it appear that something very revolutionary was asked for in this amendment. The amendment really aims only at what it pretends to aim, namely, to leave the matter optional, not to take, here and now, a decision as to whether official robes should or should not be worn. The President called attention, two or three times, to the necessity—and I agree with him in this—for marking some big distinction as to the Courts to be set up in the Saorstát and those which were in existence for some time, and I think no better way could be chosen than by discarding these official robes. In doing that we would, after all, be only following the example we ourselves have set here. Those of us who were in the last Dáil and who are in this one, must agree that it does not detract from the dignity of our proceedings that our Ceann Comhairle does not get himself up in wig and gown and knee breeches, as the Chairmen of other Parliaments have done. There is, after all, a very wide gap, indeed, between a wig and gown, on the one hand, and the robes of the Fiji Islanders, on the other. It does not mean that we are to go back to the robes of the Fiji Islanders if we discard the wig and gown. I think we should get away from the idea that it is necessary to use artificial means of this kind to add to the dignity or solemnity of our Courts, and I support the amendment, in so far as I think it is not advisable for this Dáil to make it essential that robes should be worn.

After all, times will change and methods will change. If we were sitting in the Parliaments of thirty or forty years ago, I suppose we would all be coming down to the House in tall hats and frock coats, and if we happened to be in the Parliaments of a hundred years we would be wearing full bottom wigs and swords. If that had been enacted at that time, and that we had to dress up in those robes, I think we would have found it most inconvenient now, and everyone would have agreed that a change was necessary. The amendment leaves this matter an open question.

Major COOPER: There is one point that I think has been overlooked, and that is that now the Bar is open to both sexes and that there are lady barristers. It seems to me that unless there is some official dress agreed upon and that the matter is not left an open question, as the Labour Party want, the men will simply be extinguished by the ladies. The ladies will simply appear in Court in gorgeous creations, so that no poor male counsel will have any chance with juries at all. I think there is an absolute necessity for some official dress to be regulated by somebody to be worn by barristers.

The PRESIDENT: May I put it to the Dáil that if it be clear that the amendment will be lost, Deputy Nagle ought not to press the matter to a Division, because unless he is sure of carrying the Dáil on his amendment the vote of the Dáil might be taken as a direction to the rule-making authorities that we were determined to have an official dress.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would like to have some assurance on that point. It seems to me, as things are in the Section, there is no option. There must be an official robe decided by the rule-making authorities.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The wording of the Section, page 9, line 47, of the Bill is: "In particular rules may be made for all or any of the following matters."

Mr. NAGLE: I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Professor THRIFT: I beg to move to delete, Sub-section (VII.) ("the sittings and the vacations and the length of such") and to substitute therefor the following: "The commencement and duration of the sittings and the vacations."

As far as I can understand the wording of the Sub-section in the Bill, I think the words that I propose in substitution express the meaning more clearly. There is no change in the substance.

The PRESIDENT: If the language of the amendment is more elegant and distinct, I propose to adopt it.

Amendment agreed to.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That also disposes of amendment No. 26.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move, in sub-clause (VIII.), page 10, line 14, to insert after the word "the" the words "fixing and collection of fees and the."

The object of the amendment is to empower the rule-making authority to arrange for the fixing and collection of Court fees.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move an amendment in page 10, lines 15 and 16, to delete the words "Section or any of the Sub-sections thereof," and to insert in lieu thereof the word "Act."

The object of the amendment is to enable the rule-making authority to make any general adaptations that may be required.

Amendment agreed to.

Professor O'SULLIVAN: I suggest there is some ambiguity about lines 20 and 22 of the Clause on page 10 of the Bill. I take it for granted that the purpose is that the Committee should consist of the majority of the Judges of the Supreme Court and High Court, the President of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland, and two practising barristers. That is to be one body, and it is their concurrence that is necessary. I suggest that the Sub-section as it stands is open to the interpretation that it may possibly be three bodies, namely—(1) a majority of the Judges of the Supreme Court and the High Court; (2) the President of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland, and (3) two practising barristers. I think it might be possible to make that matter a little clearer later on.

The PRESIDENT: Yes. My attention was drawn to this matter previously by Professor O'Sullivan. I will have it examined and looked into before the next stage, and I will bring up whatever necessary alteration there may be in the wording. It is intended to be a Committee of all those mentioned and that the majority of the Committee should decide.

Question, "That Clause 36, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

PART II.

THE CIRCUIT COURT. (SECTION 37.)

A Circuit Court of Justice in Saorstát Éireann shall be constituted under this Act consisting of not more than eight judges, each of whom shall be styled in his appointment "Judge of the Circuit Court of Justice in Saorstát Éireann." Such judges shall discharge within the several groups of Counties specified in the Schedule to this Act (which groups are hereinafter termed Circuits) such duties as are by this Act imposed upon Judges of the Circuit Court.

Captain REDMOND: I do not know whether it is in order or not for me to ask you, but if it is I would be grateful to you if I might be permitted to amend my proposed amendment. The meaning that I meant to convey by substituting the word "ten" for the word "eight" is better brought out by inserting after the word "of" "a minimum of."

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The amendment would then be: after the word "of" on line 37 to delete the words "not more than" and to insert instead the words "a minimum of."

Captain REDMOND: In moving the amendment in that form I desire once again to refer to the report of the Judiciary Committee. On page 16, which is the portion of that Report that refers to Circuit Courts, at the bottom of the page and the beginning of the paragraph, the following words occur:—

We consider that a minimum of eight judges will be required for these Circuit Courts to discharge the duties hitherto performed for the twenty-six counties by sixteen County Court Judges.

That was the considered opinion of this Judiciary Committee, and that being so I do not think that this Section as it now stands, which actually limits the number of those Circuit Judges that may be appointed to eight, accurately, if indeed it does at all, carries out the recommendation. At the present time there are sixteen what are known as County Court Judges in the twenty-six counties. It is proposed under this Section to substitute for those sixteen judges eight judges. That means that the area over which each future judge is to have jurisdiction is to be twice the area over which an existing County Court Judge has jurisdiction. But more than that is proposed, for in subsequent Sections the jurisdiction is proposed to be doubled in most instances, and, in one particularly important instance, it is proposed to be multiplied six times. Therefore, the position which the new judges will find themselves in when appointed will be, that there will be half the number of judges to do in many cases twice the amount of work, and in all cases of contract and tort, which are the great majority of cases, six times the amount of work, and to cover twice the area of country. I do not profess to be a great mathematician, but with these figures at hand I would now leave it to the calculations of the individual Deputies to discover how much more work will be required from new judges who are half the number, who have twice the area to traverse, who have in the most important cases six times the jurisdiction, and in all cases over twice the jurisdiction of previous judges.

I say that the work that is proposed for those judges is not only mentally but physically impossible. The Judiciary Committee recommended that there should be at least eight. It is proposed here that there shall be a maximum of eight. I think it would be most advisable if the Government could see its way to adopt the Judiciary Committee's suggestion and that would be to appoint eight to start with. They will then be able to see for themselves how far eight are able to discharge this colossal task. When one comes to consider subsequent sections it is provided for in Section 46 that temporary assistant judges may be appointed. It is to guard against this very practice of having to appoint temporary assistant judges—whose tenure, mark you, shall not be determined and who will be mere emergency men, who will be possibly appointed by the existing Executive of the day, and who undoubtedly cannot be expected and will not be independent of that Executive—that I now propose that it should be a minimum of eight judges that should be appointed and not a maximum of eight. That is the very question which has already been raised upon a previous Section by Deputy Johnson. I venture to say—I am not going to prophesy; it is a very foolish luxury to indulge in, especially anything in the nature of a public prophesy—that in a very short time indeed, it will be discovered by the Government and by the people generally, that eight judges will not suffice for the almost superhuman task which this Bill endeavours to place upon their shoulders. That being so my object is to secure that the judges of the future shall be independent of the Executive, shall hold their judicial offices without either fear or favour of the then existing Government. That is why I propose that the minimum should be eight, and that there will be no necessity, therefore, for the operation of Section 46 in the appointing of temporary emergency men.

Now, in regard to the task that these Judges have to perform, I do not believe, without casting any disparagement upon my fellow Deputies, that they, for one moment realise what that task shall be. No one, least of all myself, suggests for a moment, that the present County Court Judge has got an arduous task to perform. Many times, in years gone by, I have, in another place, called for the reduction in the number of County Court Judges. No one can gainsay the fact, that in past years in Ireland, a County Court judgeship was probably the softest, and the nicest position attainable, even at the Irish Bar. But that being so does not in any way render it necessary for us, now that we are setting up a new judiciary, to make the task of our future judges an impossible one. What shall be their task? Has any Deputy considered the area over which they will have jurisdiction? Take one Circuit alone. It embraces the counties Louth, Meath, Kildare, Wicklow and Wexford. A judge starts on his rounds in the County Louth and winds up, presumably, after travelling along the coast, backwards and forwards, in Wexford. At the present time it takes a County Court Judge, with all the rapidity at his command, from at least four to six weeks to do the counties within his jurisdiction. But his area is to be doubled. I say that when a judge starts at Louth, it will be at least two months before he is back in Louth again, and that the litigants and the people in County Louth, who previously might have applied to the High Court for injunctions and for temporary legal remedies, will have to await the return of that judge, after he has done his tour.

I do not know whether any of the Deputies have seriously studied the work of a County Court Judge. Are the Deputies aware, for instance, of the extraordinary amount of work that is done in the Recorder's Court in the City of Dublin? Are they aware that the Recorder's Court, as I saw it stated in the Press only the other day by the Recorder himself, in what I am sure will be generally taken to be a most dignified and judicial leave-taking, as he himself described it, of his great office, that his is the oldest court in existence in Ireland, and that it is essentially an Irish Court, having been set up by an Irish Parliament. But what was the jurisdiction of that Court? It was practically a complete jurisdiction at one time. In subsequent years that jurisdiction came by custom to be limited to the extent of a County Court jurisdiction. What did that jurisdiction comprise?

Let me briefly relate the work that had to be done by the Recorder of the City of Dublin. He had criminal jurisdiction, seven sessions in the year; he had Civil Bill jurisdiction, which is now proposed to be six times increased; he had licensing jurisdiction, valuation appeals, Income Tax appeals, appeals from the convictions of the Divisional Magistrates. He also had to deal with claims under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, and of later years he has had to go into the enormous number, unfortunately, of malicious injury claims for damages. That being so, with his limited jurisdiction, everybody who knows the City of Dublin knows that the Recorder was probably and is, the busiest man in the City. But it is now proposed to increase the work of the judge who is to take his place. I imagine that it will come somewhat as a surprise to some of the Deputies when I inform them of the fact that the value of the decrees in the Recorder's Court in the City of Dublin from the year 1905 to the present time, increasing as they have been in each year, has been, each successive year, more than the value of the decrees obtained in the whole High Court of Justice in Ireland. What is the meaning of that? The meaning of it is that it was the most important Court for the City of Dublin. But it is to be made more so. Its jurisdiction in certain matters is to be doubled. In other matters it is to be sextupled. I have often heard it said that the present Recorder is a super-man, but I say it will require a super-man to do the work of the future judge who is to take his place. According to this Bill one Circuit Judge is to have the jurisdiction in the whole City and County of Dublin. I say that that is an impossibility with his increased jurisdiction, with a natural increase of litigation and the various new legislative enactments. I say that for one judge to get through the work that the Recorder of Dublin does to-day, multiplied as it shall be by this Bill, will be a sheer impossibility.

[Captain Redmond.]

Furthermore I would say this, in all seriousness to the Government, that I do think that the remarks made by the Recorder of Dublin the other day should carry weight here and throughout the country. He said, in the course of his remarks: "I venture, even though I be the last and the least of the long lines of holders of the eldest judicial office in the country, to assert that the honour and dignity of the capital, and the rights and privileges of its Corporation, demand that a somewhat different consideration ought to apply in their case to that of a country town." I do think that there is a great deal in that remark, and therefore what I would suggest is this, that in regard to the City and County of Dublin, where it will be impossible for one judge to do the task that is committed to him, there should be a separate Circuit Judge appointed for the county, and there should be some such Court set up, in substitution, if not in continuance, of the Recorder's Court for the City of Dublin itself. When I drew attention to the extraordinary amount of work that has been done in the Recorder's Court perhaps it might be no harm also for me to remind the Dáil that at least 90 per cent. of the writs issued at the present time are writs for amounts under £300, and I defy contradiction of that statement.

That being so, what shall be the result to-morrow when we pass this Bill? It will be that practically the whole of the business of this great commercial city of Dublin and the legal questions affecting the commercial community of Dublin shall be brought and tried before a subordinate Judge, known as a Circuit Judge, who will have to look after both the city and county. I think that that, from the point of view of Dublin itself, and from the point of view of its citizens, would be a disgraceful state of affairs as well as, I have already said, to my mind, being one impossible of realisation. Now, these are some of my objects in proposing that the number of Circuit Judges should not be limited to eight. I am confident that when these Judges are appointed it will be discovered that more will have to be appointed, and I think it will be far more honest, far more straightforward, and far better policy on the part of the Government to take power to appoint, if not to appoint at once, a sufficient number of Judges to do the work than to appoint an insufficient number who they know cannot do the work, followed up by appointments of a number of emergency men who will not have the dignity, honour, and independence that go to make an upright, honest and fearless Bench.

Mr. GOREY: It would be plainer to the ordinary Deputy, and perhaps to the ordinary man in the street, to come down to actual facts. We do not want to know the different heads of business dealt with by Judges, or the amount of their decrees, but we do want to know how many days they work in the year, and how many hours they work in the day, or, under the new regulations, which give them extended jurisdiction, how many days they will work, and also how many hours per day. There has been a suggestion from the Labour Benches about overtime, but perhaps they can deal with that later themselves. These are questions that will help us in coming to a decision in these matters, and if we get an answer to them I think we will be very easily able to deal with the matter.

The PRESIDENT: I think the Dáil is indebted to Deputy Redmond for the able manner in which he dealt with this subject, and for the fact that he brought to notice the recommendations of the Judiciary Committee. It is correct in saying that they made recommendations that no less than eight should be appointed Circuit Judges. We had in mind what Deputy Redmond stated when drawing attention to the fact that there were sixteen County Court Judges in Ireland, the administration of whose office was perhaps regarded as a plum by the legal profession. There was little work to do and plenty of time to do it. It was estimated that they had only four months' work in the year, but it is calculated that under this new form they will have ten months' as against four months' work. It is not possible now to do more than estimate or anticipate to what extent, or at what number the Circuit Judges should be fixed, but it is right to say that there was an unfortunate estimate in the case of County Court Judges, an estimate which the Deputy stated he was at the time anxious to reduce. We must take precaution that we shall not act in the same way. If there be work for a greater number, it will be the duty of the Executive to come here and ask for power to appoint them. It is unlikely that any Executive would be in a position to say what number of judges would be required for a very considerable period. We have a big list of business to go through; there is a number of claims under the Damage to Property Act, as well as arrears of work, and so on, and perhaps a larger Bench than eight Circuit Judges will be required. It would be undesirable, in our opinion, now to man that particular section too well, because we have experience that when people are called on, in times of stress and anxiety, and in a crisis, to say: "You used us when you had difficult work to do and it is now for you to find employment for us in the future." I do not know if that would apply if we appointed ten, twelve, or eight Judges and it subsequently transpired that we had not work for them.

It is impossible to anticipate to what extent the work hitherto done by the County Court Judges will be relieved by the Circuit Judges, and the extra work is also difficult to estimate. At any rate, the Finance Ministry, giving very careful consideration to this, made it a condition that the precise number should be not more than eight. If it be necessary to ask for more, we will ask for them.

The Deputy referred to the Recorder. The Recorder of Dublin is a very able Judge—a great Judge. He has discharged his duties since our responsibilities began with very great credit to himself and to this country. He has done his duty fearlessly as a Judge and he is an ornament to the office he holds. I do not know that hard work shortens the days of Judges or lessens their capacity for dealing with work. It is a remarkable fact that, as his work increased, he showed greater form, and I hope that we shall give the new Judges an opportunity also of showing their form.

Captain REDMOND: In view of what the President has said I do not intend to press this amendment, but I would like to know whether it is the present intention of the Government, if they discover that these eight will not be able to perform the task allotted to them, then to apply to this Dáil for an Act enabling them to create new Judges, because, if that should be their intention, I would, in no way, oppose it. I think that would be the proper remedy. But what I do not—I must candidly admit—care for is the proposal in this subsequent Section 46, which I have already referred to, to create from time to time temporary assistant Judges. I would very much like, therefore, if the President could give me any assurance that if the Judges who are appointed are not, in the Government's opinion, able to carry out their duties satisfactorily, the Government will come to this Dáil and ask for a measure enabling them to create new Judges. I would like to know whether they will proceed, under Section 41, to appoint temporary Judges.

The PRESIDENT: I hope the Deputy has not misinterpreted what I said about arrears of work and the large number of compensation claims. I take it, as far as the first year is concerned, and possibly for two years, that we may have to appoint an equal number of Assistant Judges, with the Circuit Judges. If, as soon as this large volume of work is completed, we find eight is not sufficient we will certainly come to the Dáil and ask for more.

Captain REDMOND: I accept the President's statement.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: With regard to the Section itself, it would be very desirable if the President could bring before this 5 o'clock. Dáil somewhat fuller details as to the expenditure involved by the State in appointing this number of Circuit Courts. I had a motion down yesterday that this matter should in the first instance be referred to a Select Committee, and my intention was that they should inquire into the recommendations of the Judiciary Committee in order that the Dáil should know what evidence had been heard by that Committee in coming to a conclusion that those Courts should be set up, and, further, that such a Committee might be able to let this Dáil have fuller and more detailed information with regard to this question of expenditure.

The President stated it was going to mean cheaper law for the litigant. Unquestionably, it will mean cheaper law for the litigant, but it will mean greater expense for the taxpayer. It is the taxpayer who is going to be called upon to provide cheaper law for the litigant. Each of those Circuit Courts will have attached to it what will virtually be a High Court establishment. There will be at least eight High Court establishments throughout the country, and each of those Circuit Courts will have to travel over the whole of the area of their jurisdiction. They will have to remove with them all their books, records and paraphernalia. All that is going to cause greater expense. I think, when we are asked to decide a question of this kind with the finances of the country in the state in which they are at the present moment, we ought to be entitled to call upon the President, in this case steering this Bill through Committee, to come to this Dáil and state what the cost is likely to be. We can each work out in a little time how much cheaper law it is going to mean for the litigant and the litigious person. But the litigant is not the only person to be considered. The taxpayer is far more important, especially with the finances of the country in the present position. I therefore ask, before this Section 37 is put to the Dáil for a vote, that the President should tell us what the cost of each of those Circuit Courts is going to be and what the total cost, as compared with that of the displaced Courts, is going to be. It would be desirable if the President would address himself to some of the criticisms that have been made in the country during the past two or three weeks with regard to the effect or the existence of such Courts on the commercial and mercantile credit of the country. We know a statement has been made that the Dublin merchants will be called upon to appeal to juries in the areas where debts may be owing. They may be called upon actually to appeal to friends and relatives of persons who may owe them monies that are being claimed.

There is a great deal of disquietude with regard to it, and the disquietude is very largely justified. An Act was passed not long ago entitled "The Public Safety (Emergency Powers) Act," and Section 12 of that Act states:—

"Where an indictment for a crime committed at any place in Saorstát Éireann has been found against any person, or any person has been committed for trial for such crime, the High Court on an application by or on behalf of the Attorney-General of Saorstát Éireann and upon his Certificate that he believes that a more fair and impartial trial can be had at a court and in a county to be named in such Certificate, shall make an order as of course that the trial shall be had at the court and in the county named in the Certificate."

The Bill was brought before this Dáil by the Minister for Home Affairs. In commending it to the Dáil he stated on the 26th June—I am quoting from the Official Report:—"Section 12 of the Bill provides for a change of venue in criminal cases on the certificate of the Attorney-General that he believes that a fairer and more impartial trial can be had at a Court, and in a county to be named in such certificate." These are the words used by the Minister in commending the Bill, and in commending that provision. He went on to say:—"It enables the venue of a particular trial to be changed in the case of criminal offences. That," he said, "unfortunately, is likely to be necessary." In other words, the Minister came here and stated that there was reason to believe that a fair trial was not likely to be had in the actual area, and before the friends of the person in the area where the offence was actually committed. I put the case to the Dáil and the Ministry in this way. Here are two persons, A and B. One person, A, is robbed of £500 in a certain country town; B is a tradesman in that town who owes £500 to a merchant in Dublin; the Minister for Home Affairs states that in the case of A it would be undesirable for the trial to be held in the town where he was a resident, because it would be improbable that the trial would be impartial or fair. If that be the case, and it is not my statement, but the statement of the Minister for Home Affairs, how does it come about that a fairer and more impartial trial is likely to be had in the same town in respect of the man who would like to escape his liability for paying £500 if he could? There are persons, and I think the President will admit it from his experience as a tax collector during the past twelve months, who would like to escape their liabilities if they could.

The PRESIDENT: No, they are all paying up now.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: But there are persons of that sort. If what the Minister for Home Affairs stated was a right statement, and the provision for which he pleaded is now the law of this State, in respect of the person who committed a robbery, a venal offence, against which the minds of jurymen might be more easily aroused, if a fair trial was not likely to be found in a country town against the person who was an avowed robber, how does it come about that a fairer trial is likely to be had for a person who owes money? The matter is taking a somewhat serious form. I had it brought to my knowledge within the past two or three days, and I have asked and procured permission to use this knowledge in the Dáil. It is that certain large English mercantile houses have taken advice of solicitors in this city in respect of clients in country districts in Ireland, because of the possible, the almost certain, passage of this Bill with these provisions embodied into it, that they will, prior to doing business with houses in country parts in Ireland, adopt an agreement, one of the articles of that agreement to be that in all cases of dispute, whether as to money owing or as to fulfilment of contract, a special arbitration clause shall operate, the arbitration in respect of that clause to be held in England, the country of the person supplying the goods. That clause is actually in draft. It is not a very pleasing thing that such a clause should be adopted. I have read the particular clause and I referred to it and spoke of it to a Dublin merchant, who stated that they also felt that in the present circumstances, at least, it was a very doubtful principle to bring cases for the fulfilment of debts before juries that might reasonably be composed of friends of the person against whom the action is being instituted. I put that forward; it is common knowledge that it is disturbing many people in the city of Dublin. I make no plea here with regard to merchants in England. That is their own concern, but I do urge that considerations that do so vitally affect merchants here and that have been ventilated by them, should be dealt with, and that some statement should be made respecting it.

I am aware of the statement made by the Attorney-General two days ago, which is backed by the substance of the Bill, that actions in such cases might be instituted in the High Court in Dublin. It is also true, and he, I believe, did not state it in his communication to the Press, that appeals might be brought back again to the High Court in Dublin. These are, I agree, protection, but in the degree in which they will be adequate protection they remove the argument brought here by the President when he said that the extended jurisdiction of these Circuit Courts will reduce the cost to litigants. Litigants under the present regime are confined to one court, which would be the Court of first instance as well as practically the final Court for them to proceed in. Under the new provisions they may start proceedings in the High Court, continue them in a Circuit Court, and then bring them back again to the High Court, and that, I think, will not mean cheaper litigation. Clearly it will not. But whether it does or does not, two important arguments against this article are these. In the first instance, that it will not help to strengthen the credit of this country; and, secondly, that it will mean very much heavier costs to the taxpayer. It is in order that the second might be met that I desire that facts and figures should be communicated to the Dáil, and I now invite the President to give some information as to the cost. I know that the cost has been promised. He made a statement a short time ago that the Ministry of Finance urged that the words embodied in this Clause should be "Not more than eight Courts."

Now, I think it is fair to infer from that statement of his that the Ministry of Finance has gone into the question of cost in respect of the Courts. That is a fair inference. If the Ministry of Finance has gone into the question, it is reasonable to expect that it should let us know exactly what the cost of each of these Circuit Courts is to be. I venture to say that if that information be given, the President may be able to maintain his statement that the institution of Circuit Courts will mean cheaper litigation for persons litigiously inclined, but it will mean much heavier taxation for the taxpayers.

Major COOPER: I only want to make a minor point. By virtue of the passing of this Section the old County Courts will cease to exist. A certain amount of anxiety is felt by some employees of these Courts, men in humble positions, civil bill officers, and people like that. I should like if the President would make a statement as to how these people will be affected, whether it is the intention of the Government to continue them, and whether they have any pensionable rights. I should think myself under Article 10 of the Treaty they would have pensionable rights. I should be very grateful if the President would say something to reassure their anxiety.

Professor MAGENNIS: Deputy Darrell Figgis, with something of that ingenuity which is so characteristic of him, has contrived to deliver a Second Reading speech, which through some misadventure was not delivered on the occasion of the Second Reading. He demands figures which he knows from the nature of the case could not be forthcoming in a form altogether satisfactory to a critic such as he. It is most important to remember there are quite a host of amendments still awaiting consideration. Some of them may be accepted by the Government, and it may prove that the remuneration set down in the Bill for Circuit Judges may be increased, and consequently the Bill in that respect would require a little alteration. But that is not the point I wish to make at the moment on this section of his argument. Let us not lose sight of this, that the public funds are not dipped into for the payment of Judges, so that the taxpayer, qua taxpayer, is not bearing the total costs. As I mentioned, in connection with the Judges of the High Court and Supreme Court, fees paid by litigants add a very considerable amount to the takings of the revenue, and it would not possibly be anything but a very approximate and considerably inadequate estimate as to what the amount of litigation may come to when normal conditions have been arrived at. Remember that a great amount of litigation is a proof of prosperity, and we have confidence in the growth of the Free State and believe, therefore, that there will be recourse to the Courts in greater measure than hitherto, and there will be great confidence in these Courts of our own establishment and in their administration. The whole doctrine of Deputy Figgis is that we should legislate to make it easy for Manchester merchants to collect debts in Ireland.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I must protest against what I will not say was a deliberate but a very manifest perversion of what I said. I specifically said I did not speak on their behalf, but that I was speaking on behalf of the merchants in this city, the capital of the Free State.

Professor MAGENNIS: Deputy Darrell Figgis in the argument which I was trying to condense reminded me vividly of the famous scene in Bardell v. Pickwick, when Sergeant Buzzfuz, fixing his eye with glaring gaze on the defendant, said: "If the defendant, Pickwick, be, as I am informed he is, present in this court, I would tell him, etc." He made the plea for the Manchester merchants, and then disclaimed any intention of making it for them. We who live in Dublin are all aware that there are agencies for the collection of debts, and it is not an infrequent thing for a debtor with lightning-like rapidity when a writ is served on him to prefer to pay, and he faces an inordinate amount of expense on the writ rather than litigate it. That is a constant and frequent experience. Why should the farmer or small shopkeeper in the country be put at a disadvantage merely because traders across the Channel will want to be facilitated? If Deputy Figgis had taken the trouble to read the amendments tabled he would have seen that one of his objections disappears.

In page 6 there is what I may for convenience call a Government amendment. It is over the name of Deputy Duggan. "Provided also that any party to an action commenced in the Circuit Court, and pending therein, may at any time apply to the Circuit Judge that the action may be sent forward to the High Court, and thereupon in case the action is one fit to be prosecuted in the High Court, and the High Court appears to be the most appropriate tribunal in the circumstances, the Circuit Judge may send forward such action." That is an amendment precisely on all fours but not quite identical with the amendment which I had the pleasure of withdrawing yesterday evening in view of this. There is no difficulty whatever in this matter. It is one of the mare's nests that some Deputies take particular delight in discovering.

The PRESIDENT: I am invited by Deputy Figgis to address myself to four particular subjects. One was the Press references in connection with this Bill; the second was a balance sheet; the third was credit, and the fourth, I think, was certain conditions put in by British manufacturers or traders on arbitration in England. As regards the Press references, I read one letter signed by a very distinguished person, and I said to myself after reading it, to use a vulgarism, "That's wallops." He explained in the beginning that he had changed his mind, and he explained at the end why he had changed it. It reminded me of the earlier period of picture postcards, in one of which there was depicted the father of a family, and I think 10 children in the bed. He turned over and two of the children fell out of the bed. Underneath was written "When father turns we all turn." I hope Deputy Figgis was not one of the children who fell out.

In this case this man, having changed his mind, and being originally in favour of the Bill, thinks that we-

[The President.] should all change our minds at once. That is not an operation easily performed in this country. People do not change their minds so rapidly. I have not had time to address myself to Press references. I have Press references here in piles. I think, sir, it was your intention on one occasion to prohibit the reading of newspapers in the Dáil during the conduct of business. I may say it is the only opportunity that I have of reading the newspapers, and of course I would not like to come under your ban.

Press references have been mainly anonymous, and they are worthy of being anonymous. They have been directed in other places to the one purpose of damaging and endeavouring to ruin the credit of this country—a very serious and a very damnable form of propaganda. The credit of this country is high. It is rendered still higher by this Bill, in my opinion, if I am fit to form any judgment on the matter, and in the opinion of those who have been responsible for making up this Bill, those who advised us in the first instance as to how it should be constructed, and those who have advised us in its construction.

The credit of this country is not fairly described by Deputy Figgis when he puts into contrast the fact that the Minister for Home Affairs took temporary power for the Attorney-General to change the venue of trials. If the Deputy will look at page 6 of the Amendment Paper he will find there is power given to the Circuit Judge, on application, to change the venue if he thinks fit.

Most of the criticism of this Bill that has appeared in the Press is unfair and false criticism, and that is well known to the people who have uttered it; they know it is unfair and it is false. I am asked for a balance sheet, and a balance sheet, as the Deputy well knows, is a rather difficult thing to put before the Dáil dealing with a subject of this kind. In any change there is bound to be an adverse balance for a considerable period, if one has to take into consideration what has to be paid for getting rid of the older form of judicial system that we have had. If the Deputy has that in mind and means to say that in connection with a criticism of this sort, I make him a present of it. We have had the same disadvantage with regard to the police and with regard to some Civil Servants, and we are prepared to pay that price. It is for the benefit of the country, and I believe the country will be satisfied.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I was not referring to that at all; it was merely a comparison of expenditure.

The PRESIDENT: Well, the comparison of expenditure is that it cost £111,000 for the old system and it is estimated it will cost £76,000 for the new system. In that comparison there appear the names of the Lord Chief Justice, two Lords Justices of Appeal, six Judges, and one Judicial Commissioner, half of the Lord Chancellor's salary, the Recorders of Dublin, Cork and Galway, twelve County Court Judges and the bonuses paid to them, forty-six Resident Magistrates, their cost and estimated bonuses, their travelling and other expenses. On the other side, you have the President of the Supreme Court, two Appeal Judges, five High Court Judges and the President, eight Circuit Judges, thirty District Justices and Vacation Justices, making altogether a total on the one side of £111,400, and on the other £76,000. The estimated saving is £35,400, and the balance sheet has not been audited.

In the one case you have the Dublin Divisional Magistrates and the present staff of the Supreme Court, including the Land Registry, at a cost of £150,000. Then you have the Registrars of County Court Judges, Clerks of the Crown and Peace, with their bonuses, and there is added in the paragraph, "in all capacities." Then you have clerical assistants of the Clerks of the Crown and Peace, making a total of £210,000. That is for the present system. For the future staff the total is estimated at £154,000, and the estimated saving is £55,500. The Clerks to the District Courts will not cost more than the Clerks of Petty Sessions.

Then there is a note: "The above is the roughest possible sketch, and the only inference that can be safely drawn is that the new system will not be dearer to the State. The fees all round are too low at present. Several thousands more can be got without hardship to anybody," and that also is unaudited. I would like to give the Deputy all the information he wants on this or any other subject to help him to form fair criticism of the proposed system.

With regard to the British conditions of sale, we will suppose for a moment that that particular condition is put in and there has to be an arbitration in England. Who is to carry it out? An award is made, and we will say they grant a million against you or against me. Who is to carry it out? If it be thought by any people that we are going to see that our independence or our integrity as a State is going to be interfered with, whether or not they are business people, they will find they have bitten off more than they can chew. As regards credit, this time last year we addressed ourselves on many an occasion to this matter. We spoke plainly and harshly, perhaps, but it has had its effect. There has been a remarkable improvement in the collection of debts owing to the State. If you dispute that, I invite your consideration of the Iris Oifigiúil in which you will see the return of Income Tax paid up to date. The Land Commission annuities are being paid much better than last year. The Minister for Agriculture will bear me out when I say the Land Commission officials are busy writing out receipts for rents that are coming in under the Land Act passed last session. The credit of the country is improving day after day, and there is nothing to interfere with its progress towards perfectly normal conditions only those peculiar Press references or despondent cries of certain eritics, who apparently have not got a good digestion, or if they have, they do not know how to profit by it.

I think that is all I have to say on the subject. I would say, as regards the imputations that have been made upon juries, that I do not subscribe to them. I believe that the comparison that has been made between the Public Safety Act and this Bill is not a fair comparison. The idea that the Minister for Home Affairs had in his mind when he gave power to the Attorney-General to ask for a change of venue was that a certain terrorism existed which might prevent the normal flow of justice. We know that that is the case, or had been the case, but that is being gradually eliminated from our life in Ireland. I say gradually. It will take a little time. We will have to be satisfied that it is a slow, but a certain departure.

With regard to business, the same thing does not prevail. There are honest juries in the country who will honestly consider those questions. If there are complaints we are making provisions for considering them. But it is not fair that the whole jury system should be indicted here in that fashion, even if there are one or two places, or one or two cases in the country, where it is possible that a little mercy or generosity or something like that would enter into jurymen's minds. It is not right to infer that that complaint has infected the whole country, when we know very well that it has not. We know the juries in the country will give honest verdicts, whether the persons they have before them are Englishmen, Scotchmen, Frenchmen, or of any other nationality than our own.

Section 37 put and agreed to.

Sections 38 and 39 put and agreed to.

SECTION 40.

The age of retirement of Circuit Judges shall be 70 years.

Major COOPER: I beg to move as an amendment:—

"To add at the end of the Section, line 51, the words 'but the Executive Council may, on the advice of the Attorney-General, extend the age of retirement in the case of any Judge to 75 years.'"

I hope the Government may see their way to accept this amendment for two reasons. First, it is a purely permissive amendment, and it confers on them the power which they have been too modest to claim for themselves; second, I have taken the wording from Section 12 of the Bill which we have already passed. I think the Dáil will assent to the general principle that lies behind this amendment, and that is that as long as a man is fit to work and anxious to work and the Government is anxious for him to continue to serve the State that he will be allowed to work. This amendment will give them the power to continue the man if they think him still able to do useful work up to the age of 75 years.

There are professions where an age limit is necessary, but I do not think the Judicial profession is one of them. It may be said, as a general rule, that judges, like wine, improve with age. They gain experience and knowledge. Of course there are some wines that will never be improved, and the same may be said of some judges. I tried to make all my amendments fit in, as far as possible, with the general scheme of the Bill. I realise that we are treading new ways, and whatever natural conservatism one has must be suppressed. I put down other amendments, but these also I drew to the best of my ability with a desire to improve the Bill.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE,
took the Chair at this stage.

The PRESIDENT: There are two amendments to Section 40. One is from Deputy Bryan Cooper, and the other is from Deputies Magennis and Captain Redmond. In the one case it is a sort of omnibus amendment, and it will be noticed that we have kept all the three, or I should say four, Courts separate. There are four Courts, I believe. Now the adoption of Deputy Bryan Cooper's amendment would deal with other Judges than those which this particular part of the Bill applies to, whereas the other amendment, I think No. 3, deals with Circuit Judges only. I propose to accept the second, that is No. 3, with a slight alteration. That is to say we accept the principle of it, and will consider about producing an amendment at the next stage. The manner in which I propose to accept it would be that the Government (that is the Executive Council) may, after consultation with the Attorney-General and the Chief Justice, extend the age for retirement. It will, I think, be admitted that a consultation of those two would be advisable because in the case of the Supreme Court it might happen that it would be the Chief Justice's own position that would be in question, and while he would be prepared to give one decision with regard to it, the Attorney-General of the day might consider it would be advisable that he would go on. So we have the benefit of the advice of those two persons, one perhaps to be moved up, and the other to be moved out. In any case I think it would be a better method of arranging for any extension of term of office to have it on consultation with those two. If that were agreeable to Deputy Bryan Cooper I would bring it up on the next stage.

Professor MAGENNIS: I beg to accept the amendment in the form outlined by the President.

Mr. JOHNSON: I draw the attention of the President to the desirability of making this clear, that is, No. 3. If the amendment had been accepted in its present form it might apply to the Circuit Judges in general, whereas in No. 2 it is clear it applies to a specific case. I hope the President will bear that in mind.

The PRESIDENT: Yes.

Major COOPER: I am perfectly satisfied with the President's offer. In drafting the amendment I copied the wording of the Bill, but I agree that this form is preferable. I withdraw my amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Section 40 put and agreed to.

SECTION 41.

The declaration to be made by every Circuit Judge on appointment shall be that hereinbefore set forth in Section 13 of this Act mutatis mutandis. It shall be made and subscribed before the Chief Justice.

Professor MAGENNIS: This amendment stands in my name:—

In line 52, to delete the words "The declaration to be made" and to substitute therefor the words "The Oath to be taken and subscribed," and in line 53 to delete the words "set forth in" and to substitute therefor the words "as prescribed by."

This has been already accepted in its present form. I had a similar amendment with regard to the declaration to be taken by the High Court and Supreme Court Judges. The President was good enough to undertake to bring forward another declaration, and that is set out in the Bill at a subsequent stage, consequently it is unnecessary for me to move it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Section 41 put and agreed to.

SECTION 42.

Each Circuit Judge shall receive a salary of £1,500 per annum, and on retirement, after 15 years' service or upwards, or owing to age or permanent infirmity, shall be entitled for his life to a pension amounting to two-thirds of his salary.

Mr. BEAMISH: The following amendment is in my name:

In line 4, at the end of the Section to add the words:—

“Provided that where under the provisions of Section 44 a Recorder or a County Court Judge in Ireland is appointed a Judge of the Circuit Court the person so appointed shall receive a salary not less than his existing salary, and his appointment as Judge of the Circuit Court shall not prejudice any right of retirement or pension on retirement which such person would have enjoyed if he had not been so appointed.”

In view of the undertaking given, I beg to withdraw it.

Section 42 put and agreed to.

Section 43 put and agreed to.

SECTION 44.

No person shall be appointed a Judge of the Circuit Court who is not at the date of his appointment a practising Barrister of ten years' standing at least or has not been a Recorder or a County Court Judge in Ireland, but service as a Justice of the District Court of Saorstát Éireann shall be deemed practice at the Bar for the purpose of this provision and shall be reckoned as service within the meaning of Section 42 hereof in the case of a Justice of the District Court who shall be appointed a Judge of the Circuit Court.

Mr. JOHNSON: I have an amendment to propose:

To delete all after the words “at least” in line 12 down to the words “provision and” in line 15, and to substitute therefor the words:—

“or a District Justice or a Justice of the District Court of Saorstát Éireann of ten years' standing either as a barrister or a solicitor, or who has not been a Recorder or a County Court Judge in Ireland, and service as a Justice in the District Court of Saorstát Éireann.”

The object of this amendment is to place District Justices who may have been solicitors on a level in regard to the opportunity for appointment to a higher office with barristers who may be District Justices. I do not know whether there is any intention on the part of the Government in drafting this Bill to give a preference to that section of the legal profession which does the pleading, but the proposition in the amendment is to put both sections of that profession on a level.

The intention is, whether a District Justice, or a Justice of the District Court who has had ten years' standing, either as a Barrister or Solicitor, shall be on a level for appointment as a Judge of the Circuit Court. I hope it is not necessary to argue the case for this equality of opportunity. I know there are certain jealousies between the two professions, and I think it may be well contended that the solicitor who has qualified to act as a District Justice, or as a Justice at all, with his experience, and I think I am right in saying longer training in the preliminary stages at any rate, is quite as well qualified to act as a Judge as the Barrister. I would like, as a matter of fact, to have seen the Bill so framed as to make it desirable that the two branches of the profession should be amalgamated, or at least that there should be an interchange between them. But we are not dealing with that now. I am asking that the Dáil should accept the proposition that a solicitor who has been appointed a Justice of a District Court should be on equal terms for promotion, as we would call it, with the Barrister who has acted as such a Justice. I hope the Government will see their way to accept this amendment without further argument.

Captain REDMOND: I notice that towards the concluding portion of Deputy Johnson's remarks, in proposing this amendment, he said he had hoped that an amalgamation between the two branches of the learned profession to which I have the honour to belong should take place. Now, Deputy Johnson is a very guileless person, but surely to goodness he does not expect any of the Deputies to understand that that is not the very object and intention of this amendment. On the contrary, I claim that this amendment, if carried, to all intents and purposes would bring about the object which Deputy Johnson so much desires. Now, there is a great deal to be said in favour of the amalgamation of the two branches of this profession, and like most other subjects there is a great deal to be said against. The experiment has been tried in many countries, notably in some of our now sister Dominions. It was adopted also in the United States of America. Yes, in theory it has been tried, but in practice it has failed, and why? For one reason, and one good reason only, and that is, that no one man can be in two places and do two entirely different jobs at the same time. What I mean by that is this, that you cannot have a man entirely devoting his time to consultation with clients and to the office work necessary for the production and preparation of cases in Court, and at the same time have the same person present that case with the knowledge and with the result of the necessary legal research which he should have gone in to in order to be able to present the case.

Deputy Johnson has spoken of equality of opportunity. I would like to ask the Deputy one small question. He is strongly in favour of the amalgamation of these two branches of the legal profession. He is entitled to be so, but I would like to ask him this. Would he be in favour of the amalgamation of joiners with, let us say, cabinet-makers?

Mr. JOHNSON: Yes.

Captain REDMOND: He would.

Mr. JOHNSON: Certainly.

Captain REDMOND: Therefore, he is in favour, not of various distinct trade unions, but rather of a jack-of-all-trades sort of artisan.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Deputy must be living in a past age. These trades have been amalgamated for years.

Captain REDMOND: They may be amalgamated as a union, but what I want to point out to Deputy Johnson, and to other Deputies, is that the question of training, and the question of craft, is in each case distinct and different. An ordinary cabinet-maker might not be a good joiner, and vice versa, but what is not generally understood in the minds of outsiders, and when I say outsiders I use the word in no derogatory sense, but of extra legal people, is that the two branches of the profession are so entirely and completely distinct. Now, what this amendment proposes to do is to render promotion to the higher positions on the bench open to that branch of the profession who have not gone in for the study of the theory of the law, so much as for the practice and procedure of it.

There is no doubt that, among certain sections of both branches, there may be jealousy, but I do not think that Deputy Johnson has made his ground quite safe or sound when he comes here and proposes such an amendment as this without having consulted those immediately concerned. I do not know but he may have the authority of the Incorporated Law Society to speak on their behalf; I do not know whether he has or not. He may have the authority of the Bar Council, but I do not think he has; but he will say that he has the authority of the well-being of the people. Very well. I submit that the community at large would not benefit one thraneen by the change that he proposes to make, because, as I previously stated, one man cannot do two jobs at two places at the one time. I would therefore appeal to the Government, and to the Dáil generally, not to accept this amendment, because if this amendment were accepted it would be altering the whole frame and principle of this Bill; it would be introducing an entirely new element into it, a most controversial element, and an element which has had nothing like universal discussion, or even any discussion at all throughout the country. I think the proper time and place to discuss such a proposal would be by the introduction of a new Bill framed upon the lines of this amendment.

Mr. HEWAT: I ask the Government, and the Dáil, not to accept the amendment now before them. Already, in connection with this Bill, I think there is a feeling that the Bar profession is in danger of being lowered. I do not hold with that opinion in the least, but I do say that any alteration in the direction of this amendment would be very detrimental to the whole Bar system. What we have to look forward to, and what is embodied in the principle of the Bill, is a Judicature of the very best quality and the very best material that can be got. The training of the Barrister fits him particularly, or more particularly, for the office of Judge. The natural aspirations of the Solicitor's branch of the profession are not detrimentally affected. The two branches of the profession, general opinion, I think would claim, should be separate. I think litigants would rather have them separate, and, certainly, any question of amalgamating the two professions would have a detrimental effect upon both. So long as they are kept separate there must be an incentive to members of the Bar to get such prominence, and prestige, that they will be qualified to act as Judges in the High Court and in the Circuit Courts, and any weakening of that natural aspiration might be very seriously detrimental to the profession as a whole. I would respectfully ask the Dáil to carefully consider the result of the amendment that they are now asked to pass.

Professor MAGENNIS: I sympathise with what is in the mind of Deputy Johnson. It does seem, at any rate at first sight, a grievance that a member of the Solicitors' profession is eligible for appointment to the position of District Justice, and that along with him, the Barrister is eligible; and that 'A,' selected from the one, and B from the other, and appointed at the same time, thereafter have two different prospects of promotion.

I think Deputy Johnson is mistaken, if he will allow me to say so, in putting his objection upon the ground of democracy. We are in the habit of invoking democratic principle on behalf of nearly everything we wish to have done, by way of alteration, in the existing system. He appeals to equality of opportunity. Does the preservation of the radical differentiation of functions between the solicitor and barrister preclude equality of opportunity? Let me give a parallel from a sister profession. There is such a thing as the general practitioner among doctors, but what usually happens is that if a man is seriously concerned with regard to the symptoms he has developed, or seems to have developed, he prefers to have the opinion of an expert, and if the expert recommends an operation the patient prefers to be operated on by a skilled and long-experienced surgeon instead of undergoing a mauling at the hands of a man who is apothecary, drug mixer, prescriber, and all the rest. There is no department of activity in which specialisation of functions is so much insisted on as in the trade unions. Fancy a plumber allowing his helper to operate as a plumber. These are two different things. The skilled labourer and the unskilled labourer are not put on the same plane, nor by a parity of reasons, ought a man whose special training has given him particular skill in one department of the law be called in to do the work which is the peculiar function of a man who has undergone a different type of training.

Mr. O'CONNELL: The unskilled man.

Professor MAGENNIS: Deputy O'Connell is in bad company over there on the Labour Benches, for he is acquiring a habit of sophistication which his earlier education would have taught him to avoid. I am giving a parallel, which is a different thing from a suggestion of identical cases. Deputy Johnson would prefer the two aspirants to the legal profession to undergo the same training. Does he think that [Professor Magennis.] would conduce to the greater advantage of the public. It has been tried. Again I appeal to the case of America, which evidently commends itself as a wonderful ideal and model to Deputy Johnson.

Mr. JOHNSON: Never.

Professor MAGENNIS: I suspected that in his calmer and more reasonable moments Deputy Johnson would confess that he does not admire American methods. It is notorious that when A, B, C and D are members of the same legal firm, and A operates as a solicitor, and B as pleader in the Courts, that what gradually comes about is this. They monopolise the entire legal business because one of them goes upon the Bench for a period and comes back into his office, and so on, until a situation is contrived that it would not be to the advantage of any one to employ anyone but that firm or they would get an adverse decision in every case. That is not a model that encourages us to have amalgamation of the two professions. The Deputy also spoke of jealousy between the two. Is there jealousy? That is an assumption that I do not pass without challenge. There are many solicitors who much prefer to remain what they are. The profession is much more lucrative. There are lines of practice open to the solicitor which are highly lucrative and do not come within the province of the unfortunate barrister, and his fees are limited. The "two-tvos" of the junior barrister do not add up to very much at the end of the legal session. He has no opportunity of serving writs, collecting debts, or of lending money upon mortgage. These are fine things in the solicitor's profession.

As regards equality of opportunity, the solicitor who feels called by predilection to the barrister's profession can become a barrister with facility, and it has happened. The late Mr. Justice Powell, who was an admirable judge, of whom everyone spoke in the highest possible terms, was for a long period a solicitor before he went to the Bar. There are others living, and, therefore, I will not mention them—not that I mean to imply that they are unmentionable. The fact is that in the District Justice Courts' practice it is possible, because of the peculiar work on the civil side that will fall within the operation of the District Justice, that a solicitor may discharge that function very well, and he may in course of a long time develop within him unsuspected capacities that would enable him to become a Circuit Judge. But meanwhile, a barrister who is practising in the court is undergoing a type of training and is having a sort of experience which will far better qualify him for functioning on the higher bench. So if you look at this thing from the point of view of the legal profession, certain solicitors who cannot find room in the country town for their office with any great hope of success would like to have an opportunity of practising at the Bar when occasionally they would visit a Bar centre, and the unemployed at the Bar, the briefless barrister, of whom, unfortunately, there is quite a host, would no doubt be glad to have facilities on occasion to operate as a solicitor. But we have to consider the benefit of the public at large, and not the facilitation of the jack-of-all-trades to put on a robe and wig and call himself a barrister, and then like a quick-change artiste of the music halls throw them aside and function as a solicitor. It is not good for the public, and it certainly would not be good for the legal administration in the long run. It is much better to have one man specialising on the hearing of the client's statement of his case, reducing it to writing, preparing briefs, briefing the counsel, advising counsel, and the counsel then stating what the law is that applies to this and doing the pleading in court. Not only has the counsel, as Deputy Redmond reminds me, to look up the law, but he has to be able to know where to look for it. I can speak from experience in that regard, having worked under one of the present judges when he was a Serjeant-at-law. What excited my admiration in his regard as a senior, was that he was able to order me to find out a case for him to establish such and such a point and to tell me where to look for that. It was in that that his knowledge of law consisted, and that is a special gift and acquisition that a man cannot attain who is carrying on an altogether different practice in a different line of the profession.

Mr. JOHNSON: The speeches of Deputies Redmond and Magennis go far, I think, to prove the case for the amendment. They have shown how important it is to be able to plead effectively, but they have not shown in their discussion the qualities of sound judgment which are required in a judge. Pleading is one thing; ability to plead effectively, powerfully, no doubt is a very important attribute, but it is not necessarily the quality which should go to make a judge. I venture to say that the solicitor who has been deemed to be sufficiently wise and judicial in his outlook to become a Justice may—not shall—be qualified also to be a judge of the court if he has shown sound judgment in his administration of the law in the lower court. Deputy Redmond tried, I think, to show that there was some analogy between the position of the cabinet-maker and the joiner, two trades which were apart and distinct, but have been for some considerable time amalgamated as organised bodies. They are in the position that I would like under this amendment the two branches of the legal profession to be placed in. The cabinet-maker and the joiner, both employed for special work, if you like, by the same employer, may if they show special aptitude for a higher quality of work such as foremanship, be appointed as a foreman. The employer is quite at liberty to promote either to the higher office, provided that he shows aptitude. That is what I desire in this amendment. I want to remove that demarcation which I am sure Deputy Good would like to see removed from certain trades. If the aptitude is shown the judgment is proved. Although one man has chosen one path in the earlier days and another has chosen another, both have been allowed to accept office and act as Justices in those questions, very important very often, which the poor average citizen is affected by, and if they show sound judgment they should be entitled on equal terms to advance to the higher Court. I am sure the solicitors in the Dáil and the solicitors outside will not be thankful for the suggestion from Deputy Magennis that they are in the position to the barrister that the plumber's labourer is to the plumber. But really that is not the point. The point is that you have solicitors eligible for appointment to a certain position in the Judiciary and presumed to have the qualities worthy for that appointment who are then prevented from advancement. It seems to me that the case to be made is why there should be such a debarring. It is the business, I would suggest, of those who have promoted the Bill in its present form to justify that exclusion. We have not heard whether the Government is prepared to accept the amendment or not, and I will ask the Dáil not to be misled by the argument of Deputies Redmond and Magennis that this must necessarily entail an amalgamation of the professions. That is a proposition that can be argued and discussed on its merits when it is brought forward. That is not the proposition in the amendment. The amendment is confined to the position of District Justices who have presumably been qualified for that office. I ask that they shall not be disqualified for promotion.

Major MYLES: I think the amendment put forward by Deputy Johnson is a very fair attempt to help solicitors, as a body, a little on the upward path. I cannot agree with the arguments put forward by Deputy Redmond and Deputy Magennis. Naturally, in the first place they are biassed, and in the second place they confine their attack to one remark made by Deputy Johnson, that he would like to see the two professions amalgamated. That was the principal object of attack by both Deputies, and got away, to my mind, from the real point. The first thing that struck me on reading Section 44 was that the solicitors had got—at least those of them who had been through the ranks of the District Justices—a chance of further promotion, not as Deputy Redmond said, to the higher office, but only to the Circuit Court. I think if Deputies will look again at Section 44 they will see that at a first glance it might bear that interpretation—that a District Justice who was a solicitor might be eligible for promotion to the Circuit Court. That is the way it struck me on a first reading. In this case I would ask the Executive to accept Deputy Johnson's amendment, because it is unfair that these solicitors should be placed on equal terms with barristers as District Justices, and then could go no farther, no matter what their record may have been, or how well they had done their work. I think they are entitled to go at least one step farther. There is a further point in reference to Deputy Johnson's amendment, and I suggest that he should add to it, after the word "solicitor," the words "including the time served as District Justice." I mention that because a District Justice can be appointed on six years' standing, but a Circuit Judge must have ten years' standing. You might inflict hardship on a particular District Justice who has only six years' standing, whereas if you count his service as a District Justice towards the ten years that are necessary, then you remove that difficulty.

Professor MAGENNIS: I protest against the misinterpretation, which I know, of course, is unintentional, by which I am represented as minimising or attempting to disparage the solicitors' profession. I repeat what I said. The solicitors' and the barristers' professions are different. They are wholly diverse occupations. That is not to infer that one is inferior to the other. The last Deputy used the words that the path upward should be made easy for the solicitor. Now what is really at the back of Deputy Johnson's mind? If I may be allowed to interpret what he has not chosen to bring up into a clearer consciousness, is the conception of a judge as the Cadi under the tree—any man of common sense, with considerable experience of life, sanity of judgment, and breadth of view is as well able to be a Judge of the High Court as any other man with the same qualification. Now I might as well profess to be an electrical engineer and practise it because electricity was part of my course in physics for the University examination. It all comes down to this—the fallacy that because a solicitor and a barrister are both lawyers, and as a court of law is dealing with law, therefore, they are both equally fit to function as Judges in a court of law. It is not because the solicitor, as a man and brother, is worse by being a solicitor than if he had been a barrister. It is not because he has less ability and aptitude, or that he got a worse education. It is because the line of life of the avocation which he pursues every day is one that fits him in peculiar fashion for the discharge of certain functions, and the avocation of the barrister fits him for quite other functions. Deputy Johnson does not see that practice before a High Court Judge is the fittest apprenticeship for being on the Bench of the High Court. It is not everyone who understands the laws of evidence, what is admissible to be put in evidence, and what is not. All sorts of delicate and subtle questions arise that do not fall into the every-day work of the solicitor. If a client came to a solicitor and put questions about these things to him he would submit a case to Counsel. It is a most important differentiation of functions. Furthermore, I may mention, incidentally, that a disappointed client may take an action against a solicitor for wrongful conduct of his case. The barrister is immune. There is a reason for that.

Mr. JOHNSON: Hear, hear.

Professor MAGENNIS: Deputy Johnson finds he has discovered something dreadful, something that proves the barristers' profession a horrible thing. What is the reason? Every Deputy in the Dáil is immune from prosecution for slander, no matter how slanderous he may become. Why? Because in the public interest it is most desirable the risk should be taken that men would abuse their privilege rather than that the privilege should not exist for the free criticism of public affairs. Similarly there is this differentiation. The point really is this: the special apprenticeship for service on the Bench is got in the practise before the courts. To call it pleading, as Deputy Johnson chose to call it, is to lose sight of the more important part of the work Counsel does.

Mr. JOHNSON: May I just point out that the clause as it stands allows a Justice who has been a solicitor to be promoted. It reads: "No person shall be appointed a Judge of the Circuit Court who is not at the date of his appointment a practising barrister of ten years' standing at least, or has not been a Recorder or a County Court Judge in Ireland, but service as a Justice of the District Court of Saorstát Éireann shall be deemed practice at the Bar for the purpose of this provision." So that, if a solicitor is appointed to be a Justice, and is a Justice sufficiently long he may be promoted, even as the clause stands.

The only question is whether that service shall be as long in the one case as in the other. Again, all I am asking the Dáil to agree to is to put them on a level in regard to their previous training. If the solicitor who is made a Justice can serve long enough under the clause as it stands, he may be promoted to the High Court, so that the effect of the amendment is not to alter the intentions radically at all. It is quite in consonance with the spirit of this clause. It is only altering a detail, and, therefore, I ask the Dáil to accept it.

Captain REDMOND: I am afraid I cannot allow Deputy Johnson's ingenious interpretation of this Section to go unchallenged. He evidently wants to make out that a number of years in the capacity of a District Justice will render a person a barrister. Unfortunately, I will give a free opinion on that subject, and I do so most readily, because, so far as I understand the law of the matter, no one can be admitted a barrister who has not been called to the Bar.

Mr. JOHNSON: That is only until this is passed.

Captain REDMOND: In reply to Deputy Johnson, much as I think of this Act and what it proposes to accomplish, I do not think it in any way repeals the rules governing the admission of members to the Bar. It is a very deep and difficult subject which he has just raised, because what a barrister is, and where he derives his status, and what that status carries with it, is a matter which we could debate from now probably until this time to-morrow, but at the same time I think it would be treating the matter too lightly to allow a suggestion to go that this Bill purports to create, by a number of years' service, a member of the Bar. I would like also to draw the attention of the Committee to the real fallacy in Deputy Johnson's reasoning. There are two branches of the legal profession, and of that there is no doubt, no possible doubt whatever; but the two branches are as different as, let me say, a plasterer and a bricklayer. A bricklayer cannot go on with his work and has to call in a plasterer when it comes to plastering, because it is a plasterer's job. What I was anxious to convey was that there is an essential difference, not only in the training, but in the actual subject matter of a barrister's and of a solicitor's life. A client goes to a solicitor and states his case. The solicitor may be somewhat of a lawyer or he may not. A solicitor is very often a good lawyer, but probably the better the lawyer the solicitor is the more anxious will he be to secure counsel's opinion upon a case, because the business of a barrister is, first of all, to know as much law as he can, and it is impossible to carry all law about in one's head; but the next part of his business is to know where to find the law, as Deputy Magennis so well said. A solicitor, one may say, knows a certain amount of law and knows where to find it, but has not the time nor the opportunity to do so. He has to see his clients. He has to go to auctions and he has to look after a hundred and one very profitable things which, unfortunately, poor barristers, by their own very rules, are precluded from doing. Therefore, the two branches are entirely distinct, and as for pleading being an essential weapon in the barrister's armoury, it is nothing of the kind. Why, it is a well known fact that some of the greatest lawyers are the worst pleaders, and vice versa. What a barrister has to do is to discover the law in the archives of the law, in the records in existence. He has to search and research, and he has to have the time to do so, which a solicitor never could have if he were to attend to the other branches of his [Captain Redmond.] business. Therefore the experience has been, in these new countries, Canada in particular, and, I believe, also in America, that though they have tried the experiment it has been a colossal failure. In theory it is there, but in practice it is dead. Therefore I would appeal to Deputy Johnson once more, if he is so bent on this amalgamation of two trade unions, let him bring forward his proposal by way of a Bill on some future occasion.

The PRESIDENT: I am afraid I cannot accept the amendment. It is not the intention in the Bill that a person shall qualify by practising as a solicitor only, for appointment to a high judicial position. Two questions are raised. The first is whether there is a strong case on the part of either profession for this particular position of a Circuit Court Judge being left open to the solicitors' profession, or, on the other hand, whether in our judgment it would be in the interests of the administration of justice that a solicitor should be so appointed. Our information is that the solicitors' profession as a whole now accept the view which is in the Bill, and are not making applications for this particular privilege. If you could call it such. It is not a matter upon which I have expert knowledge, and I suppose that persons from either one or the other profession are better able to speak upon it than a layman. It has been put to me that while a solicitor practises—and I suppose the word "pleading" comes in—in a District Justice's Court the same facilities are not provided in the other Courts. That has been the practice up to this, I think. Consequently there was association with the judgments given in the District Justice's Court, but solicitors had not the same opportunity in the other Courts. I presume there are cases in which solicitors might be better judges but I suppose that we cannot at once perfect even our judicial machinery. The main question, as it presents itself to us, is that there is no strong case made by solicitors for this particular amendment, and the case in its favour is one more concerning the amalgamation of the professions. There are, I believe, strong views held on that subject, certainly by one distinguished occupant of the Bench, but I do not think that it has attracted to itself any great support. Consequently it would be an experiment on our part if we were to make that departure, and it does not appear to us to be in the interests of the new system that we should adopt it.

Amendment put and negatived.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move "in line 13, after the word 'but,' to insert the words 'in the case of a Barrister'." That gets rid of the ambiguity Deputy Johnson referred to.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. A. O'SHAUGHNESSY: I move "to add at the end of the Section the words 'provided that in the case of any Recorder or County Court Judge appointed a Judge of the Circuit Court, Section 42 shall not apply'." This is comparatively a small amendment, but it enables the Executive to continue some Recorders in their office. I had great pleasure in listening to the President giving such a glowing testimonial to the Recorder in Dublin. We can say similar things of the Recorder in Cork. What I ask you to do is in the interests of efficiency and economy.

The PRESIDENT: I think the farthest I can go is to have the general question considered if it should not be decided to apply the age-limit to existing Justices.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY: This is not a question of age limits, but if you keep on the existing Recorders it must be at existing salaries. It is a question of enabling the Executive to pay those salaries which will be an economy and thereby you will retain the efficiency of those very able Recorders.

The PRESIDENT: There is nothing in the Act to prevent us keeping on one of those if we so desire.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY: Section 42 reads:—

"Each Circuit Judge shall receive a salary of £1,500 per annum, and on retirement, after 15 years' service or upwards, or owing to age or permanent infirmity, shall be entitled for his life to a pension amounting to two-thirds of his salary."

Surely no one in possession of his senses would expect a man in receipt of £2,500 a year to work for £1,500 when he is entitled to two-thirds of his salary as a pension.

Professor MAGENNIS: Section 42 was not put or carried.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: Section 42 was put, but the amendment was withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT: If it should be decided to appoint any existing Judge, County Court Judge, or Recorder, it does not affect the salary he is in receipt of at the present moment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question: "That Section 44 as amended stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 45.

The office of any Circuit Judge may be vacated by writing under his hand, and shall be vacated on his being appointed a Judge of the High Court or of the Supreme Court, and thereupon, or whenever the office of any Circuit Judge shall become vacant a new Circuit Judge shall be appointed in his place. In case of the illness of any Circuit Judge, a deputy may be appointed to act in his place, on the recommendation of the Attorney-General, on such terms as to payment of the deputy out of the salary of the Circuit Judge or otherwise as may be sanctioned by the Minister for Finance, provided however that no one other than a practising Barrister of ten years' standing at least in his profession shall be qualified for appointment as deputy of a Circuit Judge.

Mr. E. ALTON: I move:

In line 25, to add after the word 'appointed' the words 'by the aforesaid Circuit Judge,' and in the same line to delete the words 'on the recommendation' and to substitute therefor the words 'such appointment to be subject to the approval of the Attorney-General'."

This Section deals with the appointment of deputies in the case of the illness of a Circuit Judge, and it may be possible, but it certainly is not inconceivable, that the Judge might put in a bogus plea of illness and take a holiday, leaving the salary of his deputy to be discharged out of the public purse. They have wisely guarded against that, but I do not think the drafters of the Bill have taken into consideration the temperament of the hard-working conscientious Judge who would be reluctant to declare himself ill, and would carry on possibly to die in harness.

I think we should not take away from such a man the privilege of nominating his deputy. I can conceive such a Judge being reluctant to hand over his work to a stranger. If possible I would like to secure this privilege for the Circuit Judge in case of illness. Abuse of the privilege would be provided against by making it a condition that such nomination should be approved by the Attorney-General. It is the general principle that I am interested in. Some regard should be had for the feelings of a deserving public servant when he is ill.

The PRESIDENT: I take it that the Clause would then read, "the deputy may be appointed by the aforesaid Circuit Judge." I think the Deputy will admit that that would be contrary to the Constitution.

Mr. ALTON: Nominate, I should have said.

The PRESIDENT: Well, even that, I am afraid, would scarcely be acceptable.

Mr. ALTON: Perhaps I would be set aside with the assurance that in practice where it was possible a Judge, in the event of illness, would be consulted as to his deputy.

The PRESIDENT: I would undertake in the meantime to examine what the practice had been, but as far as I know no County Court Judge did ever recommend to us the appointment of his substitute or deputy in the case of illness.

Mr. ALTON: I was informed that frequently a Judge, in the event of illness, did recommend his deputy. I can see that the privilege could be abused, and I want to avoid that, but I would be glad if the President would look into the matter.

The PRESIDENT: I will look into the matter by the next Stage, but it certainly is not my information that that applied up to this.

Professor MAGENNIS: I beg to move—In lines 26 and 27, to delete the words “out of the salary of the Circuit Judge or otherwise.” What lies behind this amendment is, I am sure, fairly obvious. “In case of the illness of any Circuit Judge a deputy may be appointed to act in his place on such terms as to payment of the deputy out of the salary of the Circuit Judge or otherwise.” Let us consider for a moment what the position of the Circuit Judge will be. Deputy Redmond has already enlarged, and I need not follow him, on the very considerable increase, not merely in jurisdiction and consequently in heaviness of work for the Circuit Judge, contrasted with the present County Court Judge, but in regard to the area over which his jurisdiction extends, and consequently the increased number of points at which he shall have to sit. No provision is made in the Bill, though it was suggested in the Judiciary Committee’s recommendation, that provision should be made to allow the Circuit Judge the expenses of circuit as at present allowed in the case of the County Court Judge, so that the miserable salary—for without rhetoric at all, it must be called a miserable salary—of £1,500 a year is to be chargeable with the cost of the circuit, and also to be liable to be drawn upon for the remuneration of a deputy, if unfortunately the Circuit Judge falls ill and is absent from his work for any period. I suggest seriously that the circumstances of his work will almost inevitably produce at least one annual illness. The work will occupy him, it is calculated, some ten months of the year. He will have no home. If he is a married man his wife and children will have a home, but it will not be within the ambit of his circuit, and that will be a further cost, by the way, an additional charge upon his revenue. He will be obliged for ten months of the year to spend his life in hotels, a large part of the day in a stuffy and unwholesome courthouse, a large part of the night in trying to digest both law and a hurried meal, such as an hotel would be able to afford, and in these circumstances he is always confronted with the spectre that he must not be ill. If he is ill his position will gradually become so bad that he shall have to retire altogether. The Chief Justice, no doubt, will be notified that he is rendered incapable of discharging his duties.

That £1,500 a year, remember, is not only subject to these charges I have referred to, but has to bear income tax as well. It would be easy to make a lightning calculation and show what the effective value of the income would be. Suppose, as I venture to hope, the Government will see that it is to the interests of the administration of law that this great measure by which they decentralise and create Circuit Courts, should carry with it a larger salary to make it worth while for men of competence to take the positions. When they are up to £2,000 and over in income they come under super-tax, so that after all, even an increase from £1,500 to £2,000 would not benefit them greatly, and all the time they would be obliged to provide themselves with the latest law books, a very considerable item of expenditure. Law books, in a country where the Legislature is so prolific in new legislation as the Saorstát has been, go out of fashion as rapidly as a lady’s dress or hat. It is said that if a woman of fashion to-day does not get her new dress delivered by express it will be out of fashion before it reaches her. Law books, which are very expensive because of their limited circulation, go out of date very rapidly, and one must buy the last edition. Some astute lawyer pleading before a Circuit Judge will catch him napping if he is quoting from the edition before the last and is misled. It is true that in the Bill as it stands a provision is made for recommending that the State should bear the cost of this, but it is quite possible that the State might harden its heart. Not all Attorney-Generals are like the present Attorney-General, and in future a Circuit Judge may suffer severely from the decision of an Attorney-General who never knew even the pangs of toothache. I suggest, therefore, that this amendment might be accepted. It is conceivable that it would not add a very great burden to the State, and on the other hand it would serve to ameliorate a position that requires all the amelioration that we can provide.

Mr. T. J. O'CONNELL: I wish to support this amendment. It seems to me to be extremely unreasonable to expect that a Judge who becomes ill and has to bear the cost of his illness should, in addition to that expenditure, have to provide for the payment of his substitute. I cannot concede what possible object could be behind this provision unless the idea was, as suggested by Deputy Alton, that the Judge might not be over-conscientious and might wish to take a holiday and have a substitute paid. In that case it would be for the authorities or for the Attorney-General to judge whether the plea were genuine or not. If the illness were not genuine he should get no substitute, but if it is, and if, because of the illness, he has to bear much increased expenditure, I think it is only fair that he should not be called on to pay the salary of a substitute. After all, if the substitute is a good man he will require almost, if not the same, salary as that paid to the Judge himself. If that were done, or even if a considerable proportion of the Judge's salary were taken to pay the substitute, it would be a very great hardship indeed on a man who was absent owing to illness.

Captain REDMOND: In support of this amendment, I do not think that any great business concern of any standing insists upon its servant paying for a substitute during a genuine illness, and I think it would be casting a serious reflection on the character and integrity of our future judges if we were to allow these words to remain in the Section. As far as safeguards are concerned one has always the doctor's certificate to fall back upon, and a doctor's certificate can be produced, and as we know that cannot be produced except in a genuine case. Therefore, I do not think for a moment that it will be suggested that the future judges will misdeemean themselves to such an extent as would seem to be implied by the words in this Section in seeking to safeguard against it, and I would appeal to the Government to allow this amendment to stand.

Mr. JOHNSON: There is a rather more important aspect of this, I think, which would induce me to support the amendment. The clause as it stands reads "on such terms as to payment of the deputy out of the salary of the Circuit Judge, or otherwise, as may be sanctioned by the Minister for Finance." The effect of that is to bring a political Minister into a position of authority over the judge, and possibly to make selections and to give favour to one as compared with another. He may sanction in the case of one sick judge, and he may refuse to sanction in the case of another sick judge, and that places him in the position to patronise one in contrast with another, to give favours which should not be allowed, and I think that fact alone is overwhelming in the case for the deletion of these words.

Major COOPER: When I first read this I was opposed to it, because I thought of the taxpayer's 7 o'clock. interest, and I thought it was going to place an additional burden on his shoulders. I have thought it out since, and I am not at all sure that it is not designed to save the taxpayer. Take the case of a judge who was severely ill, say, for a year. If under the Bill as it stands he had to pay a substitute he would presumably have to pay the whole of his year's salary to him. If, on the other hand, at the beginning of his illness, he sent in a certificate that he was very seriously ill and wished to retire he would only forfeit one-third of his salary, and the taxpayer would have to pay his pension for the rest of his life, so that, on the whole, I think this amendment could be supported even in the interests of the taxpayers.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I am sorry I must disagree with the Deputies on this question. It resolves itself into a question of insurance, whether the taxpayer is to be called on to pay the insurance of the judges against illness, or whether they should be called upon to insure themselves. If you once adopt the principle that the taxpayer is to insure any official against illness you are proceeding on the wrong road. We are here in the interests of the taxpayers and not of the judges.

Mr. HEWAT: I would like to support the amendment. I think it is an improvement on the Section. As the Section stands it seems to me to lower the status of the judge very much. Apart altogether from the question of remuneration, it is an unnatural thing to say that a man in the position of a judge is penalised because he is subject to an illness. I think that the man who is appointed as a Circuit Court Judge should be secured and insured in his position and emoluments.

The PRESIDENT: I am not altogether satisfied with the case made. We must examine it from two angles. First of all, it is put up that because the salary is £1,500 a year he cannot possibly afford to be ill—and when we say ill we must understand that there are various classes of illnesses—and, consequently, if we give way on this, and that we are subsequently asked to reconsider the salaries, those so concerned get two benefits instead of one. I would suggest that if we are going to consider the salaries, or if it will be put up to us to consider them, in respect of Circuit Court Judges, that this matter at any rate should not be decided now, but should wait until then. I think it should be solved very soon.

Professor MAGENNIS: In that case, with permission, I withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Captain REDMOND: When is it likely that the question of salaries will come up for consideration?

The PRESIDENT: I think it is likely to come up on the Report stage. The Minister for Finance, as such, in my experience never considered any question of a political issue. The political side of a question never appeals to the Minister for Finance. As a matter of fact, the ordinary practice in regard to a matter of this sort is that it filters through the Department before it reaches the Minister, and the recommendation is made by persons who never consider the policy of the question at all. It never enters into it. If it were to be coloured by politics at all the man would not be fit to be a Minister. I can assure the Deputy he can disabuse his mind of any bias in that respect.

Mr. JOHNSON: The President is quite astray if he thinks for a moment that I am suggesting that the Minister for Finance is going to be influenced by politics or political questions. I am not thinking of the Minister for Finance, that we know, but this Bill will deal with the future, and politics may not enter into the matter in the slightest degree, but if there is to be discretion in the Ministry of Finance, if there is to be discretion in the political side of the State as to the payment of a judge, that is a very great weakness and places the judge in a position of subordination to the Minister for the time being, whoever that may be.

Now, there should be no discretion; if there is to be payment for a substitute out of the salary, let it be applicable in all cases, but let there be no discretion in the matter because the discretion as to the amount of salary or allowance or bonus or gifts in regard to judges, if it happens to remain with a Ministry, opens the way to a possibility of favour being shown, and that should not be thought of as a possibility. I hope, if this matter is not going to be decided now, that portion of the Section ought certainly to be deleted. My plea is not on the main question, but on the question of discretion, and I think the discretion should not lie with the Minister or Ministry at any time.

The PRESIDENT: The Ministry of Finance in this case is a different institution to any others. The Minister for Finance has got to have a veto on certain outgoings. He should. It is our experience that in this matter of illness it is usually traded on unless there is some corrective. Granted that clause gets in here, there is no reason why it should be inserted elsewhere. I have no objection, nor has anybody I have ever heard of, to paying for bona fide illness, and I am not satisfied where provision is made for the payment of an illness allowance that it has been a bona fide illness at all, from my experience of administration.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Judge is not a servant of the State.

The PRESIDENT: He is a servant of the State.

Mr. JOHNSON: Not in the actual sense, a servant of the State.

The PRESIDENT: Whether he likes it or not any person occupying a public office, or performing public duties, is a servant of the State. He is paid by the State, and the State has a right to see that its money is well spent.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: In view of what the President has stated, would it not be better when considering the matter again upon Report, if the fear that he has expressed, that claims of illness may be taken advantage of, should be definitely and specifically provided against?

Professor MAGENNIS: On a point of order, I beg to say I withdraw the amendment.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I understand the Deputy is speaking on the main motion.

Mr. JOHNSON: It is only by general agreement that an amendment can be withdrawn. It seems to me that it is very desirable that this matter should be thoroughly discussed.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I understood the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON: It could not be without general leave.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Not without agreement. If a Deputy desires to put an amendment and then desires to withdraw it, and some other Deputy desires to pursue that amendment, it is entirely within that Deputy's right to pursue the amendment if he so wishes.

Professor MAGENNIS: At the time

I intimated my intention to withdraw the amendment, no one protested.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: The amendment was not put from the chair.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I am dealing with this matter, not because I desire to pursue this amendment, but because the President has stated he will re-consider the matter. I suggest it could then be re-considered in regard to the question of salaries. He has further stated, what everybody knows to be true, that pleas of illness have been taken advantage of. In that case, would it not be better to make specific provision against such advantage being taken of pleas of illness, rather than put a clause in to this effect which, as it stands now in the Bill, means that a person holding so high a position as that of a Circuit Court Judge will be in a worse position than a clerk in an ordinary mercantile house who, if he is ill and if his employer has ascertained that his illness is genuine, will still receive payment of his salary. That is the case with a clerk in a mercantile house, and it is at least just in the case of a Circuit Court Judge. Let the employer in each case ascertain that the illness is a genuine one, and then continue to bear what it is only equitable that the employer should bear, the salary that has been incurred.

Professor MAGENNIS: Perhaps on the Report Stage Deputy Figgis will propose an amendment to the effect that no Circuit Court Judge shall fall ill unless with the previous permission of the Attorney-General?

Mr. JOHNSON: I would like just to draw attention to Article 68 of the Constitution:—“The age of retirement, the remuneration and pension of such Judges on retirement and the declaration to be taken by them on appointment shall be prescribed by law; such remuneration may not be diminished during their continuance in office.” Now that implies a definite amount of remuneration to be fixed by law. It does not allow, I submit, of chance reductions at the discretion of any political officer. It seems to me

[Mr. Johnson.] that the intention of that clause in the Constitution is, that the remuneration shall be a fixed sum known, and that no authority within the State, without an alteration in the Constitution, shall be allowed to diminish the amount of that remuneration during their continuance in office. I ask the Dáil whether, in view of that clause in the Constitution, this Section should be allowed to pass in its present form?

Professor MAGENNIS: Unfortunately for the argument the article in the Constitution refers to the Judges in the High Court and the Supreme Court.

Mr. JOHNSON: "And to all other Courts established in pursuance of this Constitution."

Professor MAGENNIS: Article 68 says: "The age of retirement, the remuneration and the pension of such Judges on retirement and the declarations to be taken by them on appointment shall be prescribed by law; such remuneration may not be diminished during their continuance in office. The terms of the appointment of the Judges of such other Courts as may be created shall be prescribed by law." This Article refers to the Supreme Court and the High Court. What is applicable here is the terms of appointment of the Judges of such other Courts as may be created, shall be prescribed by law. There is a general provision with regard to Judges of the inferior Courts.

Mr. JOHNSON: I again would submit that the intention regarding the independence of the Judges is to apply to all Judges, and it is just as important, possibly even more important, that in the case of Judges who are dealing with cases which affect the common people more than the propertied minority, the cases, shall I say, of the majority of the people are more likely to be affected by the administration of justice in the lower Courts than in the higher Courts. If a clause relating to the independence of Judges in the Constitution is necessary for Judges of the High Courts to preserve their independence of the Executive, then even more necessary is it a clause for Judges in those Courts to which a larger number of people are brought into contact, so that they should be equally independent of the Executive. The Section of the Constitutional provision which makes the remuneration a fixed sum ought to have equal weight in respect to the lower Courts.

Mr. HEWAT: Would the Government take time to consider that amendment?

Professor MAGENNIS: They have promised to do so.

The PRESIDENT: I must say that I have never heard of this particular clause interfering with the independence of the County Court Judges.

Mr. JOHNSON: There has not been the confidence in the County Court Judges hitherto that we desire there should be. That has been argued here several times. It certainly has been the belief that the Judges were influenced by the Executive in the past. Now, this is one way whereby they may be influenced by the Executive, and it is an extra safeguard, and it seems to me a very important safeguard to achieve the end for which the Bill itself was put before us, to remove the possibility of doubt in the matter that the administration of the law in the future should not be suspect.

Professor MAGENNIS: On a point of order, I would like to have your ruling. Deputy Captain Redmond and I, who tabled this amendment, are quite satisfied with the statement made by the President, and desire to withdraw the amendment. If the Deputies seek to press the amendment, can they do so without moving the amendment, and can they move the amendment without giving notice?

Mr. JOHNSON: On a point of order, may I submit that once an amendment is moved it is the property of the Dáil, and only by general leave can it be withdrawn. Now, the only question that has arisen which has urged me to keep this matter open was the promise of the Minister, who said he was only going to deal with the question of whether, in fixing the salaries at a later stage, he would deal with the possibilities of this being deducted. I am dealing with the discretion of the Ministry, and if the Minister will promise that that also will be reconsidered, I am prepared to agree to the withdrawal of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT: I am afraid I can give no undertaking.

Amendment declared lost.

Question "That Section 45 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Professor MAGENNIS: I move that you report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mrs. COLLINS-O'DRISCOLL: I beg to second.

Motion put and agreed to.

DAIL RESUMES.

Progress reported. Committee to sit again on Friday, October 12th.

Mr. JOHNSON: Can the President tell us what will be the effect of losing this hour on the Committee Stage of this Bill? Will it mean that at the sitting to-morrow we will have to take up this Bill and is it going to have an effect on next week's business?

The PRESIDENT: We will have no business next week. The question is whether we could get through this stage of the Bill to-night and to-morrow. It was represented to me by a number of Deputies that they had engagements at 8 o'clock this evening, and some others that they had engagements at 8.30. I do not think it would be possible for us to finish the Committee Stage of this Bill to-day and to-morrow, so we will have to leave some of it over until we meet again. At any rate it is not intended to sit next week.

Mr. JOHNSON: Does that mean that the Bill will be held over for a week or a fortnight?

The PRESIDENT: The Committee Stage will not be resumed for a week or a fortnight after we adjourn this week. The Committee Stage might be resumed to-morrow when we have cleared off the two other Bills we have down. I am not sure whether Deputy Major Cooper asked me to take up the Governor-General's speech to-morrow.

Major COOPER: I would as soon leave it over. There might be some difficulty in keeping a House if we had only the Governor-General's speech to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT: I propose to resume the Committee Stage of this Bill to-morrow as soon as we have finished the other two Bills. I move that the Dáil do now adjourn until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Question put and agreed to.

Dáil adjourned accordingly at 7.35 p.m.

CEISTEANNA.—QUESTIONS. ORAL ANSWERS.

CITY LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD. (IN LIQUIDATION).

IRISH POLICY HOLDERS' INTERESTS.

TOMAS MAC EOIN asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce if he has found it possible to take any action to safeguard the interests of Irish Policyholders of the City Life Assurance Company, Ltd. (in liquidation), and whether he is satisfied that reasonable control over Industrial Assurance Companies now operating in Ireland, with a view to ensuring their solvency, is possible under existing legislation; or whether any legislation on the lines of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, passed by the British Parliament, is contemplated.

MINISTER for INDUSTRY and COMMERCE (Mr. J. McGrath): The Ministry has taken steps to keep in touch with the proceedings for the winding up of this Company, and have no reason to believe that Irish policy holders will be at any disadvantage as compared with other creditors in such proceedings. The necessity for promoting legislation on the lines of the British Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, is under consideration.

UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFIT.—A KILDARE CLAIM.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce what is the reason for withholding payment of unemployment benefit, due to Patrick Flanagan, of Waterstown, Kildare, Co. Kildare, Card No. 2945, who has been signing up in the Labour Exchange, Droichead Nua, since the middle of February last; further, in view of the fact that this man is destitute, whether enquiries will be made with a view to expediting payment.

Mr. J. McGrath: Patrick Flanagan claimed benefit at Droichead Nua Branch Employment Office on the 14th February, 1923. In consequence of the distance he resided from the local office he was not required to attend daily to prove unemployment. He was, however, required to give proof of unemployment in the other form prescribed for applicants who live at a distance—i.e., he was asked to produce each week a certificate signed by himself and two householders to the effect that he was unemployed and unable to obtain suitable employment. He failed, however, to produce satisfactory proof of unemployment and consequently payment could not be made on his claim. I should add that he had received a considerable amount of benefit on a previous claim on certificates which, on investigation, it was found had not been signed by the persons whose signatures they purported to bear. He made a further claim in July last, which he also failed to substantiate.

TRADE UNION ORGANISER'S IMPRISONMENT.

SEAN BUTTLEIR asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether he is aware that Mr. J. Baird, Organiser, Irish Transport and General Workers' Union, who is held in custody in Kilkenny Jail under the Public Safety (Emergency Powers) Act, 1923, has been on hunger strike since October 4th, as a protest against his being placed in close confinement, being deprived of his bed, and being debarred from receiving letters and parcels, as a result of his refusal to do whitewashing work; whether there is any authority for requiring untried prisoners to do work of this kind; and whether he will ensure that Mr. Baird, who has been visited only once by a doctor, shall receive adequate medical attention.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. K. O'Higgins): The Minister for Defence will answer this question.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is that a matter for the Minister for Defence?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Minister for Home Affairs has stated the Minister for Defence proposes to answer it.

MINISTER FOR DEFENCE (Genl. Mulcahy): In accordance with the usual practice, Mr. Baird was expected to take his share of the cooking, cleaning and light maintenance work, such as whitewashing, required to be done in the jail. He refused to do anything, and as a disciplinary measure was awarded close confinement and debarred from receiving letters and parcels for seven days, but was not deprived of bedding. Mainly, it appears, as a protest against his internment, he commenced a partial hunger strike on the 5th instant. He takes a little food and some tea. Until the 8th instant Mr. Baird received due attention from a medical orderly, and since that date from a medical officer.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Would the Minister say whether Mr. Baird is in military or civil custody?

General MULCAHY: Mr. Baird is in military custody.

GLASGOW MAN'S ARREST.

TOMAS MAC EOIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is prepared to order the release of Charles Fricze, a native and resident of Glasgow, who was arrested while on holiday in Dublin in July, 1922, and who is now detained in custody in No. 857, Hut 17, No. 3 Camp, Tintown, Curragh.

General MULCAHY: The release of Mr. Fricze has been recommended and is being arranged for forthwith.

CASTLEREA CANTEEN SUPPLIES.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence if he can say when the account for canteen supplies furnished by Messrs. Glavey Brothers, Market Square, Castlereah, and which account is now some ten or twelve months overdue, will be paid; whether he is aware that Messrs. Glavey have made repeated applications for payment of this account without effect.

General MULCAHY: Enquiries are being made locally, but they have not yet been completed.

WRIT FOR NATIONAL UNIVERSITY.

In compliance with Standing Order No. 120 of the Standing Orders of Dáil Eireann, I have to report that on the 11th October, on the direction of the Ceann Comhairle and pursuant to the relative provisions of the Electoral Act, 1923, I issued to Mr. Patrick J. Merriam, Returning Officer, my writ for the election of a member to fill the existing vacancy in the representation in the Dáil of the Constituency of National University of Ireland.

REPORT OF SESSIONAL COMMITTEE.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Before we enter upon the business of the day, I would like to mention that I have received a report of the Sessional Committee of Selection. I do not know whether Deputies would like to take that report as the first business of the day?

The Dáil agreed.

The following is the report of the Committee:—

Pursuant to Resolutions passed by the Dáil setting up this Committee, defining its powers, and authorising it to make nominations to the Committees hereinafter mentioned, a meeting was held on 11th October, 1923, at 11.30 a.m.

The Committees dealt with in the Resolutions were three, viz.:—

- (1) The Committee on Procedure and Privileges;
- (2) The Committee to prepare and submit Draft Standing Orders for the regulation of Private Bill Business, and
- (3) The Committee to supervise the internal accommodation arrangements for members of the Oireachtas and to control the Restaurant.

The Committee decided to make the following nominations to the said Committees:—

- (1) THE COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE AND PRIVILEGES: Deputies MacCarthy, Hughes, C. O Broin, Nicholls, P. O'Máille, Sears, Cooper, Figgis, Johnson, Wilson and Conlon—(11).

In this case the Committee recommend that the Ceann Comhairle be also a member of the Committee and its Chairman, and to permit this being done request the Dáil to make the necessary changes in the Resolution of Reference, viz., fixing the membership of the Committee at twelve, and appointing the Ceann Comhairle a member of the Committee and its Chairman.

- (2) THE COMMITTEE ON PRIVATE BILL STANDING ORDERS: Deputies C. Hogan, Nagle, Cooper, P. O'Máille and MacCarthy—(5).
- (3) THE COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL ACCOMMODATION: Deputies White, Morrissey, A. Byrne, Hughes and C. O Broin.

11adh Deire Foghmhair, 1923.

PEADAR O hAODHA,

Cathaoirleach an Choiste.

Vol. 5.

Mr. P. HUGHES: I move formally the adoption of the report. It has been circulated. I may add that it would be well if the Ceann Comhairle would give a direction for the calling of the first meetings of those Committees.

Mr. C. BYRNE: I beg to second the motion.

Report adopted.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That means the adoption of the names of the persons on the Committee. There is a point with regard to the Committee of Procedure and Privileges. The terms of the motion passed by the Dáil authorised the Committee of Selection to nominate eleven Deputies. The Committee have nominated eleven Deputies and have added: "In this case the Committee recommend that the Ceann Comhairle be also a member of the Committee and its Chairman, and to permit this being done they request the Dáil to make the necessary changes in the resolution of reference, namely, fixing the membership of the Committee at twelve and appointing the Ceann Comhairle a member of the Committee and its Chairman."

Agreed.

COMMUNICATION FROM SEANAD.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Clerk has received the following from the Seanad:—

"I am directed to inform Dáil Éireann that Seanad Éireann have appointed the following five Senators to join with the Committee of Dáil Éireann to prepare and submit draft Standing Orders for the regulation of Private Bill business:—Senators the Right Hon. Lord Glenavy, James G. Douglas, the Right Hon. Andrew Jameson, J. T. O'Farrell, and Patrick Williams Kenny.

"Sgd. EMMET DALTON."

DAIL IN COMMITTEE. COUNTY COURTS (AMENDMENT) BILL, 1923.—THIRD STAGE.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This appears on the Order Paper in accordance with the agreement made yesterday.

M

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. K. O'Higgins): I move Section 1 of this Bill, which provides that the Courts may be held otherwise than in the places defined by Statute. Sub-section 1 provides a kind of indemnity for any cases in which the Courts have already been held otherwise than in the statutory place. I think the Section needs very little exposition to the Dáil. In some places courthouses have been burned down or damaged, and it has not been possible for the County Court Judge to hold a court in that place. It is necessary to allow a change of place for the Courts, and this Bill is brought in to deal with that situation.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I move Section 2 of the Bill, which deals with the service of documents and provides that documents may be deemed to have been validly served if the judge is satisfied

(a) that it was not reasonably possible to effect service of such document in the manner required by the law, and (b) that such document, or a copy thereof, or reasonable notice of such document and of the contents thereof did in fact reach the person required to be served therewith.

Motion agreed to.

SECTION

In this Act the expression "County Court Judge" includes a Recorder and a Judge of a Borough, and the word "Minister" means the Minister for Home Affairs.

Mr. E. DUGGAN: I move the following as an amendment: To insert before Section 3 a new Section as follows:—

"(1) If and whenever there shall not be in existence for either the current year or the next preceding year, such general juror's book or special juror's book respectively, as is mentioned in Section 17 of the Juries (Ireland) Act, 1871, it shall be lawful to return jurors from the general juror's book or the special juror's book (as the case may be) for the latest year for which such book is in existence, and also, if it shall appear to the Under Sheriff or other official liable to make the return of jurors that owing to deaths, removals or otherwise, it is not possible to form a sufficient panel from such book, it shall be lawful to return as jurors the names of such, and so many other persons who appear to the Under Sheriff or other officer aforesaid to be liable to serve as jurors as shall be necessary to form a sufficient panel.

"(2) Every person who shall be returned as a juror under the foregoing Sub-section shall be under the same liability to serve as a juror as if a general juror's book or a special juror's book (as the case may be) for the current year had been in existence, and the name of such person had appeared therein, unless such person shall satisfy the judge of the Court to which he is summoned as a juror that, if such book had been in existence, his name could not lawfully have been inserted therein.

(3) If any person whose name is not contained in such general juror's book or special juror's book (as the case may be) for the latest year for which such book is in existence, and whose name could not be lawfully inserted in the general juror's book (as the case may be) for the current year, shall be returned and sworn as a juror upon any trial without objection, such trial shall not be interrupted or deemed a mis trial, nor shall the verdict thereon be impeached or questioned on account of the return of such person as a juror."

This rather lengthy amendment is capable of a very simple explanation. Under the existing law the Sheriff has power to empanel a jury from the jurors' book of the previous year. In possibly two or three counties there has been no jurors' book compiled for possibly two or three years, and the object of the amendment is to enable the Sheriff to empanel a jury from the last jurors' book compiled.

Paragraph 3 also requires a little explanation. It follows that if the Sheriff is operating on a Jurors' Book three or four years old that it might possibly happen, owing to deaths and removals, that he would not have a sufficient number of names to operate upon. It is, therefore, provided that a man who would be eligible to act as a juror if empanelled without objection may so act.

New Section agreed to.

Sections 4 and 5 (Sections 3 and 4 in draft) put and agreed to.

THE TITLE.

An Act to remove certain difficulties in relation to the holding of Quarter Sessions and Civil Bill Courts and the service of certain documents relating thereto.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The new Section involves an amendment of the Title.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move as an amendment:—

To delete the words "service of certain documents relating thereto," lines 11 and 12, and insert in lieu thereof the words:—

"return of jurors and the service of documents in relation to such Courts."

It is consequential on the amendment already passed.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Motion made and question put: "That the title, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

DAIL RESUMES.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Bill is now reported to the Dáil, with the addition of a new Section and an amendment of the Title. If the Bill is to be taken through all its stages now it will be necessary to ask for leave.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I beg to ask for leave to take the remaining stages immediately.

Agreed.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I move that the Bill be received for final consideration.

Agreed.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I move that the Bill do now pass.

Agreed.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Bill will be accordingly sent to the Seanad.

DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

LICENSING (RENEWAL OF LICENCES) BILL, 1923.

THIRD STAGE.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Section 1 provides that licences which were not renewed owing to the conditions in the country may be deemed to have been validly renewed. The object of the Bill is to meet that situation in the country.

Sections 1 to 5 put and agreed to.

THE DAIL RESUMES.

Bill reported without amendment and passed (by leave of the Dáil) through all remaining stages.

THE DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

THE COURTS OF JUSTICE BILL, 1923.—THIRD STAGE RESUMED.

Section 46 put and agreed to.

SECTION 47.

The Circuit Court shall be a Court of Record.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I amendment No. 11:—

"To delete the Section."

I put down this amendment, not because I want to destroy the Bill, but because I should like a little information on this point. I have been discussing the Bill with several solicitors and I find that in almost every case they give a different interpretation to this Section, that is, a different interpretation of how it would be and how it would work. I gathered that the intention is that the Circuit Court should be a Court in which when no defence is entered, judgment is given without the case being pleaded in Court at all. In the present case in the County Court it is necessary for you to have your Counsel to put your case and plead your case, even if the defendant does not appear. If the Court is a Court of Record these things will be done simply in the office. If no evidence is tendered it will be done in the office, and the decree will be issued. I think that is an admirable provision. I should like a little information about the machinery, how this is to be done. Is our Circuit Court to have a Central Registry, where this work will be done, or is it to be done by Clerks of the Peace in each separate county, as it was more or less done in the past?

I think the Central Registry, if that is contemplated, will not work very well. Take the North-East Circuit, to which Deputy Redmond referred. Presumably it will be fixed at some central point, say, Navan or Naas. In that event a solicitor in Dundalk, who does not want to come to Navan or Naas to get things registered, would sooner come to Dublin, and if it is the intention of the Government to have a Registry of this kind in each Circuit I think it would be advantageous to have also an alternative Registry in Dublin, with the right to register, because every solicitor in the country has an agent in Dublin to act for him.

The PRESIDENT: This Section is deemed to be of very great importance, in every respect, and the suggestion to delete it cannot, of course, be accepted. It makes the Court a Court of Record with power to punish for contempt, and it is deemed necessary that the Circuit Courts should have this power which the County Courts had. Moreover, the question of a Court being a Court of Record is of very great importance, having regard to the law of estoppel, and I understand there may be a General Registry.

Major COOPER: In these circumstances I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.
Section put and agreed to.

SECTION 48.

The Circuit Court shall have and exercise the following jurisdiction in civil cases:—

- (i) On consent—Jurisdiction without any limit as to amount of claim or value of property involved in the proceedings of the Court where all necessary parties sign, before the hearing, the form of consent prescribed by the rules to be made under this Part of this Act; such consent may provide that the decision of the Circuit Court shall be final and conclusive, in which case the decision shall not be appealable.

- (ii) In Contract and Tort (save matrimonial and criminal conversations actions)—Jurisdiction when the claim does not exceed £300.
- (iii) In Title to Land and Rectification of the Register—Jurisdiction when the Poor Law Valuation of the property in question does not exceed £60.
- (iv) In Probate matters and actions, and Actions for Administration of Estates—Jurisdiction when the value of the personality does not exceed £1,000 and the Poor Law Valuation of the realty does not exceed £60.
- (v) In Equity (including winding-up of companies)—Jurisdiction within the same limits as in the preceding Sub-section (iv) and in winding-up cases where the issued capital of the company does not exceed £10,000.

Provided that nothing herein shall take away or prejudice the right of any party to any action to have questions of fact tried by a jury of twelve members, in such cases as he might heretofore of right have so required, and with like directions as to law and evidence, but the provisions of Section 24 hereof shall apply to any such trial before a Circuit Judge and jury.

Captain REDMOND: I beg to move an amendment in Sub-section (ii) to delete “£300” and to substitute therefor “£100.”

I notice that there are several other amendments put forward by other Deputies on this very point, but the figures are not actually the same. I hope to be able to give the Committee my reasons, both for moving the amendment and also for the figures that I have chosen. My main object in moving this amendment is to render this Section more in conformity with the rest of the general scheme of the Bill. As will be noted, the rest of the Bill provides that, in all other forms of jurisdiction which shall be exercised by these Circuit Courts, the jurisdiction shall be doubled. The whole general scheme of the Bill seems to me to be a process of duplication in the matter of title to land and the rectification of the register. Where the poor law valuation of the property in question did not originally exceed £30 it was possible to have the matter dealt with in the County Court. That sum of £30 has now been raised to £60 in probate matters and actions for the administration of estates, and also in what are known as equity suits a similar course has been adopted. In equity suits and probate matters, the personality did not exceed £500, and the realty £30 under the old system. It is now proposed to increase the jurisdiction to £1,000 and £60 respectively, and furthermore the number of Judges has been reduced from 16 to 8, thereby doubling the area over which they are to have jurisdiction. It, therefore, seems plain that the whole object of the Bill is a method of duplication, and I cannot understand why, in matters of contract and tort, the proposal is not to duplicate but to multiply actually six times the present jurisdiction.

My further object in moving this amendment is, in my opinion, at any rate, to render the Act more workable. It may be said that £100 to-day is not what £100 stood for at the time of the framing of this old County Courts (Ireland) Act. That is perfectly true, but if it applies to the case of jurisdiction in tort and contract, I ask why it is not also applied in the other cases that I have referred to. It is true that the jurisdiction has been six times multiplied. That is a great departure from the previous judicial system, and here perhaps I may be allowed to say that though I and those associated with me may be taunted with a certain tinge of conservatism in this regard, I claim at any rate to be conservative of what I consider to be worth conserving, and I fear that throughout the whole of this Bill a spirit is manifesting itself of a desire for change merely for the sake of change. Now there are Conservatives and there are Radicals, but there are Conservatives who always want to preserve the existing state of affairs, and there are, equally, Radicals who always desire a change. I take my stand between the two, and I say that I desire, not so much to see the new system introduced, as to see the old system improved and brought into line with modern conditions and requirements. After all we have adopted, and I think very rightly, the British Common Law system and the Statutes which have been passed at various times, to have that system properly put into operation, subject to any repeal that we may so desire, as the bed-rock of our judicial system here in this country. We have not gone back to the Brehon Laws; neither have we adopted the Napoleonic Code, and I, therefore, maintain that the system which has proved effective in England through proper administration there, would, properly administered here with the necessary alterations which I have already alluded to, be the best system for the future judicial control of our country. That being so I desire to move this amendment which, to my mind, will improve that system, but which will not make such a difference between the new and the old as to render the new a mere creature of experiment instead of being an improvement and an adaptation of a tried method.

It has been said that by the increase of this jurisdiction in tort and contract in the Circuit Courts that we will have cheap law. Cheap is a small word very largely used and very largely misused also. Cheap is an entirely relative term. One article may be cheap at a certain price, another article of a similar kind may be very dear at the same price, but what I want to impress, if possible, upon the Committee is this: that because the initial stages of the legal procedure outlined by this Bill in the future Circuit Courts may be less costly at the moment, that in the end they may be far more expensive both to the litigant and to the members of the legal profession. We hear a great deal about the establishment of local Bars throughout the country. Well, I do not think that the comparison between Manchester, Liverpool and some of our local country districts in Ireland is quite on a parallel. After all, within a few miles of Manchester, say a radius of 20 miles of that city, you have a population as large, if not larger, than unfortunately we happen to possess in the whole of the Free State, and to suggest that local Bars are going to spring up in remote country districts in Ireland where litigants and solicitors will obtain the best legal experience and legal knowledge is a suggestion that I contend does not hold water.

Perhaps it might be no harm for me to say here that many people do not realise the exact nature of a barrister's work. The law is there, it is true, but the law is not a fixed quantity or a fixed entity by any means. It is always changing. Judges are placed on the Bench to interpret the law, and from day to day and hour to hour different interpretations are made and new decisions are come to. As long, therefore, as what is known technically as case law exists and shall be the guiding spirit and actual method used by our Judges and our Bench, I say that it will be impossible for members of local Bars in Ireland to be sufficiently equipped in legal knowledge and to be up in all the requirements to bring about not bad but good law. That being so, I feel that to propose that all matters of contract and tort should be dealt with to the extent of £300 by these Circuit Judges makes for bad law and renders very serious the danger of not securing good law in the country.

Then take the position of solicitors. Previous to the passage of this Bill solicitors had prepared their cases, naturally small ones, under the past jurisdiction in rather a hurried fashion. They have not either had the time nor have they had the interest for using every endeavour to secure what would really amount to a first class High Court trial of every action that is brought into the County Court. But what will be the case under this Bill? Every solicitor in every little bog case in Ireland will have to make sure that he leaves no stone unturned, that he calls up every possible witness and goes to every possible expense, that he has maps and drawings and expert evidence on questions of right-of-way or trespass in every little twopenny-halfpenny case that arises; and I say that will not make for cheapening the law, but will, in effect, convert every small case in which but very few pounds are involved, into a High Court action.

Then we have the question of the official stenographers. They are to take down reports of all these cases under £300, and I say, we do not know, so far, what the cost of these stenographers is going to be.

There is also the question of where the records are to be kept, and the cost of keeping these records. Therefore, I would impress upon the Dáil that in this, as in many other institutions, the devil you know is better than the devil you don't know, and it is far better to keep as close as we can to the existing system, with all necessary changes, than to make such an extraordinary, sweeping departure as is proposed by this Section.

I notice—and this I think has a direct bearing upon this amendment—that it is proposed in Section 3 that “Commissioners of the High Court Circuit shall mean such Judges or other persons,” and a definition is given therein. Then later on the same Commissioners are referred to in Section 36, where the rule-making power has already been given to certain people. I do not notice in any portion of the Bill any power to set up these Commissioners. What I would like to know is this: Is it the intention of the Government to set up these Commissioners? If it is their intention to set them up they will have to go down to the country as did the old Judges of Assize. They will have to hear the criminal cases which are excluded by this Bill from the Circuit Courts. If that is so I would seriously suggest to the Government, that having these learned judges going down the country engaged upon what I hope will be very few serious criminal cases, it would be wise also to allow them to hear appeals from the Circuit Courts in matters at any rate under £100. I would like if the Government could possibly consider that suggestion. If these Commissioners in substitution for the old Judges of Assize are never to be brought into being, then what will occur will be that all serious criminal matters, such as murder and the more serious forms of felony, will have to go before the High Court, necessitating the bringing up from the country of witnesses and of all the various accessories to such proceedings. Therefore, it will be thrown upon Dublin courts and Dublin juries to try all serious criminal cases throughout the country. I do not think really that that would be fair to Dublin juries, and I do not think they would regard it as such. But if that is the intention of the Government I would certainly like to know it.

I think that in regard to this multiplication of contract and tort a great deal too much is expected of it. It is true that we have now provided that applications may be made to have cases taken in the High Court, but after all the question of costs must be taken into consideration, and no solicitor will lightly, at any rate, take proceedings in the High Court when he runs the risk, if he loses his case, of being mulcted for costs. I do not intend to detain the Dáil much longer though this, I think, is probably the most important Section of this Bill. I do appeal to the Government not to be too adamant in regard to it, but to have some regard to the representations that have been made to them, and that are now being made to them; representations that have, it is true, appeared in the Press, representations that must have been also personally brought forward. I am confident that neither from the point of view of the country at large, nor from the point of view of the litigants themselves, and certainly not from the point of view either of the solicitors or barristers profession, is it desirable that this amount of £300 should be fixed as the sum within which an action can be taken in the Circuit Courts, and which will be within their jurisdiction.

Prof. MAGENNIS: In the interests of the amendment that follows this one, I feel constrained to oppose the amendment which you have just heard advocated by Deputy Redmond. Much of the speech might be summed up as an attack upon the extended jurisdiction. It was that rather than a defence of the case for reducing the figure to the amount specified in the amendment. Consequently in so far as it sought to reduce the absolute limit of £300 it is in line with the amendment which I shall have the honour of proposing immediately after this is disposed of. This is unquestionably, as Deputy Redmond says, the most important Section in the whole Bill, if there is any Section in the Bill more important than another. The amendment to reduce the jurisdiction of the new Circuit Courts in these types of cases to £100 strikes at the whole central principle of the measure. It is no exaggeration to say that to pass such an amendment in this precise form is practically to undo what we did on the occasion of the Second Reading, and to repudiate the principle of the Bill. Deputy Redmond disclaimed being a reactionary conservative. He was a moderate conservative.

Captain REDMOND: A moderate radical, too.

Prof. MAGENNIS: There was precious little, if he will allow me to say with all deference, of radicalism, particularly in the concluding portion of his speech. He thinks that British law and British institutions are on the whole so admirable that it merely requires a little adjustment of them to suit the genius of the Irish people, and that all the contest of centuries between the two races was not with regard to the creation and the working of national institutions in this country so much as a dispute as to which precise body of men should have control over the institutions, and the jobs arising therefrom. If there be any Deputies who share this view I would suggest to them a careful re-reading of the terms of reference to the Judiciary Committee. I have already had occasion to quote from it. It has become a species of Bible in my hands from which I draw inspiration and doctrine. With your permission, I will read the paragraph that follows a paragraph I have already read in another connection:—

“ Thus it comes that there is nothing more prized among our newly-won liberties than the liberty to construct a system of judiciary and an administration of law and justice according to the dictates of our own needs, and after a pattern of our own designing.”

Later on it says: "The first Government entrusted by the people with a mandate to give effect to the Treaty from which the Constitution has sprung, finds amongst its earliest tasks that of presenting to the Oireachtas a measure which will establish courts in fulfilment of the Constitution, and will fashion an administration of justice upon which the people will lean with confidence and affection." Have they leant with confidence and affection upon alien institutions, of an alien creation imposed upon the people contrary to the people's will?

Again, in this letter of reference the Committee is requested to approach the matters referred to them "untrammelled by any regard to any of the existing systems," and this is what I wish to emphasise. They are to consider the requirements of litigants, not the requirements of the profession of the law—those no doubt incidentally, because it is part of natural equity and of ordinary justice—but "to consider and report upon the requirements of the litigants and other persons interested, and especially as to accessibility, efficiency, expedition and cost."

Now, the law in Great Britain, as administered, is a magnificent institution. I yield to no one in my admiration of it; I will go further and say, my reverence for it. But we are not engaged here in discussing all the great points of Teutonic and Anglo-Saxon institutions, but how to meet the requirements of our own people in view of what these people are and how they are situated—their especial needs. I do not know if it is in order, and if you will permit me to quote from a newspaper. A few days ago the Attorney-General gave an interview to leading Dublin papers, in practically the same terms to all of them, in which he stated the purpose of this measure. The great controlling idea of it was so clearly and so well stated that instead of paraphrasing, or repeating it in some other form of words, if you will permit I will read a few extracts.

"The Constitution of the Free State required a new judiciary to be created and the Government's method of approaching the question was to have the ground cleared of existing institutions.

so that they could arrive at what would be most in the interest of the people for whose services courts were supplied at the public expense. The first great point in the working out of the new scheme of courts was the fact that Ireland is an agricultural country."

I need hardly stop to point out that Great Britain is not an agricultural country, a country made up

"1 o'clock. of large cities, and great urban centres of population, the direct antithesis of the situation here. "Under the system that is now to be superseded the people, litigants and witnesses, used to be brought from remote parts of the country and kept in Dublin for the hearing of comparatively small cases. One need not dilate upon the hardship involved in that, upon small farmers for example, very often at the period of most activity in agriculture taken away from their farms and kept here at great expense and inconvenience while they were waiting for overgorged courts to reach their cases, meanwhile expenses piling up, great counsel had to be retained at huge expense, and fees paid and repaid. There had been cases of rights of way."

Here the Attorney-General enumerates the species of case that usually occupies the Courts from agricultural populations. "There have been cases of rights of way, water courses, boundaries of holdings in connection with which a number of people were taken up. Therefore, the central feature of the new scheme is the provision of courts for trying locally the average type of case, in which the people in the country are involved. In providing for this method we had the advantage of the experiment made in the Courts that were known as Dáil Courts, which in their hey-day were a great success." What we are doing is we are legislating for an agricultural country, and trying to meet the law needs of a farming population mainly.

Deputy Redmond is preoccupied, rather unduly I would suggest, with this question of local Bars—of course, I speak technically. It is alleged by critics who are no doubt competent critics that this makes for the destruction of the noble profession of the Bar. I am, unfortunately for myself, in a position to take a more dispassionate view of the matter than Deputy Redmond.

I quite agree with him that the parallel sought to be drawn between the advantage in England derived from the local Bars, such as those of Liverpool and Manchester, could hardly be obtained here, because with the exception, perhaps, of Cork, we have not the parallel. There is one man there who is in Queenstown, I think; so to make a deliberate bull the man in Cork is in Queenstown. But it is possible, and I think highly probable, that the effect of this will be to create Circuit Bars. They need not be of the type or character altogether of, say, the Liverpool Bar, but they will belong to the sphere or area of jurisdiction.

I do not want to reveal too many of the secrets, but anyone who was ever at the Bar is aware that with the centralisation of it the tendency is for half a dozen of the big wigs to monopolise the greater part of the business and leave the rest of the profession briefless. That is not a good thing for the briefless barristers, and it is still worse for the public. The result is delay. The law's delay has been the cause of lamentation for centuries. If it were a case, for instance, in which a will was being impeached, in my time everyone had to hurry to get Mr. O'Shaughnessy, the present Recorder of Dublin. More particularly if the principal agent in the preparation of the will were a parish priest, then the plaintiff must have the services of Mr. O'Shaughnessy. If he had he was bound to get value for his money. Here is an opening provided for developing ability in the Circuit Courts. Men, having made their mark there, would be selected by local solicitors to take conduct of cases in Dublin on appeal, and gradually the central Bar of the High Court and of the Supreme Court would be fed from this source, so that it comes to a question of prophecy, as between prophecy pessimistic and prophecy optimistic, and I would ask you to accept the more hopeful view, which is more in line with experience. The efficiency of the local Bar apparently would be diminished. So suggests Deputy Redmond, through subterranean channels.

Captain REDMOND: I now suggest it above ground.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I want to make a suggestion myself. I want to refer Deputies to Standing Order No. 58, which specifies that in Committee a Deputy may make three speeches, but no Deputy shall speak for longer than ten minutes, unless he is the proposer of an amendment. As the proposer of the amendment, Deputy Redmond spoke for a good deal longer than ten minutes, but that privilege does not extend to other Deputies who are not proposers of amendments. And Deputy Magennis is, I think, the proposer of the next amendment, so that his opportunities are all in front of him.

Professor MAGENNIS: I thank you for your indulgence.

Captain REDMOND: Perhaps within that Standing Order, I am in order when I speak twice, and I do not desire to detain the Committee as long as ten minutes on this occasion. I would like to point out to Deputy Magennis that in regard to local Bars my particular objection is that, in my opinion, they will not be efficient Bars, because, after all, when Case law is still the system of coming to decisions on the law which is used, how can a barrister in the country have at his immediate disposal, or at his disposal at all, the latest law reports which he would have if that case came up in Dublin?

All law at present administered in this country, as well as in England, is decided upon the latest case on that subject, and how can a barrister at the local Bar have at his side the necessary reports, or how will he have time to send to Dublin for them if this is going to be the method of expedition? His holding up the case and sending to Dublin for the latest report will not expedite the case, and, therefore, I say that you may have law in the country before these Circuit Courts, but it will not be good law; it will not be law according to the latest interpretation of the law, and that being so, in the long run the law you will get there will not be cheap law, and it may result in appeals to the Supreme Court. That point is in the interests, not of the Bar or of the solicitors' profession, but of the community at large.

Mr. HEWAT: I cannot expect, in following the two previous Deputies who have spoken on this subject, to emulate their eloquence, but I rise to oppose the amendment, and I do so with a firm conviction that the Clause as it stands is an excellent one. This Bill is based on a very genuine knowledge that the old County Court system was a failure. The County Courts had insufficient work and were not looked upon in the country with that respect that a court of justice should be looked upon, and in considering the matter I thought that it was very necessary, in the changed circumstances of the country, to make a radical alteration in these Courts. Under this Bill the Circuit Court takes the place of the County Court. It is laid down that the Circuit Court would be fully occupied, and I think it must be hoped that the Circuit Court, when it exercises its functions, will be a national asset in the administration of justice that the County Court has not been. If that is to take place, surely it is not wise that the administration of that Court should be cramped within narrow limits, reducing its efficiency and its standing throughout the country. I say that the increased jurisdiction given to this Court will be of great importance to the litigants. I think it will be of great importance to the Court itself, and while undoubtedly at present you meet a good deal of criticism about it, I think that criticism is narrow, and that the Court will, in the future, justify the proposed change.

As regards the Bar, I think Deputy Redmond is looking too much into the past and too little into the future. If you assume that the Circuit Court will take the place that it should in the life of the country, I think also that you must recognise that the Bar will adapt itself to the changed order of things, and that a local Bar will grow up in the country which will not disgrace the traditions of that noble profession.

I think that it would be worth the while of junior members of the Bar to make a reputation at the Circuit Court, and that the growing importance of the cases that will be tried in these Courts will form a training ground which will supply in the ordinary natural course of events as eminent lawyers as we have experienced in the past in the High Court and Supreme Courts in Dublin. If it did nothing else but scatter through a larger number the work of the Bar I think that would be in itself a benefit. I think the real difficulty about the profession in the past has been the difficulty of the younger men to get an opening, not through their incapacity, but through want of training and want of practice, and if more use is made of the junior members of the Bar, if they can look forward to it as a profession in which they can start at the beginning and go up to the top, I think that in itself would be a benefit to the profession and raise it.

So far from looking forward, as some pessimists seem to do, to a lowering of the traditions of the Bar, I think under the new order of things there is no reason in the world why the old traditions should not be continued, and even extended. The County Court in the past has been used by litigants to come in mainly to find out what the other side's case was; in other words, they entered the case in the County Courts with the distinct purpose of going on for further appeal and being able to supplement their case and better it in the process. I think that is wisely done away with in the Bill, and the stenographer comes in there very usefully. It may be more expensive, possibly, in that particular item, but taking it as a whole the Circuit Court ought not to be docked of any of the jurisdiction which is put upon it in this Bill, but rather, I think, the Committee should emphasise the importance of the alteration by insisting on this Clause being left as it is.

Captain REDMOND: I am very sorry, but I find it incumbent on me to exercise my full rights on this amendment, and say a few words in reply to Deputy Hewat. He seems to think that the experience of the junior member of these local Bars will be of great service to him when he comes to Dublin on matters of appeal. Unfortunately I have to differ with him in that respect, because the member of the Junior Bar on these local circuits will not have at his disposal the means of obtaining the knowledge of the law which he would have if the case had come on in Dublin. No barrister goes about with all the law in his head. The law is there for him to find. That is his job, and, unfortunately, what I fear is that instead of being a good training ground for good lawyers it will produce hurried and ill-thought-out, and, consequently, not accurate but faulty decisions.

A DEPUTY: Hedge lawyers.

Captain REDMOND: That is not a bad description. I hope that will not be the case. I sincerely trust that all these local Bars will be equipped, and richly equipped, with all the latest law books and all the latest law reports, both in Ireland and in Great Britain, because much as we may talk about setting up a distinctive and new system in this country, nine-tenths of this Bill is founded on the existing system, and the whole measure is founded on the fact that we have adopted the British common law and the British Statute law, except where we have otherwise repealed it, for the future judicial system. I must take exception to what Deputy Magennis has criticised as my conservatism in the matter. My conservatism consists in this, that because a system was made in England I am not going to turn it down. I have not reached the stage of narrow-minded ultra patriotism that because a thing comes from outside, therefore, I cannot take it and make the best of it, and make the best use of it for the benefit of my country. That, after all, has been the great success of England in the past. England never despised outside inventions or outside systems. On the contrary, England took them and adopted them and adapted them, and that is what has made England what it is to-day. I hope, therefore, that in the future we will not be so blinded by our ardent desire to have everything changed and everything distinct, not for reason, but for blind prejudice; on the contrary, I hope we will have a stratum of commonsense and sound patriotism to take what is good from everywhere and make it adaptable to the best needs and purposes of our country.

Professor MAGENNIS: In the first of his speeches Deputy Redmond referred to quite a number of other things besides the certain failure of the Junior Bar. He complained of the new proposition that appeals should be heard on a stenographer's notes. The very fact that he should object to the new procedure is further testimony of the hopeless conservative, reactionary character of his mind. Does he want a perpetuation of the method illustrated in Bardell v. Pickwick, where at the close of a very prolonged action the judge read to the jury as many of his notes as he could decipher. In quite a recent case—it would hardly be fair to mention it—involving a colossal sum of money, one of the parties to the suit was defeated through the fact that the judge had failed to make a note of the most important evidence of the most important witness. No cognisance could be taken of this pivotal evidence, on which the whole matter turned. The present procedure as you know is——

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I am afraid the question of stenography is not in the amendment.

Prof. MAGENNIS: No. In reality the speech to which I am replying was a Second Reading speech and, perhaps, I am out of order in following what was out of order.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is so, unfortunately.

Prof. MAGENNIS: Then I bow to that, because it is in sympathy with my own view of the matter.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I hope the Deputy would not refuse to bow if it were out of sympathy with his own view.

Prof. MAGENNIS: I might be disposed to dispute it were it not so. He spoke of the difficulty of local Circuit Courts doing justice in the way of serving out the very latest and, consequently, the very best law. This is part of the prejudice which belongs to a barrister nurtured in Dublin upon the hitherto existing system of Dublin.

One of the peculiar features of Bar practice in Ireland was that the Bar was centralised in the Law Library where men met to discuss law and scandal, and retail not merely the latest legal decisions but the latest social reports. It was a scene in which history of various kinds as well as legal history was made. It was one of the great and one of the good features, notwithstanding its vices, of the Irish Bar system. I have seen the most junior of junior barristers go up to the first serjeant-at-law, a man bent down with the weight of legal lore, and ask him how to deal with a Civil Bill appeal. It was a great advantage, this fraternity, a very genuine fraternity, in spite of the fierce competition that existed between members of the Bar and, consequently, it was always possible to have an opinion upon an opinion. That is not the system in that great land before which Deputy Redmond bows awestruck.

Captain REDMOND: So do you.

Prof. MAGENNIS: I speak with reverence of English law. The practice at the English Bar enables a member of the Bar to live in chambers and his cases are brought in by a clerk. Deputy Redmond is thinking, therefore, of a big central law library as the essence of Bar practice. He is living a little out of his time, if it is not offensive to say so, not merely as to the relations between a carpenter and a cabinet-maker, but as regards the resources that are open to a man who wishes to know the law without being obliged to meet the expenses of a colossal library. In recent years enormous help has been given to the profession by the publication of digests of cases. It is possible, really, in half an hour, or so, for a man who is acquainted with the law and has a certain measure of legal training to acquaint himself with the decisions, and to inform himself of cases over-ruled. It is true it would be an advisable thing if time allowed that he should go and read the more detailed reports, but, at the same time, the essential part of the decision is usually given to him in foot notes so that these junior practitioners on a circuit Bar would not at all be so helpless, or handicapped, as Deputy Redmond is inclined to believe.

Furthermore, to indulge in prophecy again, new needs and new requirements usually bring about agencies for their satisfaction. That in brief is the history of civilisation, and when the need arose men proceeded, by the exercise of their ingenuity and drawing upon parallel experiences in the past, to supply it. The Circuit Judge will not be found travelling in a caravan from town to town consulting law books by lamp light overnight, like Napoleon in his tent examining the map of the country by a lantern. Experience and convenience of litigants will bring it about when the Courts of the Circuit area will be localised in one, two or three areas, and eventually a library will be forthcoming for storing there these detailed law reports, Law Reports (Ireland), Law Reports (England), and the new series and digests of cases so that this is merely a momentary hiatus which can be overcome.

Personally, I see in this creation of Circuit Courts one of the greatest of the new departures that will make for the benefit of the country. If I may be permitted to delay for one moment in regard to the peroration of Deputy Redmond, long before the British Empire was thought of, the Roman Empire set the world the model, of which he speaks, of looking round at civilization and at other races with which they came into contact, viewing sympathetically the institutions which they created, and making their own of those that were adaptable and that would serve the Roman population. That undoubtedly is wisdom—I am not speaking in any adverse sense in regard to that. The whole system of British law, of statute-made law, and the whole method of its administration is, I have no hesitation in saying, an alien thing, and we are not setting it aside all at once with the hurried zeal of young reformers. One of the things we did in the moments of enthusiasm, in the early days of the late Dáil, was to re-enact those statutes already applicable so as to give us time to think out the situation and see what new code of law was required to be created. Here we are taking on a great problem—how to set up constitutions, statutes, and tribunals which will serve the needs of the Irish people. What suits Liverpool and England generally, may not suit us, and consequently it does not follow that institutions or procedures that have succeeded there must slavishly be followed by us, or on the other hand that we must depart from them, not because of patriotic prejudice but because of patriotic duty, and consider the special requirements of our own people. We must remember also that in this matter sentiment counts for a very great deal. Deputy Johnson, no doubt, takes a very rationalistic view of these things, and sees life in the hard cold light of intellect, but a great part of man is ruled not by intellect, but by sentiment and ritual. Our people will look to the courts as the creation of Irish minds, and with feelings of affection, and with a sense of obedience which will create in them a feeling for law and order which they could not be expected to entertain when those institutions were administered by people whom they regarded as their natural enemies.

Mr. JOHNSON: Deputy Magennis has strangely misread signs and portents. I would imagine he might have seen during his last year or two signs at least that sentiment affects my view of life to an extent perhaps not less than his own. This discussion that has taken place between Deputies Box and Cox has convinced me that the Government would be well advised to stand firm by the proposals of the Bill, and that applies to Deputy Magennis's amendment. I think the case he has made against Amendment 12 is equally valid against Amendment 13, and I, therefore, expect that the discussion on the next amendment will be shortened. As I see it, the case was fairly well admitted that the Bill as it stands will benefit the litigant and the public, provided there is no loss of efficiency in the practices in the Courts and in the abilities of the Bar. The layman can only judge that matter by the weight of evidence, and the evidence appears to me to lie between the statement of Deputy Redmond, and perhaps the more authoritative statement and beliefs of those lawyers, barristers, judges and solicitors who advise the extension of the jurisdiction to the extent contained in the Bill as it stands. I believe the desirable course to adopt is to extend the jurisdiction of the local courts, and I hope the Government will stand by the clause as it is printed in the Bill

Mr. T. O'MAHONY: I cannot speak with the authority and technical knowledge of Deputies Redmond or Magennis on a matter of this kind. I simply put forward the views of a layman, of one of those who may be concerned in the operations of those Courts. The first and main objection raised by Deputy Redmond was to the extension of the powers of the Court. He suggested that the labours of the Courts were increased in some instances by six times. That was hardly a fair representation of the increase of duties that will be imposed on the judges of those new Courts. Multiplying £50 by six and giving a jurisdiction of £300 may mean only a small increase of the administrative duties of the Courts. The cases hitherto dealt with under £50 would comprise the biggest percentage that would have to be dealt with even in the limits of £300, because the sums we had to deal with in the past, and will have to deal with in the future, will be largely sums under £100.

The chief objections, I think, however, that Deputy Redmond had to the operation of those Courts were that they operated adversely to the interests of the solicitors' and barristers' profession. The duty of the Executive Government is not to consider the interests of a small section of the population, or of one particular branch of the profession, but rather what is for the general benefit of the community. In this respect I believe that that benefit will be largely secured in favour of the people by the extension of the powers it is proposed to give the Circuit Judges under this Bill. I intend later to suggest that the powers of the District Justice Courts should be increased, and for this reason. Both those classes of Judges operating within limited areas will acquire an active knowledge of local conditions, of men and of things, which they can apply to the benefit of the law and to a clearer determination of the interests and disputes that will come before them and that would not be possible if those cases had to be tried in Dublin. The extension of the areas was a further objection raised by Deputy Redmond. The extension of the old areas of the Resident Magistrates whose duties are now discharged by the District Justices has not resulted in failure to administer effectively the new duties imposed on them in the new areas. The instructions given to the Committee who framed the suggestions on which this Bill is founded were that accessibility, expedition, efficiency, and cost should be taken into consideration.

Anyone reading the Bill must come to the conclusion that in its operations all those considerations are being given a fair show, and that under the new system the law would be more efficiently and cheaply administered, and be much more convenient for those who have to go to the courts. For this reason I suggest it is undesirable that the Dáil should interfere with the particular provision of the Bill to which this amendment has been moved. I think that the present provision makes the law more convenient and accessible to people in the country, and you may take it it in no way affects prejudicially the members of the Bar. We anticipate that in these local Courts the members of the Bar will maintain the high standard of efficiency for which the Irish Bar has been noted, and, in addition, to bringing the law home to the people in the country districts, we shall at the same time have the cost of administration, and the cost to the litigant considerably reduced. For these reasons I think there is no necessity to alter the jurisdiction of the Judges.

PADRAIC MAG UALGHAIRG :

Táim sásta nach geuirfear an leas-rún seo i bh-feidhm. An módh dlighe a bhi againn go dtí anois bhi sé neamhoiriúnach. Na daoine do cheap an módh sin b'iad daoine nar theastaigh uatha ach a lamha a chur i b-pócaí muinntir na d-tíre. Buidheachas do

It seems that we are going to have great difficulty in getting through Section 48. The amendment by Deputy Redmond proposes to reduce the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court Judge from £300 to £100. It was an intolerable hardship in the past, under the old system, that in cases where the figure in dispute was £60 the litigant had to undertake the expense and worry of a High Court action here in Dublin. I think the proposal contained in the Bill, to increase the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court up to £300, is a very worthy and admirable one. I have not heard any arguments advanced that would justify any reduction of that jurisdiction as far as the Circuit Court is concerned. We have had here a most extraordinary confusion of arguments all through so far as the discussion has gone in Committee. We have had an allegation made in regard to the stupendous and enormous amount of work that the Recorder of Dublin has to do, and it has been suggested that some additional Judges should be appointed to assist him. That is met on the other hand by a proposal to reduce the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court by £200, from £300. If the allegation is true with regard to the excessive work that the Recorder has to do, then the analogy is false, and it does not justify a reduction of the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court Judge.

I hope we will confine ourselves to what are the real merits of the case. We are being addressed here more or less as a jury by the Deputies who are supporting this amendment. It is all, to my mind, a case of special pleading, and we stand between the people who will be litigants and the Bar who will be the beneficiaries. We are asked to consider only the beneficiaries and overlook the interest of the litigants, and to insist that in all cases where over £100 is in dispute, these people shall proceed with their array of witnesses and at enormous expense to Dublin for the benefit and advantage of the Bar here in Dublin. We are told that good law is only to be obtained in Dublin, and that bad law is likely to be met with and is going to prevail in the provinces under the Circuit Court. I think if good law and bad law are to be scheduled in this Bill, that is not at all desirable. What we want is good law in the smaller Courts and in the smaller cases.

We do not care much about the larger cases. They are well looked after generally, because the interests involved are so powerful that they will take very good care of themselves. Where we want the good law is in connection with the smaller cases below £100 and down to £5. The nation requires good, cheap and convenient law. We are going to have those things under this Bill.

There should not, to my mind, be any diminution of the jurisdiction of the District or Circuit Courts. The terms of the Bill should be kept to tenaciously. I hope the Government will stand firm by the terms of the Bill. One suggestion is that the jurisdiction be decreased from £300 to £100, and another suggestion from £300 to £200. I hope the Government will stand firmly behind the figures set out in the Bill, and that they will not allow any arguments, that are largely influenced by a profession that in the past had certainly a great deal to do with the management of law, to influence them in the direction of a change. I hope the Dáil will see that we are going to lay down the principles upon which law is to prevail, and in doing so the interests of our community, which are largely in our hands now, will be considered, and we will stand firmly in the advocacy of the interests of our own people.

Mr. A. BYRNE: I rise on a point of order to refer to a matter of courtesy to the Dáil. I would like to know whether a Deputy can address the Ceann Comhairle without somebody being on the front Bench representing the Government? Who on behalf of the Government will reply to the speakers who are now addressing the Dáil? This is a matter of interest to the Dáil and I now raise it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think there can be no doubt whatever that either the Minister in charge of the Bill, or some other Minister on his behalf, should be present during all the discussion. I will take a motion to report progress from any Deputy who wishes to put forward one.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I move to report progress.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The motion is that the Committee report progress and sit again on the next day on which the Dáil shall meet.

Captain REDMOND: We are all agreed to that.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is it in the discretion of yourself to adjourn the discussion for a period of half an hour or an hour?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think that the Committee must report progress. Then when progress is reported to the Dáil, we could adjourn for a period, but not until then.

The President entered the Chamber.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Mr. President, a motion has been made to report progress, in view of the fact that there was no Minister present to hear the speeches made on this amendment.

The PRESIDENT: I believe the Dáil will be agreeable to have that amendment taken. It was not out of disrespect to the Dáil that I left. I left it for only a moment. I had to put off several appointments that I made, not thinking I would be engaged here the whole time. The other Ministers have left for reasons of public business. I would be sorry that any Deputy would think that any member of the Ministry would leave out of disrespect to the Dáil.

Mr. ALFRED BYRNE: I raised the question for the future guidance of the Dáil. If there was a Parliamentary Secretary who would take notes for the Minister or Ministers concerned a reply could be made to the points raised for or against the amendment, and it would be different, but as there was no Minister present I raised the question. I do not wish for a moment to embarrass any Minister, or to impute motives of disrespect to the Dáil to the members of the Government, but when I saw the benches empty I thought it necessary to draw your attention to that, and to the fact that on all occasions a representative of some sort, whether a Parliamentary Secretary or otherwise, should sit there to take a note of any remarks made.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think the President can be assured that it is not precisely with reference to himself that the point is raised. The point was raised rather with regard to the fact that when the President himself was absent no other member of the Government was present.

Mr. A. BYRNE: That is my point.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I must say that we all appreciate the fact that the President himself has many calls on his time and could not possibly be always present.

The PRESIDENT: It is my mistake and I regret that I did not see that there was some Minister in my place.

Mr. O'MAHONY: Is it possible to give effect to the suggestion of Deputy Johnson that we adjourn for a limited period?

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: If it is the President's desire that the debate should be continued, I will withdraw my motion.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Should not this amendment be disposed of?

The PRESIDENT: Yes.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The motion to report progress is withdrawn.

PADRAIC O MAILLE: Ni raibh puinn eile agam le rádh, acht iarraidh ar an Dáil gan glacadh leis an leas-rún san. Cuirfeadh sé sin mór-chostas ar mhuintir a bheadh a dul chun dlighe a chur ar a chéile.

The PRESIDENT: I do not know that I can add very much to the various arguments that have been put forward against this amendment. Most of the ground that I intended to cover, was covered in a much better manner by Deputy Magennis and some of the other speakers. I should say that the recommendations of this Judiciary Committee were recommendations which it would be rather difficult for the Government to ignore. Their recommendation in this case, so far as the Circuit Courts were concerned, was that the sum should be £300. On that Committee, apart from members of the legal profession, there was one representative of Commerce specially appointed as the representative of Commerce. It is believed that this particular recommendation, that the jurisdiction of the Circuit Courts should extend to £300, is one of the main, if not the most important, features in the Bill. I do not by that mean to discount in any way the importance of the Supreme Court or of the High Court. Judging the usefulness of the Courts from the amount of business that will be presented to them, I think it will be admitted that a larger number of people will apply in the Circuit Courts, and that major business will be discharged in these Courts. I think that Deputy O'Mahony met the point very fairly, that we had sextupled the business of these Courts by increasing the amount from £50 to £300, by saying that it did not necessarily mean that six times more business would be discharged in the Courts by reason of that. At the time when £50 was fixed as the sum that the jurisdiction of the County Courts would cover, I think it was somewhere about the seventies, and there is no doubt that values have changed very considerably since then. Apart from the values there has also been, I think it will be admitted, a change in the general business—that is to say, cases are larger now, and for very much larger amounts than they were at that time. As regards the agricultural community, even though it be disputed that they are less prosperous now than then, the fact is that they are dealing in larger sums, and consequently some accommodation to meet the changes ought to be made in this Bill.

People are not bound to the Circuit Courts in actions up to £300. That, I think, is a very important matter. Taking into consideration the amount which would be allowed for jurisdiction in the cases of the

2 o'clock. Circuit Courts, it would mean that if you limit this amount as between £200 and £300, anything over £100 could not, I think, go to the Circuit Courts. As regards the amount of work the Circuit Courts will meet with, I think it must be borne in mind that it is rather difficult to make any estimate. The whole system has been changed. The recommendations for changes have been very large, and they are not merely for the purpose of change. That has been dealt with ably by Deputy Magennis. Experience of the last few years has shown the necessity for that change; we are aware of the popularity of the Dáil Courts, and the fact that matters could be settled expeditiously and with little cost, and, I believe, under great difficulties, with great satisfaction to the various litigants. The case for reducing the amount does not appear to us to have been sustained. With regard to the question of change, I notice in one section of the Dublin Press that an impression seems to have got around that we want changes simply for the purpose of making changes. That is an utterly wrong view to take.

It is scarcely fair to put it that way, and I gather that from some of the criticisms made in various newspaper articles now and then. One must take into consideration the psychology of the country. After a long period in which the Courts were unpopular many of the decisions that may be given now may not be to the satisfaction of the persons concerned, who will say: "There is no change in the administration of the country," and in order to meet the peculiar views some indication of change is not at all undesirable, but certainly not for the sake of change. I would say this, in reply to Deputy Redmond's complaint about information not reaching the local Barristers connected with these local Bars; I was engaged during the last three or four years as Minister for Local Government, in the first Dáil and throughout the second Dáil, and during that time I came in contact with, I suppose, the largest number of public representatives from local authorities from all over the country that, perhaps, it was ever the fortune or misfortune of any other person to have come in contact with. What amazed me about those representatives was, their keen and precise knowledge of the various difficulties and complexities that arise in the administration of Local Government, gained in some cases from the Press, and in some cases from inference or reports. In every case they showed most extensive knowledge, even in the most unimportant details, as they might appear to us here. Whenever a question affecting Local Government arose they spoke as if they had made a special study of Local Government, and with as much practical knowledge as if they were engaged here in the Central Office dealing with these matters. I think if that be the case in regard to intimate knowledge on the part of members of local authorities it is unlikely that a very important and learned profession such as the Bar would not be able to get all the information required about the latest legal cases without any great difficulty at all.

It was, also, pointed out, I think recently in the Press, that this local Bar experiment has had a large measure of success in Belfast. The North-East circuit in the old days was certainly benefited by the fact that it had a local Bar, and when members from that particular Circuit came up to town it was observed that the cream of [The President.] the profession came. It may be that both now and for some time to come there will be a general attraction towards the metropolis. Objection to this Bill comes from many quarters. My information is that the solicitors in the country generally approve of the Bill and of this particular Section, and whereas there is some unpopularity about this Section in this city I take it that the general idea in regard to the whole country is that there ought not to be a centralisation in the metropolis. There is no objection, but on the contrary there is every desire that the cream of the profession ought to be attracted to the metropolis, and we ought not to minimise the importance of some of the provinces that have sent up remarkable men—prominent public men—that we have in the public life, and in the various professions in the country. There is also some unpopularity about these so-called local Bars by reason of the fact that barristers now living in the city will have to take up their residences perhaps in the country districts, and this country question and centralisation question is one that may give us some little trouble in the future. There is a desire to get away from the country, but as this country is an agricultural country, we ought not to stimulate that desire.

I do not know whether I have dealt with all the points made by Deputy Redmond, but many of them have been answered by other speakers. I must say that we were very seriously impressed by the views of the commercial community in fixing upon this £300 jurisdiction for the Circuit Courts. The Circuit Courts in our view ought to be popularised in this country, which is relatively a poor country. These courts are popular and they are less costly in the operations that will be conducted in them, and I am sure, and hope that they will give greater confidence to the people to go into them. At the present moment I believe a very large number of people will not go into court by reason of the idea that the cost is prohibitive. I think it is our first duty, in a new State, to see that justice will be put within the reach of every citizen at a cost that will not be exorbitant, and that the institutions of justice will command the confidence of the people.

Captain REDMOND: As there is a subsequent amendment to reduce this amount to £200, which I am sure will be ably argued by Deputy Magennis, and as there does not seem to be very great likelihood of this amendment being accepted by the Dáil, I ask leave to withdraw it. Before doing so, however, may I ask one question of the President: Whether, if not now at some future period, during the course of the progress of this Bill, he will be in a position to inform me if it is the intention of the Executive to set up these Commissioners of the High Court Circuit to which I have referred? I do not ask for an answer now.

The PRESIDENT: Yes, like the question of not more than eight Judges raised yesterday, it will be governed by the necessities of the case; that is, if the necessity arises, that will be done. If the necessity does not arise I do not think it likely it will be done. However, I will consider the matter and inform the Deputy on the report stage. Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The last amendment was a very important one, and I allowed considerable latitude in the discussion of it. I think the discussion of the next amendment, number 13, must be confined altogether to the advisability of reducing the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court from £300 to £200, the proposal to reduce it to £100 having been withdrawn as not accepted.

Professor MAGENNIS: I beg to move the following amendment:—"In line 52 to delete £300 and to substitute therefor £200; and in line the figures £60 and to substitute therefor the figures £45; and in line 59 to delete the figures £60 and to substitute the figures £45."

I have just now supported, as strongly as I could, what I regard as the clue of this measure, the decentralization of the courts and the enlargement of the jurisdiction of the local courts to meet the needs and special requirements of the people.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE, at this stage, took the chair.

Professor MAGENNIS: Deputy Johnson and Deputy Redmond believe that in doing so I have barred the door against the amendment for which I am, technically and officially, at any rate, responsible. Everything that I have just now said on behalf of decentralization I stand over, even as the spokesman for the present proposition, and the optimistic view I take of the future of the Bar, not merely as a profession, but as an instrument for the advancement of the public good, I am prepared to repeat. It is now not a question of principle, but simply a question of the more or less. Now, this is one of the amendments which I tabled on behalf of the Bar Council, and inasmuch as my views are very pronounced in favour of the scheme of decentralization I found it necessary to get a special brief for the proposal to reduce to £200, and so with your permission I propose now to read from the brief: "A case in contract—"

Mr. JOHNSON: On a point of order, I desire to ask if these are the Deputy's own views?

Professor MAGENNIS: That is a question which, I submit with all respect, the Deputy is not entitled to ask with regard to another Deputy. We are all here as representatives; we are here in a representative capacity, and an exponent so determined of democracy as Deputy Johnson ought to uphold, and strenuously uphold, the view which I am putting forward, that a Deputy here is not merely a Deputy by official title, but a special type of representative whose duty it is to expound the views of his constituents. I am speaking now as one of the members for the National University of Ireland. The National University of Ireland has a school of law in each of its constituent colleges, and one of the main functions of that school of law is to provide barristers and solicitors for the country. I should be failing—

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I would remind the Deputy it would be better to confine the discussion to the amendment before the Dáil.

Professor MAGENNIS: I am speaking on the point of order raised by Deputy Johnson, and not on the amendment. You will observe the distinction.

Mr. JOHNSON: The point of order that I have raised is really one that will have to be decided some day, and it is whether a Deputy is entitled to read views which are not his own not merely to illustrate his argument, but really to make somebody else's speech—the speech of a person who is not a Deputy.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I do not think it is fair that that should be done, but the Deputy who has raised the point did the very same thing here himself on a former occasion when he read from "The Jail Journal." I think on these matters it would be better if Deputies confined themselves to the amendments on the Order Paper.

Professor MAGENNIS: With all respect, Deputy Johnson is trying to impute you with what I must call, for want of a better term, a perverted view of the position which I am taking up. I merely draw attention to the fact that at one and the same moment I, as a representative here, uphold the principle of the Bill, and at the same time seek to depart, as regards one small item of its details, from what the Bill contains, in correspondence with the recommendations of the Judiciary Committee. If Deputy Johnson chooses to raise constitutional questions in connection with that, surely that is his own affair, and there is a fitting time and way for raising these questions. This is merely a humorous turn which he seeks to give to a very serious debate. I claim I am perfectly within my rights as a Deputy to declare that the views which I hold and seek to put before you now as to the reduction of the figure from £300 to £200 are views impressed upon me by distinguished members of my constituency. It is a question of greater or less candour and honesty.

Deputy Johnson expounds here doctrines the source of which volume, chapter and verse I could give. Is every speaker here, when he is using information or special knowledge to impress the Dáil in favour of the conclusion to his argument, obliged to say: "I am now quoting from John Smithkins, volume 3, on the advantages of keeping a cat." If that is your ruling, then I think our speeches will have to be considerably elongated.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

The Deputy is in order to give the quotation.

Professor MAGENNIS: Thanks very much. The case in favour of the reduction from £300 to £200 is this: Usually in an action up to £300 there are intricate questions of fact, and sometimes difficult questions of law. A very cautious solicitor, in charge of such a case, would feel himself bound to bring down from the central Bar in Dublin eminent counsel at great expense. That may be useful to the Bar, but I think it is to the credit of senior counsel that they take the view that though that would add to their remuneration it would increase the burden of cost to the litigant. If the case were, as a matter of course, brought in the first instance before the High Court, the parties to the action would be satisfied usually with the decision of the High Court as being a decision of the High Court, and litigation would come to a natural end. If the case is instituted in a matter of £300 in a Circuit Court, the chances are that one of the parties will move under the facilities provided by the Government's amendment, which is to be reached shortly, to have the case brought to the High Court. That is a suit involving costs, and then at last the case is brought in the High Court in any event. The proposal is this, that where a case is a very big one, and likely to involve a long hearing, together with the expenses I have indicated, other litigants are affected injuriously by the delay in the hearing of their cases, so that it is usually a question of convenience. Now, I am upholding the principle of decentralisation, and I repeat that the very extension of the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court would indicate a limit beyond which it is not desirable to go. That is the whole case.

Professor O'SULLIVAN: I do not think that the last Deputy has made it quite clear why £200 is a more suitable limit than £300. I suggest to you that a case which involves £200 will raise as difficult a question of law as one involving £300, and, therefore, will be quite as expensive so far as the advice of eminent Counsel is concerned as a case of £300. I should be very sorry if the Dáil in any way did anything to diminish the limit of £300. I did not speak on the last amendment because it was so obviously against the whole spirit of the Bill, especially this portion of the Bill; so conservative as to be reactionary, and did away with the whole conception that the Bill has of the value of these Courts. I suggest that £200, considering the value of money now and the value of money when £50 was fixed under the Judicature Act, is not much of an advance. The other objection about the difficulty of getting verdicts from country juries owing to local prejudices I am glad to say has not been unduly pressed in this Dáil, if it has been pressed in the public papers. That, as you will see, is covered by an amendment that will come on very soon in one of the next Sections. I do not think that Deputy Magennis has made it clear that there is a different kind of case involved in a £300 action that is not involved in the £200 one.

Professor MAGENNIS: There is no doubt a great deal in what Deputy Professor O'Sullivan urges. There may be a very big point of law in a question that comes before a District Justice, and provision is made for that in the Bill. A case may be stated for the Judges of the High Court. There I am quite with him so far as regards that contention. All these figures are arrived at by way of compromise. The yard is 3 feet long, or 36 inches; that is the standard convention. If the yard is considered long, then 2 feet 3 inches is long, and 2 feet is not so long. Then where do we stop saying that the thing is long and begin to say it is short? These are all arrived at arbitrarily. Even the figure of the Judiciary Committee was arrived at by compromise. Some wanted it £500. It is a question of psychology really in the end. A man will, at a gaming table, stake more money and yet more money; in other circumstances he will not. What makes the difference is the amount of the plus. There is no one in this Dáil so familiar with the fallacy in question as Deputy Professor O'Sullivan himself. He is an authority on these matters to whom I defer. It is known as the fallacy of the auction room. A.B. bids £10 for an article; someone says guineas. The auctioneer allows at that stage an increase of 10/-, and he advances another 10/-. But it is not an increase of 10/-; it is an increase of 10/- upon 10 guineas. It is a question of jumping from £10 to £11. These things have all, in other words, to be considered relatively. What Bar the solicitor will engage, a heavy Bar or a light Bar, will depend very largely upon whether the client considers the question at stake of sufficient importance, and the estimation of sufficient importance is based in the case of tort upon the amount of damages recoverable. So that I know perfectly well, and Deputy Professor O'Sullivan knows equally well, that I could not say the reason why £300 is more likely to involve the employment of senior counsel at great expense than £200 is. I can only say in a vague sort of way that experience shows that on the whole, in the long run, the employment of senior counsel is more likely to be necessitated by a £300 case than by a £200 case.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I have been interested in the arguments that Deputy Professor O'Sullivan raised countering the proposal to reduce from £300 to £200. He asked what different point of law was likely to be raised in one that would not be covered by the other. Supposing that he extended, what different point of law is likely to be raised in the £300 case that would not be covered in a £500, £600 or £700 case? Why not, therefore, continue to extend it? The argument cuts both ways. The appeal that this amendment has to my mind is this, that the larger the jurisdiction the greater the tendency, the greater the temptation there will be to bring the greatest possible amount of influence to bear in the first place, and also another matter that I will mention later. I raised this question of influence yesterday, and the President dealt with it as though I were making some impeachment of Irish juries. There was no impeachment of Irish juries. It was a principle that was applicable not only to Ireland but to every country. The question is not whether juries are likely to be prejudiced. The question rather is that where a community is so small that each member of that community knows every other member of the community, that then you certainly have got a city population or a town population—or however one desires to describe that population—that is unsuitable to serve as a unit for the creation of a jury. That has been proved in other countries. I have myself on occasions heard arguing in France where local judges have tried local cases. Obviously it will apply far more in the case of juries, and I think that a jurisdiction of £200 would not lead to the same tendency to use local influence to prejudice a case as there would be in a case of £300. There is a further argument it is one that the President has referred to earlier to-day. He stated with considerable force that the value of money is not what it was, that the kind of case that would be covered by the earlier jurisdiction of the County Courts would not be covered by the same jurisdiction to-day because money has declined in its purchasing power. Allowing for that I suggest that £200 would be a sufficient kind of case to leave to the jurisdiction of the Circuit Courts.

And there is yet another argument. It was urged yesterday with considerable force by Deputy Redmond, and anyone who has worked out the figures must have felt it. It is obvious also that the drafters of the Bill felt that possibly 8 Circuit Judges will not be enough to cover the business to be done by these Circuit Courts. Provision has been made for assistant judges. Now, the reason why it is doubtful whether 8 Judges will be sufficient to cover the business is chiefly in regard to the extended jurisdiction of Circuit Courts in matters of tort and contract. Therefore, if that limitation were to be accepted by the Ministry, I think it would be far more in the capacity of the 8 Judges whom this Bill creates to handle the business that will arise within these

Circuit Courts. In arguing against the last amendment, Deputy Professor Magennis stated that while reports might not be available for the library of each of these Circuit Courts, digests would be. I am not a lawyer, but I do know something about the written and printed end of study in some of these matters, and I know that if you are going to get an adequate set of digests for each of these Circuit Courts and going to move them in the perambulation of the Courts from one place to another, you are going to have very heavy expense both in the furnishing of the libraries and also in their removal. I support this amendment because, I think, in the first place, £200 would give a range of business that would be more likely to be covered by the 8 judges created by this Bill than £300 would; and also because the larger the jurisdiction the more temptation there would be, and the greater inducement, to bring local influence to bear. We have got to recognise the fact that it is true of Ireland that our country towns are smaller, owing to historical causes, than country towns are in other countries. That means that if a large and important case, involving a considerable sum of money, were to be appealed to a jury from a country town in respect of one of the citizens of that town, there would be every opportunity existing for him to exert his influence and to prejudice the case. The larger the jurisdiction the greater that temptation would be. I suggest an important change has been made by this Bill. It has been affirmed in the principle of the Bill that at least for a beginning it would be unwise to extend that too far and that to make the jurisdiction of this Court £200 is sufficient, at least, for a time.

The PRESIDENT: Deputy Professor Magennis is very honest in this amendment. He used all his own arguments and then he used some of mine. I was going to inform the Dáil that the Committee at first suggested £500, and £300 was a compromise. This particular amendment is one, as Deputy Magennis knows better than any of us, that is most difficult either to recommend or to refuse to accept. It is really a question of degree, and it depends on how far one brings to bear on the judgment of it experience or an estimate of its usefulness in order to decide how one's vote will be cast, as to whether it should be £300 or £200. As the case appears to me, I should say a really great attempt ought to be made to popularise these Circuit Courts; to make them the Courts in which people all over the country would have implicit confidence. In this country, perhaps more than any other, one is affected by the status of whatever institution is in question. That is one reason why I would like to see the status of this Court raised as high as possible with regard to its own particular jurisdiction. There is provision for the Court by agreement dealing with cases of any amount, but in considering whether or not the case would be brought in the Circuit Court, one of the first questions that will arise is what is the jurisdiction of the Court? If it be £200, and only £200, then a man who has an action for £190 will probably say: "We will try the High Court first." From that angle I would say it would be better that the sum should be £300. In fact, if my own opinion were taken, I would go another £100 and say £400, as we would then surely rope in all the £300 actions, as long as the higher sum was taken to be the status. As regards what Deputy Figgis said, I was rather glad to hear it, but I would point out that each of these Circuit Courts operates in a district in which the population is something like 300,000 or 400,000. That is a pretty considerable number to draw from for juries. In addition to that, it is open to the Circuit Judge to change the hearing of a case from one town to another. If, for example, a man living in a town called X has a case against a man in a town called Y, and that it is brought in the town of X, the Judge can change the hearing of the case to the town of Z, so that neither of the two parties would have any cause for complaint. I think the very large population in each one of these places raises again the status of the court and is a matter of very considerable importance. I would certainly prefer very much, even if these Courts were overworked, that there would still be only eight Judges, because of the fact that they embrace a very large sector of the country within their ambit. That, to my mind, emphasises the status of the Court in the same way as the £300 case would as against the £200 one.

Amendment put and declared lost.

Professor MAGENNIS: I move:

In sub-clause (v.), line 1, page 12, to delete the words "including winding-up of Companies," and to delete from the word "and," line 3, to "£10,000," line, 4, inclusive.

The reason for seeking to withdraw the winding up of companies is because that requires very special machinery which, in this case, can best be had, in point of view of efficiency, as well as of economy, in the Central Court, or rather in the offices attached to the Central Court. It is one of the exceptions to the otherwise excellent principle of decentralisation. We feel that the winding-up of a company and questions dealing with the misfeasance of directors, and cognate subjects could be more effectually dealt with in the capital city, so that it is not by way of aspersions upon the competence or capacity of local auditors. There may, in the various areas, be quite as competent and quite as experienced auditors as in Dublin. It is merely that the tradition of this peculiar class of work is here and that is the sole argument.

The PRESIDENT: I am informed that there is no specialised machinery for dealing with these cases in the Dublin Courts, and I take it that if this amendment were passed it would mean that a company, if there be such in this country, with a capital of £9,999 could be wound-up in one of these Courts. I am not sure. I think it might take in the winding-up of companies with larger capital than £10,000. It would mean that the winding-up of companies was to be excluded from the jurisdiction of Circuit Courts altogether. I would undertake, if the Deputy likes, to consider that on the next stage, but I would not undertake to consider it very favourably.

Professor MAGENNIS: I am quite satisfied.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move:

In page 12, to delete lines 5 to 10 inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following words:—

"(vi) In Bankruptcy.—In Local Bankruptcy Courts which may be established under the Local Bankruptcy (Ireland) Act, 1888, for which purpose that Act shall be construed and take effect as if the expressions 'Executive Council,' 'order of the Executive Council,' 'Minister for Finance,' and 'Chief Justice' were respectively substituted for the expressions 'Lord Lieutenant,' 'Order in Council,' 'Treasury,' and 'Lord Chancellor' wherever those expressions respectively occur in the said Act, and the words 'in any Circuit' were substituted for the words 'in Londonderry, Galway, Waterford, and Limerick, respectively, or in any of those places' where those words occur in Section 5 of the said Act: Provided that nothing herein contained shall take away or prejudice the right of any party to any action (not being an action for a liquidated sum, or an action for the enforcement, or for damages for the breach of a contract) to have questions of fact tried by a jury in such cases as he might heretofore of right have so required and with like directions as to law and evidence, but no party to an action for a liquidated sum, or an action for the enforcement or for damages for the breach of a contract shall be entitled to a jury unless the judge shall consider a jury to be necessary or desirable for the proper trial of the action and shall of his own motion or on the application of any party so order. Every jury in a Circuit Court shall consist of twelve members and the provisions of Section 24 hereof shall apply to every civil trial before a Circuit Judge and jury. Provided also that any party to an action commenced in the Circuit Court and pending therein may at any time apply to the Circuit Judge that the action may be sent forward to the High Court, and thereupon in case the action is one fit to be prosecuted in the High Court and the High

Court appears to be the more appropriate tribunal in the circumstances, the Circuit Judge may send forward such action to the High Court upon such terms and subject to such conditions as to costs or otherwise as may appear to be just, and an appeal shall lie from the exercise of the discretion of the Circuit Judge in granting or refusing any such application.

Provided also that a Circuit Judge may on the application of any party or without any such application, if he thinks fit, change the venue for the trial of any action pending before him from any one place of hearing to any other within his Circuit."

This amendment is a rather lengthy one. It really embraces what might be regarded as four separate amendments, because it refers to four entirely distinct and different things. There is an impression in the minds of some of the Deputies because of the manner in which the amendment appears in print that all of it relates to bankruptcy. That is not so. The amendment, in the first place, is intended to enable bankruptcy jurisdiction to be conferred upon Circuit Courts under the Local Bankruptcy (Ireland) Act of 1888. That means that in certain towns in which Bankruptcy Courts might have been set up under that Act it is intended that the Circuit Courts may have that jurisdiction. In the second place the amendment is intended to provide that the absolute right to a jury for actions for liquidated sums or contracts in the Circuit Courts shall be taken away. That is that very often in cases of that kind it is found in practice that they can be more effectively tried by a Judge without a jury; at the same time the amendment gives a judge ample power to have a jury whenever he thinks a jury would give assistance to him in the proper trial of the case. The third part of the amendment enables actions to be transferred from the Circuit Court to the High Court whenever the High Court appears to be the more appropriate tribunal; and, fourthly, the amendment enables a Circuit Judge to change the venue of any action to any place within his Circuit.

Mr. ALTON: I am very glad to see that the last paragraph covers the point embraced in the amendment which I have put down. I suggest to the Minister that perhaps he might add the last condition that I have put in the amendment which stands in my name—"due regard being had to the convenience of suitors and witnesses" in the event of a change of venue. It may be a direction or a guide to the Judge, and also I think he might add that "no appeal shall lie from the exercise of the discretion of the Judge in this respect."

Mr. DUGGAN: That matter will be considered. As a matter of course, questions of convenience, and so on, are always considered in a change of venue.

Mr. ALTON: I know, but regarding the question of appeal, would it not be advisable to add these words to prevent unnecessary litigation and delay?

Mr. DUGGAN: I would like to consider that.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Amendment by Professor Magennis and Captain Redmond:—

To delete lines 5 to 10, page 12, and to substitute therefor:—

"In all actions heard before a Circuit Court where the amount of the claim exceeds £20, any party to an action shall have the right to have questions of fact tried by a jury of twelve members, with like directions as to law and evidence as applies to cases tried before a Judge and Jury of the High Court; but the provisions of Section 24 hereof shall apply to any such trial before a Circuit Judge and Jury."

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

The lines from 5 to 10 have already been deleted, and this might be taken on as an addition if the Deputy wishes to propose it.

Professor MAGENNIS: All I have to say on this is, that the proposal in my amendment is substantially met in that which has just been passed. The existing practice in the County Court is that in all actions where the claim is not less than £20 and questions of fact are involved, not questions of title to the land merely, a jury is empanelled, but only a jury of six, and the proposal is to have a jury of twelve, then an appeal later from that to the Judge of Assize. We are getting rid altogether of the Judge of Assize for civil matters because, as I read the Bill, Deputy Redmond was wrong in imagining that the Judges of Assize might go round and might be asked to take up Civil cases. If they do go out it will be merely to deal with criminal trials. One of the drawbacks to this trial by a jury of six in the County Court was that when the appeal was heard by the Judge of Assize it was really a rehearing, and the Judge was in no way bound by the finding of that jury. It would be irregular for me, I think, to raise that point now, because it will arise in the interpretation of a later Section. The only thing I would have to say now in connection with amendment 16 is that it opens the way for raising that further question, because if we decided to lay down the doctrine that it was a matter of right for any party to an action to have a Judge trying the case with a jury of twelve, even having granted that power, there would be solid ground upon which to raise a further question as to the effectiveness or otherwise of the verdict arrived at by that jury. But upon second thoughts it seems to me that even with the amendment just passed, we have the standing upon which to raise the further question under the other Section. Consequently I withdraw the amendment with your permission.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment by Mr. Alton:—

In page 12, line 5, to omit the words "Provided that" and to add, after the word "jury," line 10, the words "Provided that in every jury case where the contending parties do not all reside within the limits of the same Circuit as defined by Section 37, the Circuit Judge may, if he think it desirable in the interests of Justice so to do, direct that such jury trial shall not be held in the immediate locality in which either or any of such contending parties shall be resident, or have a place of business or office, but shall be held in such other town or place within such Circuit as the Judge may direct, due regard being had to the convenience of suitors and witnesses, and no appeal shall lie from the exercise of the discretion of the Judge in this respect."

Mr. ALTON: I beg to withdraw that amendment. I am sure the Government will consider the suggestion that I have made.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question: "That Section 48, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Amendment by Capt. Redmond:—

Before Section 49 to insert a new Section as follows:—

"When any action shall be pending in the Circuit Court which might have been commenced in the District Court, any party to such action may, at any time before service of notice of trial therein, apply to the Circuit Court that the action be remitted or transferred to the District Court, and thereupon, in case the Court shall consider that the action is fit to be heard in the Circuit Court, it may retain such action therein, or if it shall not consider the action fit to be heard in the Circuit Court it may remit or transfer such action to the District Court in which the same might have been commenced upon such times in either case and subject to such conditions as to costs or otherwise as may appear just."

The PRESIDENT: That is unnecessary. It has been provided for.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Section 49 put and agreed to.

Section 50 put and agreed to.

SECTION 51.

There shall be transferred to the Circuit Court all jurisdiction which, at the commencement of this Act, was vested in or capable of being exercised by Recorders, County Court Judges, and Chairmen and

[Section 51.]

Courts of Quarter Sessions, or any of the same in Saorstát Eireann (save such jurisdiction of Justices at or of Courts of Quarter Sessions as is hereinafter conferred on or transferred to the District Court) and the provisions of Sections 21 and 22 of this Act shall apply mutatis mutandis to the jurisdiction vested in and transferred to the Circuit Court by this Act.

Prof. THRIFT: I move:—On page 12 to insert after the word “jurisdiction,” line 21, the words “not hereinbefore expressly excepted.”

I am not quite sure about the necessity for this but I think it is necessary. I move it really to get the Government's Law Officers to consider the necessity for inserting the words, and I myself am disposed to think that they are required.

The PRESIDENT: Yes, I will accept that.

Amendment agreed to.

Question: “That Section 51, as amended, stand part of the Bill,” put and agreed to.

SECTION 52.

Provided that the jurisdiction hereinbefore vested in and transferred to the Circuit Court in civil cases shall be exercised by the Circuit Judges severally as follows:—

- (i) In actions relating to Title to Land and Rectification of the Register, by the Judge for the time being assigned to the Circuit where the lands in question are situate, or where are situate the lands out of or in respect of which any incorporeal hereditaments in dispute issue or arise, or where the larger portion of any such lands may be situate.
- (ii) In Equity Cases, by the Judge for the time being assigned to the Circuit where matters of such kind have been heretofore heard by the Courts superseded by the Circuit Court.
- (iii) In Probate Matters and Actions, and Actions for Administration of estates of deceased persons, by the Judge for the time being assigned to the Circuit where the testator or intestate at the time of his death had a fixed place of abode.

- (iv) In lunacy, by the Judge for the time being assigned to the Circuit where the lunatic or alleged lunatic ordinarily resides.
- (v) In all other cases, by the Judge for the time being assigned to the Circuit where the defendant or one of the defendants ordinarily resides or carries on any profession, business or occupation.

Mr. HEWAT: I beg to move:

“In Sub-clause (v.), line 52, to insert after the word ‘where’ the words ‘the plaintiff or’ and at the end of the sub-clause, line 54, to add the words ‘Provided that if the case comes for hearing in the Circuit Court where Plaintiff resides where a bona fide defence can be shewn the Court may transfer the hearing of such a case to what appears to it to be a more convenient venue, having regard to the convenience of witnesses or any other good consideration which may occur to the Court.’”

I think the principle that is embodied in my amendment is also covered by a Government amendment later on. Might I ask for the assurance that it will be dealt with by the Government? The principle that I seek to have embodied in the Bill is in all cases to extend the privilege given to the defendant to the plaintiff in cases where the Judge is clearly of opinion that the case defended is not prejudiced by being heard or dealt with where the plaintiff resides. I think that is obviously a privilege that he is entitled to; for instance, in a case where a claim is for a sum of money against any person in a remote part of the country, the case is quite clear, and I think it would be a hardship on the plaintiff to be asked to go down to the Circuit Court to prove it. If he is allowed to start his case in Dublin, say, and prove it by documentary proof or otherwise, I ask that he shall not be compelled to go to remote districts to prove. If a defendant puts in a case that has substance in it the Court would have power to remit it to the district in which the defendant resides, and there is no objection to that, but where the case could be made clear to the Judge that the applicant has a case where no reasonable defence is put in he should not be compelled to go down to the Circuit Court in the defendant's district to prove his case.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would like to know from those who are capable of dealing with this matter what is the present practice. Is it not right to say that the assumption in such matters of civil liability is that the case must be dealt with rather at the place of business or residence of the defendant? That is the principle which has been hitherto embodied in the law. We know, of course, that in many cases the trial has been centralised, and the principle seems to me to be a good one. When the plaintiff has an action it should be in the area of the defendant, and it is the plaintiff himself should bear the responsibility of suing in the locality in which the defendant lives or has his business. It is rather reversing the procedure. One can imagine, for instance, a business firm in the city having accounts in all parts of the country, and in a wholesale manner taking such action as will mean that all the defendants will have to come to Dublin. I think the other course is much more reasonable, and that to remit should be the exception, that it should be a remission from the local Court to the central Court, and not the other way about. I hope unless there is a very definite case made and much more forcible argument used in favour of this amendment that it will not be accepted.

Major COOPER: This amendment is much the same as one in my name, and perhaps it would meet Deputy Johnson's wish if I explained what actuated the putting down of these amendments. It is true that the existing practice in the County Court is to proceed in the place of residence or business of the defendant, but we are giving these Courts much larger jurisdiction, and giving them power to deal with very much larger sums of money. It is perfectly right, and I concur with it that when you are giving the power to deal with larger sums of money the interests of the business community should be considered. Deputy Johnson suggests it would be inconvenient for defendants to be brought up to Dublin from the country, but it would be equally inconvenient for a business firm to have its books posted to Letterkenny, say, one day, and to Listowel or to somewhere else the next. It is not an insurmountable difficulty; it could be surmounted, no doubt, by an office organisation, but in the case of a wholesale firm with accounts all over the country, and a considerable number of bad debts, this Section is going to give them more difficulty and more trouble than they have had in the past. I think the President has admitted that this Bill is not very popular in the city. I have had representations—I do not know whether Deputy Johnson has had them, too, and he represents the same constituency—from various classes of business people who feel that this is going to handicap them in their business. I would not mind that so much; what I am afraid of is that the result of leaving the provision as it stands in the Section and not adopting the amendment of Deputy Hewat or the one I have on the paper will be to restrict credit, and that in the future the wholesaler will not take the risk of having to send down to cases over the country, but will say "Cash with order," and that would cause a very serious disturbance in the business world. It will not be for the convenience of the retailer; it may be for the convenience of the wholesaler, but generally speaking it will check business and make the running of it less smooth than it had been before. Business has had great difficulties to contend with in the last few years, and I do deprecate any course that is likely to restrict credit and make it more difficult for the man carrying on business than it is at present.

The PRESIDENT: I believe the amendment, if adopted, would establish something which is contrary to the long-established rule in other countries, that the plaintiff must follow the defendant and sue in the defendant's district. If it were to achieve the purpose which has been described by Deputy

[The President.]

Hewat and Deputy Cooper, I take it we might also take into consideration what other reactions might occur. We will take it that I may be on holiday or visiting some remote part of the country and some person, who is displeased with something I do down there, takes an action against me. In that case I would be brought to a district a hundred miles from my base and would have to defend the action there. It is possible that more vexatious litigation might take place than would be compensated for by any advantage derived by the amendment. As I understand it, it is open to a person, if he is dissatisfied with the decision in a certain Court, to go into the High Court. A question then arises as to a change of venue, and I think these questions are usually decided upon the matter of convenience. If that be so, I should say the plaintiff would have no cause for complaint, and should it be likely to happen that dissatisfaction would be found with the juries in any one of these eight Circuit Courts, I am positively certain due consideration will be given to that fact if an application be made for a change of venue, and that the case would subsequently come to the High Court in Dublin. I do think what is the established practice in every country ought not to be changed here. If, even for a period, dissatisfaction should exist with the Circuit Court, we should keep our minds fixed on the fact that if people practise abuses or interfere with the institutions which we set up, then it is brought home to these people that there are alternatives to such a policy, and that justice in the long run will prevail. There will be fair judgments in these Courts, and nobody can complain that the defendant has not as good a right in this country as he has in any other. I do not see that it would be wise, apart from other considerations, to adopt the amendment.

Mr. HEWAT: The real meaning of the amendment is that in case of debt, especially in cases for the recovery of small debts, if the plaintiff has clear documentary proof of the amount being due he ought not to be put to the expense and trouble of going to a distant part of the country. It does not provide that the case should be heard there in the event of a dispute, because where the defendant has a bona fide case he has not to come up at all, and automatically the case would go to the defendant's area. I do not wish to undermine the principle that the defendant has a right to have his own case tried in his own area. I do say that the practice in the past has very often been that where the defendant is not prepared to pay the amount of his debt he has no earthly claim to delay collection, but he makes use of it by putting in a defence with no facts to justify it. In this instance all the defendant has to show is that he has a good defence, and if it is a reasonable one, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, he may be called upon to waive his convenience against that of the defendant. It is really in cases where there is a bogus defence, or no defence, that the defendant should be brought out of his own area.

The PRESIDENT: Has the Deputy read the second paragraph of Amendment 15?

Mr. HEWAT: That is exactly what I referred to when I said it was not very clear. If that is a general provision it fairly well covers the case.

Mr. DUGGAN: It only refers to the first part of that amendment.

Major COOPER: Would it, in a case of that kind, carry High Court costs? That is the real difficulty. If you took a case, normally in the purview of the Circuit Court, to the High Court, you would have to pay very much higher costs.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I wonder does the second paragraph actually meet the case. The essential words appear to me to be "from any one place of hearing to any other within his circuit," whereas the amendment of Deputy Hewat says that the Court may transfer the hearing of such a case to what appears to it to be a more convenient venue. The two phrases I have quoted clearly are not co-incident at all. I think the argument the President put forward against this amendment neglected other important words of the amendment. It says: "The Court may transfer the hearing," and it goes on to say, "having regard to the convenience of witnesses or any other good consideration which may occur to the Court." The force of all his reasoning in the matter is not in the least applicable to this amendment, as the amendment leaves the question of essential justice where the Bill has put it and only allows the venue to be changed when the Court has been justified that good consideration has been shown. I think we may take it that, human nature being what it is, no Circuit Court Judge is going to remove the venue outside his jurisdiction unless very good consideration is shown. The normal dignities, which may sometimes decline to be jealousies, attaching to his office would constrain him to keep it if he could. Therefore, all the argument of the President against the clause remains in spite of the addition of this amendment. The Court has first to be justified, and only when the Court has been justified can the venue be changed. Now, we come to the other point. How far, and within what range, should that change occur? The second paragraph of Section 15 limits it to the circuit. The amendment now before the Dáil does not do so. I think that as the Circuit Court Judge will keep what he can in order not to diminish his authority, the extra addition may, with advantage, be adopted.

Captain REDMOND: I wonder would I be in order in suggesting that Amendment 15 be re-drafted to make it more clear in the first paragraph that several different matters are being dealt with.

Mr. DUGGAN: It is merely a matter of printing. With regard to questions raised by Deputies Major Bryan Cooper and Hewat, it is the intention that the Circuit Courts should have the same jurisdiction as the High Court has. In some cases there the defendant put in an appearance where he had no defence. Notwithstanding that appearance it was open to the plaintiff to apply for judgment on the ground that there was no defence. The Court could then give final judgment. It is the intention that Circuit Courts should have that power.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I think the business community will be very much rejoiced by the President's statement, and therefore I withdraw Amendment 21 on the Order Paper.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I move:

"In line 54 to add at the end of sub-clause (v.) the words:—'save in the case where the plaintiff or one of the plaintiffs ordinarily resides or carries on any business profession or occupation outside the jurisdiction of Saorstát Éireann, in which case it shall be exercised by the Circuit Judge for the City and County of Dublin.'"

This deals with a different issue. I move it because I want to deal with a doctrine laid down yesterday in this Dáil by Deputy Magennis in which he stated he did not want to make it easy for anyone in Manchester to collect debts in Ireland. We look to Universities for enlightenment. That seems to be a doctrine of darkness. A man should be able to collect his debts whether he lives in Massachusetts, Manchester or Mullingar. It is a test of civilisation. I am quite certain that that statement of Deputy Magennis, if it had gone uncorrected, would have done a vast amount of harm. It is known that there is a propaganda against this country, and so far as one individual can, I have tried to meet that propaganda and fight it. I put down this amendment so that it would show that we were prepared to go forward and meet the fears of people doing business outside this country. It has been said that it would be impossible for a North-Irish or British merchant to get decrees in the Irish Courts. I am not enamoured with the provisions of the amendment. What I would prefer would be that if I should withdraw this amendment the Government would consider the inserting of certain words in the Bill to make it clear that anyone could go to the High Court and get a decree. The President warned us against believing all the Attorney-General said in interviews. I had one with him about this, and I think what he said was genuine. It would allay the fears of such people as are concerned and would have more justice done for the country if the clause I suggested were in the Bill.

Professor MAGENNIS: I am very much indebted to Deputy Major Bryan Cooper for bringing me back to the days of infancy, and giving me elementary lessons on elementary matters. I did not require to be told, and I did not expect to be told, that I ought to uphold the credit of the Irish nation at this particular moment, when so-called friends of the Free State and so-called defenders of the Treaty carry on insidious propaganda against its credit. There is scarcely a British newspaper, more particularly a Sunday issue, in which this propaganda is not sedulously cultivated. When I spoke against Deputy Figgis' arguments it was against Deputy Figgis, and not against any proposals as to the machinery for the collection of debts whether the creditor in question lived in Massachusetts or in Mullingar. I protested against legislation being made to facilitate foreigners which was to be withheld from natives, a very different proposition. Now, let us consider Deputy Major Bryan Cooper's amendment. What does he propose? If a merchant in the City of Dublin is owed money by one of the natives of Mullingar, all the inconvenience that he considers it to be must be suffered by the merchant in Dublin, but happily if it were a merchant in Liverpool or Birmingham, thanks to Deputy Cooper, there would be a special clause in this Bill to make things easy for him. I believe in equality being equity. "Many of the critics," said the Attorney-General in that interview from which I quoted to-day, "exercised their criticism because they have not taken the trouble to read and understand the Bill." There is nothing to prevent those cases from being taken in the High Court in Dublin and remitted to some other place. It may be even sent down to the District Justice. If people take the trouble to read the measure they would find one of the earliest things we passed contained that provision. In the amendment we passed half an hour ago the case may be transferred from a Circuit Court to a High Court. If your Manchester merchant over whose woes we are to wail finds it more convenient for his witnesses and his books or for other reasons not to have the case determined in one of these local courts, then he need not choose that venue.

But why are we to introduce a special clause to overload the District Court for the City or County of Dublin merely to facilitate trade outside? There is another question besides this question of our credit. I do plead guilty, even though I have also to confess to the other crime of being a University representative, to the view that I would like to see Irish products bought and sold in Irish shops by Irishmen. That is another reason why, I think, this kind of proposal is not altogether desirable. Furthermore, I know of at least one debt-collecting agency which makes huge sums of money—as I mentioned yesterday and I repeat it to-day, advisedly—by this practice of slipping in a writ, as it is called, on behalf of one of those Cross-Channel firms that are creditors, and again and again men pay up, and pay the heavy costs incurred by the transaction. That is not quite a reasonable thing to advocate. I suggest that when Deputy Major Cooper comes to read the official report of what I said yesterday, he will discover that he spoke in haste, to use a Biblical expression, and he knows the rest of the context.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Deputy Magennis has suggested that one or two of us did not read the Bill. I am afraid that he has not read the amendment paper, because he will see that this amendment of mine is consequential on the amendment immediately before it, and it was necessary to make some provision for cases where a plaintiff resided outside the jurisdiction of the Saorstát. I agree with Deputy Magennis that I would like Irishmen to deal with Irish firms for Irish bread and butter, but you must recollect that there are things you cannot buy in Ireland and you have to go to England for them. In any case, if a man chooses to go to Manchester he ought to pay his debts there.

As regards equality, I agree that people should be treated with equality. It is just as troublesome for a man to come from Belfast or Liverpool to Dublin, as for a Dublin man to go to Mullingar and have his case tried. I do not propose to press the amendment, and I am perfectly willing to withdraw it, having made clear that it is possible to have a case tried in the High Courts.

Prof. MAGENNIS: With regard to amendment 17 yesterday which was down in the names of Deputy Redmond and myself, it was a remitting amendment, allowing any action to be remitted. I drew attention to the fact that the Government amendment tabled on page 6 covered that, and provided for a variety of things. Therefore, I gave evidence yesterday of having read the amendments, and if someone misconceives my position to-day that does not alter the fact.

Mr. DUGGAN: What Deputy Magennis has said more or less covers what I intended to say on this matter, and it was this:—That the plaintiff who resides outside the jurisdiction can originate his proceedings in the High Court, and the High Court then has full power to deal with the matter from the point of view of fixing a suitable venue, having regard to the convenience of all parties. For that reason I do not think that Deputy Cooper is losing anything by withdrawing.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Then I desire to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Sections 52, 53, 54, and 55 put and agreed to.

SECTION 56.

The following matters shall be excluded from the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court:—

Habeas Corpus, Certiorari, Quo Warranto, Prohibition, Information and Mandamus.

Prof. MAGENNIS: I move:

In line 13, to add at the end of the Section the words "and all cases exceeding in jurisdiction the jurisdiction given to the Circuit Court by Sections 48 and 49 of this Act."

This amendment is merely lest some ingenious person should regard this as the only exclusion from the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court. In earlier sections it is positively laid down that the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court shall be so and so, and then this declares that there are excluded from such jurisdiction these matters, and it is merely to make absolutely water-tight and unattackable the position that these words are put in. Some may consider that they are superfluous.

Mr. DUGGAN: I suggest to Deputy Magennis that the amendment is unnecessary, and, apart from that, it would deprive the Circuit Courts of the jurisdiction that is given to them by consent in another clause.

Professor MAGENNIS: That is so. I withdraw my amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Section 56 put and agreed to.

Sections 57 and 58 put and agreed to.

SECTION 59.

Any action in the Circuit Court may be registered as a lis pendens and the judgment in any action for any sum exceeding £20 over and above costs may be registered in the Central Office of the High Court in like manner as actions and judgments of the High Court.

Professor MAGENNIS: I beg to move amendment 54, which reads:—

In line 27, after the words "lis pendens" to insert the words "where similar action in the High Court could at present be so registered."

This is merely to correct a phrase that would otherwise be too wide in its scope. The only action that can be registered as a lis pendens in the High Court is a case affecting land. It might be interpreted here without the qualification of the amendment that any case might be registered so that a man, for example, who wished to sell his land, might be held up by some one registering as a lis pendens, if there was a case of breach of promise against him, and heavy damages were looked forward to.

Mr. DUGGAN: Deputy Magennis has stated the procedure quite accurately, and as far as the Government is concerned there is no objection.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 59, as amended, put and agreed to.

SECTION 60.

The rules to be made under this Part of this Act shall provide for the service of all originating documents or notices both inside and outside the Circuit of the Judge before whom the matter is pending, and for the enforcement of any judgment or order of the Circuit Court by any process, appropriate to the particular case, against the person or property of any person amenable thereto in any part of Saorstát Éireann.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move the amendment in my name. It reads: "In line 32, to insert immediately after the word 'originating' the words 'or other.'"

The Section, as it stands, provides for the service of originating documents, but, in the ordinary course of practice, there will be other documents, the service of which will have to be provided for.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 60, as amended, put and agreed to.

SECTION 61.

Save as in this Act is expressly provided an appeal shall lie from any order of the Circuit Court in civil cases to two judges of the High Court sitting in Dublin. If such two judges differ in opinion the appeal shall be re-heard by such two judges with the addition of a judge of the Supreme Court.

Capt. REDMOND: I beg to an amendment:

"In line 29, to substitute 'three' for 'two,' and in line 40 to delete from the word 'if' to the word 'Court,' line 42, inclusive."

This amendment necessitates a further amendment which I move to the next Section: that is, to delete the whole Section. The object of this amendment is perfectly clear, and that is, instead of having two Judges in the Court of Appeal, in the first instance, with the possibility of calling in a third Judge, in case there is a disagreement, that there should be three Judges in the first instance, thereby obviating the possibility of anything in the nature of a disagreement. I do not think that any words of mine will be needed to recommend this proposed change to the Committee because the system as proposed in the Bill is only a matter of redundancy and duplication of hearing. It strikes me that it will be far simpler to have the original Court of Appeal consist of three Judges. I do not care very much whether they be two High Court Judges and one Judge of the Supreme Court, or whether they are three High Court Judges. But it seems far more sensible to have the original Court of Appeal consist of three Judges in the first instance than have it consist of two Judges with the possibility of there being disagreement, and then the necessity of calling in a third Judge and having another re-hearing on appeal. I beg to move my amendment.

Professor MAGENNIS: I would like to support the amendment for fear that the next amendment for which I am responsible might meet the happy dispatch. What Deputy Redmond has pointed out is the cardinal defect in this arrangement. You can suppose a case argued at great length by eminent Counsel before the Circuit Judge. The case is then heard again on appeal and argued again before two Judges. These Judges disagree, and Counsel and the case will be re-heard again. Notice what happens: You will have two final Courts. Suppose the law is laid down on the decision on appeal then the Circuit Court Judge is bound by it, because the thing is final. But the very same point of law may arise, independently in a High Court case, and may then be brought to the Supreme Court of Appeal, and the Supreme Court, as a Court of Appeal, may decide quite otherwise, and then that is the law; but when the same point arises again with the unfortunate Circuit Judge he is bound by the decision in the Appeal taken from him on the previous occasion, notwithstanding the contrary decision of the Court of Appeal, so it does not seem as if the old idea expressed in rhyme which I remember well, by junior barristers, is to have effect, that, namely, "When the Court is made up of three you have a clear majoritee." It is easier to get a decision straight away by a majority of two against one, where there are three judges, and it saves all the trouble and involves the saving of other things as well, so I think it would be a very decided improvement to let the Appeal from the Circuit Court come before three Judges.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. Blythe): This provision is in accordance with the report of the Committee. The system of appeal to two Judges, I understand, works well in England and elsewhere. However, the matter is one we are disposed to consider further with a view to seeing if we could come to an arrangement that would meet with general acceptance. I would not like to accept the amendment as it stands, because I do not think we quite agree with it, but we might be able to make some change to meet the Deputy if the amendment were withdrawn now and time is given to consider the matter further.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE (at this stage) resumed the Chair.

Captain REDMOND: I am very much obliged to the Minister for Finance for what he has said. What I gather is that he is not now prepared to accept, nor to absolutely reject, the substance of my amendment. I would, therefore, like to impress upon him, and those responsible for the Bill, the necessity for considering the matter which he has so kindly promised to do, and I will, therefore, withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Professor MAGENNIS: The result of that is that I also ask leave to withdraw my amendment, No. 27, which is: Line 41, after the word "opinion," to insert the words "the decision of the Court below shall be affirmed to either party on appeal to the Supreme Court against such a decision."

Vol. 5.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendments 26 and 27 are by leave withdrawn.

Question "That Section 61 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Section 62 ("Decision on Appeal final") put and agreed to.

SECTION 63.

Such appeal shall be grounded on the report of an official stenographer, but the Court which hears such appeal may if it think fit admit fresh evidence, either oral or on affidavit, and may refer any matter arising on the report of the official stenographer to the Circuit Judge for his observations thereon and may either order a new trial or enter such judgment, in the case, as to the Court shall seem fit.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I beg to move my amendment to delete this Section. The amendment is directed against this Section, which provides that appeals in the Circuit Court shall be taken on the report of an official stenographer. I gather that no evidence shall be taken in such an appeal except it be fresh evidence. There are precedents for this Section in the English Court of Appeal, but I do not think they are very satisfactory. Even in these cases I believe it is usual for the Judge's notes to be put in for consideration by the Court of Appeal. These notes are made by a trained lawyer and ought to give every aspect of the law. Take one specific instance. The notes taken by a County Court Judge in England in cases argued on appeal come before the House of Lords, and it not infrequently happens that the House of Lords sends these notes back for further explanation. In the event of an appeal going to the High Court I cannot help thinking that it is a mistake to do away with the bringing up of witnesses. I am sure the Government's desire was to save expense to the litigants, but it must be remembered that the litigants will have to pay for the transcript of the shorthand notes, which may cost anything from £5 to £10. That sum, in many instances, would pay the expense of bringing witnesses to Dublin for the hearing of the appeal, and I think that would be more satisfactory than to have the appeal decided solely on the official stenographer's report.

Then there is the question of accuracy. I do not know if the Government fully realises that as regards these shorthand notes which are solely to be relied on at the hearing of the appeal, it is a matter of vital importance to the parties concerned that they should be full and accurate. The Minister for Home Affairs was good enough to tell me some days ago that it was proposed to employ a staff of eight official stenographers. That is to say, there would be one for each Circuit Court. Everyone knows that if a stenographer has to sit in Court reporting a case that lasts for six hours, that his accuracy is bound to suffer. Further, when he has his notes taken down he has got to transcribe them, and that will occupy twice as long, at least, as the original notetaking. I am sure that more than eight stenographers would be needed for this work, and that of course would mean that the cost would be higher than the sum estimated. If the report furnished by the official stenographer is to be the only evidence considered in the Court of Appeal you must get highly expert men, and not merely highly expert men, but absolutely incorruptible men. You will have to pay them on such a scale that there will be no danger of corrupting these men. There is a story told of the late Lord Morris, who was a Lord Justice of Appeal. A neighbour of his in the Claddagh came to him and said, "My Lord, I have a law case, and what am I to do about it?" His lordship told him to go to a solicitor, who would charge him two guineas, and that the solicitor would brief a barrister for a fee of three guineas to plead the case in court. Sometime later Lord Morris met his neighbour and said to him, "Well, Tom, how did the case go?" The man replied that all the witnesses in the case were Irish speakers, and for that reason he did not brief a barrister, but, he said, "I briefed the interpreter and that only cost me £2, but I won my case."

I am afraid that if this evidence be the only evidence in the Court of Appeal, we shall have to try to brief the stenographer. It will be very desirable to pay the stenographer very well. The estimate given by the Minister allowed about £500 per year each, but travelling expenses have to come out of that, and they will have to travel all over the circuit. The District Justice is allowed £200 yearly for his travelling expenses. The expenses of the stenographer will be just as much, and I do not think that a £300 a year man will be a man who will fairly exercise such a tremendous responsibility.

My second reason for wishing this provision deleted is that though I am not a barrister I have had, under the rather anomalous conditions that prevailed in the past, some experience in the administration of justice—at least I hope it was justice. I found that one learned far more from the demeanour of the witness, from the manner in which he answered the questions put to him in examination and cross-examination, from his slowness or from his glibness, as to what the real truth was than one would from reading his words, even though taken down with the utmost accuracy and correctness. I do not think that this Section 63 is part of the essential fabric of the Bill. Its deletion would not ruin the Bill irreparably, and I do beg the Government, although I know they attach importance to it, as the President mentioned it in his Second Reading speech, to take this very carefully into consideration, because it is my deep and earnest conviction that by maintaining it you may sometimes cause a serious miscarriage of justice.

Mr. W. HEWAT: On this matter I have to oppose the amendment. Deputy Major Cooper referred to the fact that in England the judge's notes have been found unsatisfactory on some occasions. I think the general impression on the part of the Committee was that they were very unreliable. At all events, the main central factor was that the County Court was, by reason of a re-hearing taking place on an appeal, turned into more or less of a farce. In other words, the evidence that would be given at the County Court was exploited for the purpose of an appeal. I think it is very important that in this Bill that system should not be perpetuated. The idea is that there will be at the Circuit Court a real genuine hearing and a real genuine decision.

In the absence of a re-hearing by the Court of Appeal, it is obviously desirable and important that the Appeal Court should have, as far as that can be got, a verbatim report of the proceedings. The only way to do that is by having the stenographer present to take down the actual verbatim evidence. Surely a judge with verbatim evidence before him of a case which comes on on appeal, will very easily be able to pick out the weakness and strength of the different sides, and in the light of the decision by the Circuit Court Judge, all he will have to examine really is, on the evidence, was the Circuit Court Judge right in his decision.

Deputy Major Cooper refers to the cost. Obviously it will amount to a considerable sum of money, but will it cost more than the almost uniform appeals taken from the County Court Judge? I venture to think not. I venture to think that you will have a regular system. When you go into the question of whether a stenographer is going to be entirely independent and honest in his reports, we must assume in the future, as we have no right to assume otherwise in the past, that people who are appointed in connection with the Courts of Justice and by the Government in every Department, will not have a lower standard of honesty than the people of the country as a whole. To assume that a stenographer is going to be got at by litigants is to assume that your whole judicial system is in such a weak state that any, or every, part of it is liable to pervert the cause of justice for particular ends. Well, I am not going to assume that. I may not have as high hopes of the future as others, but I certainly have before my mind in the new order of things we have entered upon the hope that we will march forward and not backward. I do not think the Deputy has any reason to think that the Government in its administration of the country is going for one moment to tolerate that justice shall be brought into such a state of disrepute that we cannot rely even on a stenographer to be above anything in the nature of bribery.

The PRESIDENT: As it is getting close to 4 p.m., I move to report progress. There is no possible chance of finishing the discussion this evening, so it will have to be left over to the next sitting.

Agreed.

THE DAIL RESUMES.

Progress reported. The Committee ordered to sit again on the first day that the Dáil meets.

THE ADJOURNMENT.

The PRESIDENT: I move the adjournment until Wednesday fortnight at 3 o'clock.

The Dáil adjourned at 3.56 p.m.

DÁIL ÉIREANN. DÉ CEADAIOIN, 31adh DEIRE FOGHMHAIR, 1923.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS. [ORAL ANSWERS.]

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN asked the President whether his attention had been drawn to the report of the Imperial Conference proceedings, as published in the Irish Press on the 13th inst., and attributing to the Minister for Education the following statement:—

“If the League of Nations required a certain duty to be done, a certain amount of pressure, in whatever form desired, to be applied, I am perfectly certain that the nation for which I sit here would not be behind in doing that duty.”

Whether this declaration was in substance correct, and if so does it express the sentiments of the Government.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. K. O'Higgins) (for the President): The League of Nations is charged with the maintenance of world-peace so far as this laudable object can be attained by the influences at its disposal. In any efforts which may be made to that end, we will not fail to afford every assistance within our power and competence. This as I understand it, is the meaning of the words quoted. It must at the same time be remembered that the position of the Saorstát under Article 49 of the Constitution has been expressly preserved on its admission to the League of Nations.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: Arising out of the reply, will the Minister state whether the armed forces of Saorstát Éireann will be exploited in adventures where the material interests of the nation are not concerned?

Mr. KEVIN O'HIGGINS: Will the Deputy read Article 49 of the Constitution?

DUBLIN CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the President what neighbouring counties are to be included in the Central Criminal Court for Dublin; whether all the trials for the Central Criminal Court are to take place in Dublin; whether the City of Dublin jurors alone are to try all the cases to be dealt with by such Court, or if jurors from the counties interested are to be brought to Dublin for the purpose of dealing with cases from their respective counties, and, if so, whether they will be paid travelling and other expenses incurred.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The Deputy will have an opportunity of raising this matter during the discussion on the Bill at present before the Dáil.

Mr. ALFRED BYRNE: In view of the fact that I have given notice of the question, I do not think that the answer of the Minister is a good and sufficient answer to the question.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is not a supplementary question.

Mr. ALFRED BYRNE: Well, he has not given an answer to my question.

MEATH CO. COUNCIL EMPLOYEES' INSURANCE.

Mr. DAVID HALL asked the Minister for Finance if he is aware that the Meath County Council refused to stamp the National Health Insurance Cards of their employees, as from the 28th April, 1921, to the 3rd July, 1922, and that, as a result of such action on the part of the Meath County Council, a large number of the Council's employees were denied sickness and maternity benefit; whether a test case by the Insurance Commissioners against the Council was lost, and, if so, whether, in view of this decision, County Councils are obliged by law to stamp Insurance cards; whether it is intended to take further proceedings against the Meath County Council and compel them to comply with the provisions of the National Health Insurance Acts, 1911 to 1923.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. E. Blythe): It is a fact that the Meath County Council refused to stamp the National Health Insurance Cards of their employees from 28th April, 1921, to 3rd July, 1922, but the Council had very few insurable employees between April and October, 1921.

The Commission's attention was called to certain cases in which employees were deprived of benefit owing to the Council's omission to stamp their cards.

The Commission instituted prosecutions in seven test cases which were heard on the 13th June, 1923, before the District Court, Navan, and were dismissed on the ground that under Section 51 (7) of the Local Government (Ireland) Act, 1898, proceedings ought to have been instituted within 6 months of the date of the offence. There is no right of appeal from a dismissal of such proceedings. Proceedings could not have been taken earlier, as no competent Summary Courts had been functioning in County Meath for some time. County Councils are obliged by law to stamp insurance cards, and the Meath County Council has complied with the law in this respect since June, 1922. It is not intended to take further proceedings against this Council.

DOUBLE INCOME TAX.

Mr. JOHN GOOD asked the Minister for Finance whether, in view of the trouble and expense arising from the deduction of double Income Tax from dividends on investments in Great Britain, he will have a full enquiry made into the whole matter and other arrangements substituted.

Mr. BLYTHE: (1) As this question appears to be very much in the public mind at present, I propose to deal with it at some length.

(2) Taxation at the source is fundamental in the British Income Tax system, and as we have taken over the British Income Tax code it is also fundamental in ours. Even if we undertook the tremendous task of devising a new Income Tax system of our own it would not touch the difficulty which the Deputy has in mind, since British Income Tax would still be deducted from dividends on investments in Great Britain held by Saorstát Eireann residents. The Income Tax systems of Great Britain and of the Saorstát are, however, now quite independent of each other, and Saorstát residents have to realise that as long as they hold British investments there must be a certain amount of inconvenience arising from the fact that both Governments have a claim to Income Tax on the dividends. The Saorstát Government must collect from Saorstát residents the Income Tax to which they are liable by law, and tax deducted from Saorstát residents by the British Government does not reach the Saorstát Exchequer any more than French Income Tax or Australian Income Tax though many taxpayers seem to think it does or ought to.

(3) On the other hand, the question of minimising as far as possible the inconvenience to taxpayers consequent on the facts I have referred to has been receiving the continuous attention of the Revenue Commissioners for the Saorstát.

(4) In the first place an arrangement was effected with the British Government last April, the result of which is, broadly, that, after the necessary adjustments have been made, the total tax paid to both the British Government and the Saorstát Government will not exceed the tax which a Saorstát resident would have borne if there had been no deduction of British tax. In other words, there is normally in the long run complete relief from double taxation by the two Governments.

(5) In the second place, a special arrangement was effected with the British Government under which dividends from certain British Government securities, such as Consols, Local Loans, etc., where there is an ultimate liability to both British and Saorstát tax in respect of dividends accruing to beneficial owners resident in the Saorstát, should have tax deducted at [Mr. Blythe.] the rate of 2s. 3d. British and 2s. 9d. Saorstát, instead of at the standard rates. There is an exception in the case of Stocks inscribed on the Bank of England register, as the Bank of England found it inconvenient to apply this arrangement in such cases. Stockholders can easily get the benefit of the arrangement, however, by transferring to the Bank of Ireland register.

(6) Finally we took power in the Finance Act to enable the Revenue Commissioners to relieve the Saorstát banks of the legal liability to deduct Saorstát tax on British industrial dividends which had already been subjected to British tax at the full standard rate, subject to certain necessary conditions to secure the ultimate payment of the appropriate rate of Saorstát tax by direct assessment on the taxpayer. The arrangement is applied only where the taxpayer desires it, and the effect of it in most cases is that, instead of suffering any double deduction of tax, the taxpayer pays direct the amount of duty due from him to the Saorstát Government after allowance of all appropriate deductions and reliefs. In most cases he is saved the necessity of making a repayment claim for Saorstát tax and is obliged to make only one repayment claim in respect of British tax as before.

(7) There are two suggestions which are constantly being urged on us:—

(1) That as regards British Industrial dividends payable to Saorstát Eireann residents we should simply collect 6d. in the £ here, in addition to the 4/6 British tax deducted in Great Britain, and have a periodical settlement with the British Government by which one-half of the British tax should be paid over to us, so that we should receive 2/9 in the £ and the British revenue 2/3 in the £.

(2) That all repayment claims made by residents in the Saorstát, whether in respect of British tax or Saorstát tax, should be dealt with by the Revenue Commissioners here and that they should obtain from the British Revenue authorities periodically a refund of British tax repaid to claimants.

(8) Suggestions for both these arrangements were made to and discussed with the British Revenue authorities as far back as last March. The British authorities, however, considered that the difficulties on their side were insuperable, and, since it is obvious that such arrangements could only be effected with their concurrence, we had no option but to drop the schemes. I do not wish for a moment to be understood as reflecting in any way on the attitude taken up by the British Revenue authorities. They have in general shown themselves most anxious to be helpful, but the angle from which they are obliged to approach such questions is not necessarily the same as ours, and some things may give rise to serious difficulties on their side which would involve little or no difficulty to us. On the other hand, as it seems to be very widely assumed that the failure to effect the arrangements to which I am referring is due wholly to reluctance on our part, I think it desirable that the facts should be stated.

(9) It should be clear, therefore, that we have taken every possible step to minimise the inconvenience to taxpayers arising from the liability to Income Tax in both countries of dividends received by Saorstát residents from British investments, and that, as far as it lay in our own power, we have left nothing undone in this direction.

(10) For these reasons I am satisfied that no good purpose would be served by instituting the inquiry suggested by the Deputy.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Arising out of that answer and the statement that in the long run the taxpayer does not suffer, is the Minister aware that the run is a very long one at present, and will he take steps to expedite it as much as possible?

Mr. BLYTHE: We have done all we can, and we will do anything further that can be done. We are nearly as anxious as the people concerned to expedite matters.

ASSISTANCE FOR PRIVATE BUILDERS.

Mr. T. O'MAHONY asked the Minister for Finance whether, in considering the advisability of assisting private builders—either by grants, favourable loan terms, or local rates relief—in the erection of approved types of houses, the opinions and advice of representatives of the Trade, selected by the Dublin and South of Ireland Master Builders' Association, will be ascertained; whether an early decision in the matter may be expected.

Mr. BLYTHE: If the occasion should arise advice in this matter will be sought from any quarter likely to be of assistance.

CO. KILDARE SHOPKEEPER'S LOSSES—QUESTION OF COMPENSATION.

SEOIRSE DE BHULBH asked the Minister for Finance whether it would be possible to advance Edward Grace, a shopkeeper in Ballymore Eustace, Co. Kildare, some of the £500 claimed by him for damage and loss sustained during the movements of the Irregulars in the Wicklow-Kildare area, between June 30th, 1922, when a motor lorry was taken from him at Brittas, Co. Kildare, and various dates in July and September, 1922, when many articles of food and provisions were taken from his shop in Ballymore Eustace.

Mr. BLYTHE: Various applications for compensation from Mr. Grace are at present under consideration, but pending the hearing and substantiation of these claims in Court, I regret that an advance cannot be authorised. Every effort is being made to expedite the hearing of these and other claims under the Damage to Property Acts.

THE GÁRDA SÍOCHALA AND THE R.I.C.

RISTEARD MAC LIAM asked the Minister for Home Affairs if he will issue a statement showing:—

(a) The strength of the Gárda Síochána.

(b) The salaries of the officers and men, terms of employment, pension rights, etc.

(c) The strength of the old R.I.C. in the area now known as Saorstát Éireann, in 1914.

(d) The salaries of the R.I.C. officers and men, terms of employment, pension rights, etc., in 1914.

Mr. K. O'HIGGINS: The strength of the Gárda Síochána on the 27th October, 1923, was:—

1 Commissioner,
1 Deputy Commissioner,
1 Assistant Commissioner,
1 Surgeon,
16 Chief Superintendents,
28 Superintendents,
69 Inspectors,
814 Sergeants,
3824 Guards. — Total, 4755.

In addition, there are 28 Cadets in training.

The rates of pay at present in operation are:—

Commissioner—£1,300 per annum.

Deputy Commissioner — £1,000 per annum.

Assistant Commissioner — £900 per annum.

Surgeon—£700 per annum.

Chief Superintendents—£650 — 25 — £800 per annum.

Superintendents—£400—20—£600 per annum.

Inspectors—£310—10—£360 per annum.

Sergeants—£5 per week, with annual increments of 2/- per week to £5 12s. 0d.

Guards—£3 10s. 0d. per week, with annual increments of 2/- per week to £4 10s. 0d. per week.

Cadets are receiving pay at the rate of £5 per week.

The foregoing rates are, in all cases, subject to a deduction of 2½ per cent. as a contribution towards pension.

These rates were authorised in April, 1922, as a temporary arrangement. Prior to the passing of the Gárda Síochána (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1923, all appointments to the Force were on a temporary basis. Under the provisions of Sections 4 and 5 of that Act, the powers of appointment and dismissal are vested, as to officers, in the Executive Council, and, as to Sergeants and Guards, in the Commissioner. Section 9 of that Act conferred on the Minister for Home Affairs, with the sanction of the Minister for Finance, the power of making a Pension Order for the Force. Such Order, before coming into operation, would require to be laid before each House of the Oireachtas and approved by resolution of Dáil Eireann. The making of a Pension Order is being deferred pending the passing of permanent legislation for the regulation of the Force. It is proposed to introduce a Bill for this purpose at an early date.

As none of the R.I.C. records were transferred to the Irish Government, it is not possible to furnish strictly accurate figures showing the strength of that Force in 1914. The following figures may, however, be taken as an approximately accurate estimate of strength on the 1st January, 1914, exclusive of those stationed in the Six North-East Counties, viz.:—

- 1 Inspector General,
- 1 Deputy Inspector General,
- 2 Assistant Inspectors General,
- 1 Commandant of Depot,
- 1 Barrack Master,
- 1 Surgeon,
- 30 County Inspectors,
- 163 District Inspectors,
- 179 Head Constables,
- 1587 Sergeants and Acting Sergeants,
- 5893 Constables.

Total, 7859

The rates of pay for the various ranks in 1914 were:—

Inspector General—£1,500 p.a., rising to £1,800 p.a. after 5 years.

Deputy Inspector General—£1,000 p.a., rising to £1,200 p.a. after 5 years.

Assistant Inspector-General—£700—25—£800 per annum.

Commandant of Depot—£600 p.a.

Surgeon—£400 p.a.

County Inspectors — £350 — 20 — £450 per annum.

District Inspectors—£135 per annum, rising to £300 p.a. (In addition, good service pay varying from £12 to £50 p.a. was paid to a limited number of County and District Inspectors.)

Head Constables—£109 4s. 0d. to £119 12s. 0d. per annum.

Sergeants—£91 to £96 4s. 0d. per an.
Acting Sergeants—£85 16s. 0d. per annum.

Constables with more than 6 months' service—£59 16s. 0d. to £80 12s. 0d. per annum.

Constables under 6 months service—£52 per annum.

The rates of pay were increased in 1916, and again in 1918, and finally in 1919. Rates based on the rates prescribed by the Desborough Committee in England were authorised for the R.I.C.

The grant of pensions to members of the R.I.C. was governed by a number of statutes, the more important of which, in 1914, were the Constabulary and Police (Ireland) Act, 1883, and the Constabulary (Ireland) Act, 1908.

The pension terms were considerably improved by the R.I.C. Pensions Order, 1922.

Mr. WILSON: Will the Minister give me the bulk sum of both, and the totals so that I could make a comparison of the totals for (b) and the total for (d)?

Mr. KEVIN O'HIGGINS: I have the individual items set out here, the pay for each rank, both in the case of the Civic Guard and of the R.I.C., but I have not made up the tot, and I am not in a position at the moment to give the tot to the Deputy, but the answer sets out the matter in full, and that will be circulated to the Press and given to Deputies.

REPORTED OUTRAGES IN WATERFORD.

SEAN BUTLER asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether he is aware of numerous cases of reported outrages during curfew hours upon the persons and property of the members of the Irish Transport and General Workers' Union in the area of the Waterford farm labour dispute, including the burning, about August 20th, of the furniture of J. Meyler, Secretary to the Knocklong Branch of the I.T.G.W.U., and the assaulting of J. Meyler and John O'Neill, and, if so, whether any arrests have been made in connection with those outrages, and to ask whether any steps have been taken to meet this form of crime.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Full inquiry has been made into the outrages committed during the Waterford farm dispute, upon the person and property of the members of the Irish Transport and General Workers' Union named in the question. These outrages were committed during curfew hours, and only the persons concerned could be in a position to supply details. Except in the case of the raids on the houses of Bridget Power, M. Ryan and T. Hardy, the outrages were not reported to the Garda Síochána. In no case was the injured party able to give information which would lead to the identification of the raiders. Every possible step has been taken to apprehend the guilty parties in these outrages, as well as in the much more numerous outrages on the persons and property of farmers; but it has up to the present been found impossible to obtain the necessary evidence on which they could be traced and brought to justice.

LEASING ATHLONE LANDS (QUESTION OF RE-STARTING SAW MILLS).

TOMAS MAC EOIN asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce whether he will approach the Commissioners of Public Works, with a view to securing favourable consideration of a request for the leasing of certain lands held by the Commissioners, in connection with the canal at Athlone, and at present rented by Messrs. Wilson & Co., for the purpose of re-starting a saw mills, and providing much needed employment in the locality.

MINISTER for INDUSTRY and COMMERCE (Mr. J. McGrath): I understand that negotiations are proceeding on this matter between the Commissioners of Public Works and the party which has made the request for a lease, and that the Commissioners are awaiting a reply to proposals submitted by them on the 26th inst.

PENSION TO SOLDIER'S FAMILY.

SEOIRSE DE BHULBH asked the Minister for Defence whether he will consider the claim to a pension of the widow and family of five, the eldest of whom is not more than six years of age, of the late Private Christopher Treacy, No. 48470, 2 Caragh Road, Naas; whether he is aware that this soldier contracted the malady from which he died whilst on active service with the Army on the Wicklow Hills; that this has been certified by civil and military medical officers, and that Treacy died on September 29th, 1923.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): The case of the late Private Treacy is not one which comes within the terms of the Army Pensions Act, 1923. It should be stated that prior to his discharge a Medical Board certified that his disability was not due to service in the Army. It appears that his malady was one of long standing.

Mr. Woulfe: Would I be in order in stating—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No, the Deputy cannot make a statement.

TREATMENT OF PRISONERS.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware of the repeated statements being made with reference to the ill-treatment of Alderman Charles Murphy and many other untried prisoners now in custody; if he will cause enquiries to be made into the allegations.

General MULCAHY: I have seen statements made in July last alleging ill-treatment of Charles Murphy and others, based on disciplinary action taken against them, because of their participation in an attempt to escape from Hare Park Camp in the previous April. The allegations were duly enquired into. The circumstances were as follows:—

A number of prisoners escaped through a tunnel from Tintown No. 1 Camp on the 24th April last, and subsequently a number of tunnels similarly constructed were discovered in Tintown No. 2, and Hare Park Camps. It was necessary for the Military Governor of Tintown No. 2 to ascertain the names of the men who escaped, and in his efforts to do so he met with considerable opposition from the prisoners. That this opposition was the result of orders issued by the prisoners' leaders was proved conclusively by a document found on one of the prisoners, containing instructions as follows:—

[General Mulcahy.]

- " 1. The action we are taking to passive resistance.
- " 2. We are to ignore as far as possible every order given by the Free Staters.
- " 3. An absolute refusal to produce a man for the Free State.
- " 4. Obstruction of hut during inspection.
- " 5. Count to be rendered as difficult as possible.
- " 6. Hut O/C of any officer to refuse to order men to stand to their beds, when asked by Free Staters.
- " 7. Hut Council to meet and discuss plans."

In order effectively to prevent any other such escape by tunnel, orders were issued that steps should be taken to make the prisoners in the camps at the Curragh dig trenches around each camp. The prisoners' leaders were removed from the camps before the prisoners were made to commence this work, and a number of those leaders were transferred to the military prison at the Curragh Camp. The statements referred to allege ill-treatment here. The following report, dated 4th August, 1923, is the result of an enquiry into such allegations. The report reads:—

"The prisoners named were brought to military prison, Curragh Camp, at about 12 noon on the 24th April, 1923, and dinner was served out at 1 p.m., and about 5 p.m. tea, bread and butter was served out to each prisoner; 3 blankets, 3 bed boards, and 2 trestles were given to each prisoner. As the prisoners were considered dangerous they were handcuffed during the night. It is not true that any of them had to sleep on the bare floor.

"The rations each prisoner received was the soldier's ordinary rations. The rule in the military prison was that all blankets would be removed from cells after breakfast, and each cell washed out, as it was considered to be necessary for their own benefit to keep their cells clean. This the prisoners refused to do although other political prisoners in the military prison had done so. There were several other prisoners, military and political, in the detention barracks at the time, and it was necessary to punish the men in question for the sake of discipline, and they were handcuffed in front for refusing to carry out Prison Rules.

"The statement that no knives, forks or spoons were served out is altogether wrong, as each prisoner was supplied with a knife, fork, spoon, mug and plate.

"The statement that eight of them were handcuffed to racks projecting from the wall is a gross falsehood; they were punished in no other way except by being handcuffed in front; the handcuffs were taken off at every meal. Bed boards and trestles were left in the cells all day and the prisoners could sit down or stand up as they wished."

I am also aware of many allegations made from time to time alleging ill-treatment of other prisoners. This is, however, merely portion of a general campaign of propaganda. A fruitful source of stories of such ill-treatment is found in necessary disciplinary action taken by the Prison Authorities often in very difficult circumstances for the purposes of:

- (1) Securely keeping prisoners in custody; and
- (2) Securing individual prisoners from aggression and intimidation by organised groups among the prisoners.

I think it well to read the following report on some recent happenings in Mountjoy in order that the Deputy may understand what difficulties, the deliberate creation of the prisoners themselves, have from time to time to be met by the Military Authorities in charge:—

"The political prisoners in Mountjoy have gradually tried to build up a military organisation. A prisoner 'military policeman,' wearing an armlet, used to stand at the entrance to each wing and prevent free intercourse between individual prisoners and the Governor's staff. All prisoners' letters passed through their hands for censorship by the prisoners' leaders. As a result, it was extremely difficult for those prisoners who wished to sign the Form to get in touch with the Military Governor. They were caught and held in the vice of Irregular organisation. To meet this, the line Officers were instructed themselves to bring the prisoners' letters into the wing, to call out the prisoners' names, and to hand the letters direct to each individual. They were to collect letters in the same way only from individual prisoners. The prisoners' leaders answered this by preventing the rank and file from collecting or handing in their letters.

"On Tuesday, 11th September, a prisoner escaped from the exercise ground over the outer wall. It was necessary to find out as soon as possible who it was. The prisoners' leaders used the complete freedom of movement in the wings and exercise grounds to make this practically impossible—only a small proportion of them were identified.

"It was found to be absolutely necessary to curtail and control their movements. Sufficient cells were repaired in the 'A' Wing to lock up the prisoners there on Wednesday, 12th, letting them out at stated intervals for exercise, meals, fatigues, etc. A day later sufficient doors in 'C' Wing were fitted with bolts and padlocks to accommodate those prisoners already in 'C' Wing.

"The prisoners answered this by a general mutiny. An Officer of the Governor's staff was later informed by a prisoner that this mutiny had been in preparation for three days beforehand.

"There are certain vital essentials of control without which the safe custody of prisoners in a gaol cannot possibly be guaranteed. Every individual prisoner or group of prisoners must be prepared to enter or leave his cell on the orders of the Military Governor; also to enter the exercise ground from the wing or the wing from the exercise ground. In addition to these two points open military training and drill cannot be permitted—otherwise imprisonment becomes a farce.

"On the morning of Thursday, 13th September, while the Military Governor and another officer were in the central 'circle' joining the wings, about 200 prisoners in 'B' Wing formed up and began to carry out open Company drill. This was a challenge of a flagrant and deliberate kind. It was impossible to ignore it. The Military Governor at once entered the wing with about eight police, armed with batons, so as to avoid, if possible, the necessity of firing and causing bloodshed. The prisoners were ordered out of the wing but refused to move. The few military police tried to force them out, but could not cope with the numbers, and, as iron missiles were being pelted down from above, the police were withdrawn. Immediately afterwards, the prisoners in 'C' Wing, on a signal, began to smash the doors of their cells, and in both wings there was an outbreak of general destruction.

"The Military Governor at once obtained permission from the proper Department to call in the military. Reinforcements of troops and police took up the operation of clearing 'B' and 'C' Wings. The prisoners in these wings continued the destruction and faced the troops in a very hostile and threatening way. A machine-gun was mounted and soldiers were posted to cover each side of the Wing to prevent iron bars, etc., being thrown from above. The prisoners were ordered to enter their cells, but refused until a couple of warning shots had been fired. Then they were ordered out to the Exercise Grounds cell by cell, but refused to leave. An attempt was made to drive them out with the hose, which the military brought into play, but it was not very successful, owing to the bad pressure of water. Eventually men had to be sent into the cells to drag the prisoners out, one by one. A good many fought desperately, others walked quietly until within the last few yards when in sight of their friends outside, when they began to struggle for appearance sake. Any prisoner who complained of the slightest illness was left untouched in his cell. The same process was then repeated in 'C' Wing. This was completed by about 5.30 p.m., when [General Mulcahy.] the prisoners' dinner was put out to them in the Exercise Ground. About 6.30 p.m. they were allowed in again for tea, and remained in again for the night. The next morning, Friday, 14th September, "A" Wing, for the first time, joined in with "B" and "C" Wings, and all three refused to go out. It was noticed that a number of the rank and file, particularly in "A" Wing, would willingly have obeyed, but were too overawed by their leaders. This day, while "B" Wing was being cleared, "C" Wing prisoners brought as much Government property (i.e., tables, stools, trays, etc.) as they had time to collect, into their Exercise Grounds and there burnt it. By the time these three Wings were cleared, evening was approaching. Work was at once started clearing the 300 cells of iron bars and possible missiles; and also all movable Government property which had escaped destruction. It was impossible to nearly finish the work that night, especially as there were very few police available. As it was a very fine, star-light night, and the prisoners had provided themselves with large coal fires, it was decided to keep them out for the night until the Wings were properly cleared. Before this decision was finally come to, and just after dark, the prisoners destroyed the railings, stone work, and some other valuable Government property in "B" and "C" Exercise Grounds. Searchlights were got shortly after and the destruction was stopped. The prisoners were still maintaining an extremely aggressive attitude, and it would have been much too dangerous to attempt to clear the Wings while they were in occupation. The prisoners were informed that any one feeling ill would be at once admitted and attended by the doctor. A few took advantage of this, but every case was only a slight affair. Tea and breakfast was brought to the prisoners outside. The work of clearing the Wings was completed by the next afternoon. Saturday, 15th September. The prisoners were then admitted, the gas and hot water heating turned on, fresh tea got, and everything done to avoid any possible chance of serious injury. The doctor reported only a few colds and coughs. The prisoners in "B" and "C" Wings were then kept in on Saturday night until Tuesday morning, while work was carried on at high pressure by the Engineers, repairing the wrecked Exercise Grounds. On Monday (17th), "A" Wing was put out, the hose being used on some of the most aggressive leaders. About 35 men who stated their willingness to obey the Military Governor were left in the Wing. The remainder were brought to "C" Wing about two hours later. On Tuesday (18th), in the morning, "B" and "C" Exercise Grounds were sufficiently repaired to be safe to hold prisoners. The two Wings were accordingly cleared—except in the case of some 12 ringleaders all resistance was now over. Every other prisoner walked out or allowed himself to be led out. Every day a number of the more amenable prisoners are transferred from "B" and "C" Wings to "A" Wing. Several have been found who state that they have been anxious to sign the form for months, but dared not approach us, as they have been left under the power and authority of irreconcilable leaders." The report finishes there.

A hunger-strike was started in Mountjoy Prison on the 14th October. General statements have been made that the prisoners have been driven into this strike as a result of ill-treatment. Actually, the prisoners have been driven into the strike by their leaders, because the steps taken to control prisoners' movements in the prison have been such as effectively to stop work on a tunnel, upon which, it would appear, they had been engaged. This tunnel was found in an examination on the 17th October. It had been carried over a distance of 70 yards and would probably have been completed in another ten days.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If I had been aware of the length of the reply of the Minister for Defence, I would certainly have asked him to circulate it in the Official Reports, because the giving of a lengthy reply prevents other Deputies, who have questions, from putting them later on. The time for questions is strictly now over, but I think for to-day, as we have had a couple of long replies, we may take the other questions for oral answers.

Mr. ALFRED BYRNE: May I ask, arising out of the Minister's reply, whether he is aware that within the past ten days, it has been stated that there is a witness to the ill-treatment of Charles Murphy, that this witness is prepared to make a sworn declaration that he saw Charles Murphy strung up on the racks in the prison, and that he has quite recently undergone a serious operation; if that statement is brought forward will the Minister make inquiries, or if he has any knowledge of unofficial punishment being inflicted on prisoners by their gaolers as a result of private vengeance?

General MULCAHY: I am not aware of any such statement. I am prepared to take reasonable steps to inquire into any allegation that is made into the treatment of prisoners.

FERMOY MILITARY BARRACKS.

Mr. THOMAS O'MAHONY asked the Minister for Defence whether it is intended to reconstruct the Military Barracks at Fermoy, and thus relieve unemployment in the town, and, if so, what is the extent of reconstruction presently contemplated, and when the work is likely to be advertised for public competition.

General MULCAHY: It is not yet possible to say whether it will be necessary to have a permanent military barracks in Fermoy.

URBAN AREAS AND MOTOR TAX.

Mr. THOS. O'MAHONY asked the Minister for Local Government whether, as Urban Councils have no representation on the County Councils who distribute the Motor Tax, steps will be taken to provide that, as in the case of Borough Councils, sums from this Tax should be reserved in favour of Urban areas, from which a large amount of this Tax is derived.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERN-

MENT (Mr. Burke): There is no power under existing law to make grants from the Road Fund direct to Urban District Councils as such.

When approving of local schemes for allocation of Road Grants, every care will be taken to secure that no unfair discrimination will arise as against roads in urban districts.

DONADEA TURBARY RENTS.

Mr. JOHN CONLON asked the Minister for Agriculture if he is aware that the landlord of the Dobbe estate, situate at Donadea, is taking proceedings against the tenants to enforce payment in full of turbary rents and arrears of same; whether eighty of those tenants have poor law valuations of £5 and under; whether their inability to pay the landlord's demands is due to the fact that they have been unable to save their turf this season, on the sale of which commodity they rely for a means of livelihood; whether in view of those circumstances, which also affect other estates in Co. Kildare, notably the Versehoyle property at Kilberry, Athy, he is prepared to bring about such amendment in the Land Act as will afford protection to tenants of this class.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. P. Hogan): I have received no communications and no information relative to the turbary rents in the district mentioned. I am not aware that any large number of tenants anywhere have failed to save their turf this season. I have no information in connection with the Poor Law Valuations of the eighty tenants referred to. If their Poor Law Valuations are £5 and under they will be dealt with under the 1923 Land Act, their holdings will be made economic, and they will be provided with turbary, so far as there is land and bog available. I do not consider it necessary to introduce legislation to deal with tenants who take turbary from year to year outside their holdings, and I have no intention of introducing a Bill for amendment of the Land Act.

Mr. CONLON: Arising out of the Minister's answer, might I ask if he would be so good as to look into some documents I have relative to the Verschoyle Estate. I hold these documents in my possession. They reveal a state of things which one would imagine would be impossible except in a state of feudalism.

Mr. HOGAN: If I get the documents and the particulars I will have them investigated.

DIVISION OF MAYO ESTATE.

Mr. MARTIN M. NALLY asked the Minister for Agriculture if he is aware that large tracts of untenanted lands on the Lynch Blossie Estate, Balla, Co. Mayo, acquired by the Congested Districts Board over fifteen years ago, are still undivided, and what steps, if any, are being taken to relieve the acute congestion which exists on this estate, where a large number of tenants are living on small holdings under £5 valuation.

Mr. HOGAN: With the exception of one acre, all the untenanted land on the portion of the Estate referred to in the Question has been disposed of since July, 1921.

The Attavale Demesne lands were excluded from the sale in 1908 and were not acquired until 1918, when the purchase money had to be found in cash and paid out of the Board's own funds. Owing to the depreciation of Land Stock and the heavy loss that would have resulted through re-sale under the Land Act, 1909, these lands have been retained in hands pending the passing of the Land Act, 1923, under which they will be sold as early as possible in suitable divisions.

LONGFORD ESTATES.

Mr. PATRICK McKENNA asked the Minister for Agriculture whether he is aware that an absentee landlord, named Sholto Douglas, has included as tenants on his estate, which comprises the townlands of Curry, Cartrons, Moneylagan, and Lisnabee, near the town of Longford, in returns made to the Land Commission, a number of graziers, to enable the latter to come under the Land Act, 1923; whether the same landlord has another estate, part purchased, part unsold, in the parish of Drumlish, which is held by some 80 tenants, with valuations ranging from £5 to £10; whether these and other congests of the neighbourhood are to be considered in the implementing of the Land Act, 1923; whether the claims of the above mentioned graziers to be registered as tenants are to be conceded; to ask what steps it is proposed to take to prevent graziers being returned as tenants within the terms of the Land Act, 1923.

Mr. HOGAN: I have no information about the Sholto Douglas estate to which the Deputy refers. Section 73 (2) defines tenanted land and makes special provision for tenancies which have been created since the 1st September, 1922. No land will be declared tenanted land by the Land Commission for the purpose of resale except in accordance with this Section. I do not know what the Deputy means by the term grazier. Its meaning varies with the point of view of the person who uses it—the Labour Party have one definition, the farmers another. There is a provision in the Land Act empowering the Land Commission when considering whether they will make a larger advance than £3,000 to a tenant to take into account the manner in which the particular farm is being worked. This provision gives the Land Commission ample powers to deal with tenants who are loosely called graziers, and I do not propose to extend them.

If there are eighty uneconomic holdings on the estate these holdings will be made economic so far as there is land to do it. The main purpose of the Act is to relieve congestion.

EVASION OF LAND ACT.

MÍCHEAL Ó HÍFEARNÁIN asked the Minister for Agriculture, whether he is aware that the owners of untenanted land throughout the country are selling their land holdings, with the evident intention of evading the provisions of the Land Act, and whether the Minister will take steps to have it made generally known that the purchasers of such land are liable to have such land resumed by the Land Commission for the purpose of enlarging uneconomic holdings.

Mr. HOGAN: I am not aware that there is any considerable increase in the sale of untenanted land. I have already stated on the 27th July, in answer to a similar question, that the Government cannot interfere, or that I cannot interfere, with an owner's right to sell his property, but that the sale of property or the creation of freeholds or tenancies now does not in any way interfere with or modify the right of the Land Commission under the Land Act, 1923, to acquire land compulsorily for the purposes of the Act. The fact that "A" has sold his land, and that "B," "C," and "D" are now the owners, makes no difference.

The Deputy should remember that there is power to acquire land, not only from a landlord, so called, but also from a tenant purchaser or a tenant. The Land Commission will acquire land from either class if they require it. Any attempt to prevent the sale of land pending the operation of the Land Act would not increase in any way the powers of the Land Commission, but would only have the effect of decreasing the value of all the land of the country, and the farmers, big and small, since they own far the greatest area, would be the greatest sufferers by such a policy.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: Arising out of that answer, I would like to ask the Minister if he would not consider the advisability of publishing in some shape or form the fact that it is quite probable that in the case of any untenanted land that is sold now with the idea of evading the provisions of the Land Act, that the Land Commission will take up that land and divide it? The publication of such a notice would have the effect of stopping this.

Mr. HOGAN: I have already answered that question. The Land Act is there and everyone knows the provisions of it. If such a statement as the Deputy suggests were to be published it should not be confined to what the Deputy calls untenanted land. We would have to include tenanted land as well, and I would be surprised to hear any Farmer Deputy suggesting that we should publish a statement that no tenant should sell his holding.

Mr. MICHAEL HEFFERNAN: Arising out of that, I wish to say I did not mean to make that statement about tenants' land. I meant untenanted land. I also wish to point out that everybody does not know the Land Act.

Mr. HOGAN: I wish to point out clearly that the Land Commission will make no discrimination between what the Deputy calls landlords, and what I call a tenant, or a tenant purchaser.

Mr. GOREY: Arising out of that is it not a fact that a clear provision is contained in the recent Land Act whereby the Land Commission, or the Minister for Agriculture, can review all sales made since December twelve months.

Mr. HOGAN: I have referred to that.

Mr. GOREY: That is the position I want to make clear.

ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES IN DUBLIN POST OFFICE.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Postmaster-General whether he has received a letter alleging certain irregularities in the conduct of business at Denmark Street Post Office, Dublin, from Mr. M. T. Garnett, of Ranelagh, Co. Dublin; whether he has enquired into the allegations, and whether any action has been taken in the matter.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. J. J. Walsh): I duly received the letter referred to. Enquiries were made regarding the allegations, and a reply, stating the result, was sent to Mr. Garnett on the 16th instant. No action was called for so far as the Post Office was concerned, beyond the provision of an officer to attend to the public between 1 p.m. and 2 p.m.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

NEW NATIONAL EDUCATION COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. JOHN GOOD asked the Minister for Education, the qualifications, salaries, and terms of appointment of the Commissioners recently selected to discharge the duties of the Board of National Education.

MINISTER for EDUCATION (Prof.

Eoin MacNeill): The National Education Commissioners appointed by the President of the Executive Council for the purposes of the National Education Commissioners' Order (No. 10 of 1923) are Seósamh Ó'Neill, Secretary to the Ministry of Education, and Pádraic Ó Brocháin, Assistant Secretary to the Ministry and Chief Executive Officer of National Education. I am quite satisfied as to the qualifications of these Commissioners. They receive no remuneration for carrying out the duties of the Board. The terms of their appointment may be found in the Order already referred to (No. 10 of 1923).

LOANS TO FARMERS.

Mr. PATRICK McKENNA asked the Minister for Finance whether loans are granted to farmers for the erection or improvement of farm dwellings and of out-offices, and, if so, upon what terms such loans are available.

Mr. BLYTHE: In view of the exceptional financial circumstances the issue of such loans has been temporarily suspended.

TIPPERARY SHOPKEEPER'S COMPENSATION.

MICHEAL R. O hIFEARNAIN asked the Minister for Home Affairs when will the amount of the decree for £1,400 and costs, granted to Patrick Kiely, of Kilmoyler, Cahir, at Tipperary Sessions, on the 22nd June, 1920, as compensation for the partial destruction of his shop, shed, and stock in trade, be made available; and whether, in view of the well-known fact that Mr. Kiely suffered this loss owing to his national sentiments, and urgently needs the money, steps will be taken to facilitate the payment of the compensation at an early date.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: As the decree to which the Deputy refers was not defended by the County Council in the County Court it must be the subject of review by the Compensation (Ireland) Commission. An award by the Commission in substitution for the decree has not yet been notified to the Ministry of Finance, and the question of payment does not therefore arise.

A CO. LONGFORD ROAD.

Mr. PATRICK McKENNA asked the Minister for Agriculture whether it is the intention of the Land Commission to complete the road on the McGregor estate, situated at Clonmucker and Manascallaghan, Co. Longford, which was begun in November, 1919, and abandoned when the road was half made; whether he is aware that about 60 people are suffering great inconvenience because of the condition of this road.

Mr. HOGAN: The construction of the road in question has been completed by the Land Commissioners so far as it serves the lands acquired by them, and it is not at present proposed to continue the road through lands which they have not acquired. There is no information to the effect that inconvenience is being caused by the condition of the road.

TIPPERARY POSTMAN'S POSITION.

MICHEAL O hIFEARNAIN asked the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that James Aherne, Auxiliary Postman, attached to Fethard P.O., and acting as postman between Fethard and Killusty (a six-day walk), has been changed to another route, which is only a three-day walk, and his pay reduced accordingly; and whether there is any reason for this change and consequent reduction in pay.

Mr. WALSH: In accordance with the general policy now being pursued an unremunerative rural post, working from the Fethard Post Office, Co. Tipperary, was recently reduced in frequency from six to three days a week. The postman who was employed on this walk has 20 years' service, and being the senior of the six Auxiliary Postmen at Fethard, he was transferred to the post on which Mr. Aherne had been employed, and Mr. Aherne was given the three-day walk.

Mr. Aherne, who has only four years' service, is the junior auxiliary postman, and his terms of employment give him no claim to a permanent position.

RATES ON SMALL HOLDINGS.

Mr. THOMAS O'MAHONY asked the Minister for Local Government whether, with a view to the more satisfactory and effective collection of rates on small holdings, it is intended to promote early legislation, imposing the liability for such rates on the landlords, as formerly, and to make provision for such increase in rentals as will reimburse this payment by the landlords.

Mr. BURKE: This matter is under consideration.

EX-SERVICE MEN'S HOUSES.

Mr. THOMAS O'MAHONY asked the Minister for Local Government, whether, as the British Government grant for the erection of houses for ex-service men has been available for a long time—steps will be taken (1) to expedite the work necessary to determine the amount for Saorstát purposes; (2) to have the overdue schemes proceeded with at the earliest possible date, and so relieve present and impending unemployment; whether it has been laid down under the terms of the British grant that suitable local ex-service men should have a first claim on employment under those schemes.

Mr. BURKE: Representations have been made to the British Government as to some delay which has arisen in the appointment of the members of the Land Trust who will administer the British Grant of £1,500,000. It is understood that the members will shortly be appointed, when schemes for the application of the money will be arranged. It is understood that a certain amount work has been in progress in connection with schemes which had been already settled, but progress has been hampered because of strikes. It is understood that it is the practice, in administering the schemes, to consider the claims for employment of the ex-service men referred to in the question.

PRISON OFFICIALS' UNIFORMS.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether the cost to the State for making a chief warden's, a principal warden's, and a warden's uniform, by a prisoner in civil prisons, for the year is, according to Prison Board returns, £2 0s. 6d., £1 13s. 6d., and £1 5s. 6d. respectively; whether this cost must be included in determining the actual cost to the State of the uniform supplied; and, if so, whether he will now see that it is included in the allowance in lieu of uniform given to the clerical officers of the Prisons Service.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The figures furnished by the General Prisons Board as the estimated value of the labour of prisoners engaged in the making up of uniforms for chief warders, principal warders, and warders, are £2 3s. 3d., £1 16s. 3d., and £1 8s. 3d. respectively. The estimated value of prisoners' labour must not be added for the purpose of determining the actual cost to the State of the uniform supplied. The cost of maintenance of prisoners has to be borne by the State whether they are employed in the making of uniforms or not. Accordingly in fixing the amount of the allowance granted to clerical officers in lieu of uniform the estimated value of prisoners' labour will not be included. If these officers are not satisfied with the amount of the allowance now granted the allowance can be discontinued and uniform re-issued. The concession of an allowance in lieu of uniform to clerical officers in prison will only be continued subject to the condition that the concession involves no additional expenditure.

PORTLAOIGHISE CONVICT PRISON STAFF.

LIAM O DAIMHIN asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether officers of the Portlaoighise Convict Prison staff, who slept within the prison, were supplied with free beds; whether an officer, on being transferred from another prison to Portlaoighise, was compelled to store away his bed or sell it; whether the staff at present employed in Portlaoighise are compelled to pay for the use of their beds, and if he will now take steps to see that conditions always attaching to Portlaoighise Prison in this respect are immediately restored, and that payment for the use of beds be stopped.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Prior to the abolition of the Convict Prison rank of officers in November, 1919, Prison Officers serving in Convict Prisons were provided with beds at the public expense. Following on the institution of general service officers, and the general increase in rates of pay, this practice was discontinued and all male officers who are permitted the use of prison beds and bedding, other than those who are compelled to sleep in as a reserve guard, are required to pay the sum of 1/- (one shilling) per week to cover wear and tear and incidental washing. It is not proposed to abolish this charge, which is reasonable and moderate.

I cannot find any foundation for the statement that an officer on transfer to Portlaoighise from another prison was compelled to store away his bed or to sell it.

COMPENSATION FOR VOLUNTEER POLICE.

Mr. DAVID HALL asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that soldiers of the I.R.A. who, in 1922, acted as Volunteer Police for a period of from two to six months, have received no pay or compensation for service or loss of time; if the Minister is aware that Commandant General Boylan, late O.C. of the 1st Eastern Division, guaranteed the sum of £4 per week to Battalion Police Officers, and that same has not been paid; and if it is the intention of the Minister to invite and consider such claims.

GENERAL MULCAHY: Claims of the kind have been received and are being investigated. When certified correct, payment at appropriate rates will be made.

REMUNERATION OF BALLYMORE-EUSTACE SOLDIER.

SEOIRSE DE BHULBH asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that Patrick Magee, Bishophill, Ballymore-Eustace, was promised remuneration by his superior officer, at the rate of £4 per week during his period of service with the Army, but that he never received any money for his services; whether Magee held the ranks of Company Captain, Ballymore Company, Battalion Quartermaster, and Police Officer of the 3rd Battalion of the district; to ask when payment of the sum due will be made.

GENERAL MULCAHY: A claim which has only been received from Mr. Magee will be settled forthwith.

CLARE MAN'S ARREST.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN asked the Minister for Defence whether, in the case of James Barron, Newpark, Co. Clare, arrested at his home early in July, 1922, it is still proposed to hold him interned, in view of the fact that he had not borne arms in the irregular campaign.

GENERAL MULCAHY: The release of Mr. Barron had been ordered and was about to be effected when he went on hunger-strike. As a result of his action it will be necessary to reconsider the question of releasing him later.

CO. KILDARE TRADERS' ACCOUNTS.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that although Mr. Arthur Browne, of Droichead Nua, has furnished bills (four times since the 29th May, 1922) to the Paymaster-General, Portobello Barracks, of £21 10s. for hire of motor cars, and £3 16s. for petrol and oil supplied to the orders of the Military Authorities, Naas Barracks, and certified as correct by Captain P. Kelly, that he has not been paid yet; and whether instructions will be given that this long over-due account be paid at once.

General MULCAHY: Mr. Browne's account will be settled forthwith.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that a claim of Mr. Joseph Fulham, Maynooth, for the hire of motor cars supplied to the orders of Sergeant Quinn and Dr. Grogan, of Maynooth, on behalf of the Military Authorities, in October, 1922, has not been paid yet, although six applications for same were sent in to the Paymaster-General, Portobello Barracks; further, if he is aware that the first bill sent in was certified as correct by Adjutant White, of Lucan Barracks, and in view of the above statement whether the Minister will give instructions to the Paymaster-General to expedite payment.

General MULCAHY: The settlement of Mr. Fulham's claim is being expedited.

COMPENSATION FOR LORRY.

Mr. PATRICK W. SHAW asked the Minister for Defence if he will allow further compensation to Mr. W. I. Jones, Connaught Street, Athlone, for a motor lorry commandeered by the military in July, 1922; whether he is aware that this lorry was the sole support of the claimant, that he only received £34 compensation and £41 for repairs, while his claim amounts to £230, which he claims as the actual loss he has sustained.

General MULCAHY: A Ford ton lorry was commandeered from Mr. Jones the 1st July to the 23rd August, 1922. He claimed £41 odd for damage and £27 per week for hirage, although the Army provided the driver and bore all running costs. He was allowed £38 odd for repairs, and £4 11s. per week for hirage, making a total of £75, in full compensation. It is not possible to allow anything more.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF BARLEY-GROWING.

SEAN O DUINNIN asked the Minister for Agriculture whether he is aware that the cultivation of barley is not an economic proposition, due to high wages, wet seasons, and bad markets; that the acreage under cultivation is decreasing yearly, that foreign grown barley is imported to the detriment of the home-grown article; whether it is intended to urge distillers, brewers, and maltsters to give preference to the home-grown article, or to put a tariff on the imported article, and thus put the industry on a paying basis.

Mr. HOGAN: The price of barley, in common with that of other cereals, has not increased to the same extent as the cost of production of corn crops, and though the acreage under barley has decreased in recent years, there has been a larger proportionate decrease in the area under other cereals in the Free State. The area under barley is at present not less than that of the years preceding the war. A proportion of foreign grown barley is used by Irish brewers who, it should be understood, are competing, particularly as regards their export trade, with brewers who buy their barley on the open market.

Representations, as suggested, will be made to the brewers, distillers and maltsters. Recent prices for this year's crop are somewhat better than was anticipated, and it is hoped that such a further improvement in price will take place as will render unnecessary such action as is indicated in the concluding portion of the question.

RETURN TO WRIT.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Tá orm a chur iniúl don Dáil go bhfuil an Cléireach tar éis freagra a fhágáil ar an rit a chuir sé amach i geóir Dáil-Cheannfair (Buirg) Bhaile Atha Cliath Theas, agus gur toghadh Aodh Ó Cinnéide i geóir an Dáil-Cheannfair sin.

I have to announce to the Dáil that the Clerk has received a return to his Writ and that Mr. Hugh Kennedy has been elected to fill the vacancy in the Borough Constituency of Dublin South.

QUESTION ON THE ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. JOHN WHITE: I beg to give notice that on the motion for the adjournment I will call attention to the persistent illegal fishing on the west coast of Tirconail within the prohibited areas of Lough Foyle and Lough Swilly within the past two or three weeks.

DEATHS OF MR. PHILIP COSGRAVE, T.D., AND SENATOR MCPARTLIN.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. O'Higgins): I feel that I am anticipating and fulfilling what would be the wish of every Deputy in the Dáil when I ask you, a Chinn Chomhairle, to convey, on behalf of the members of the Dáil, to the relatives of the late Mr. Phil. Cosgrave and Senator McPartlin the deep sympathy of the Dáil and of all its members in their sad bereavement.

[Mr. O'Higgins.]

Mr. Cosgrave was a mild, unassuming, selfless man. He was also a man of great, quiet strength of character, and he was utterly selfless; but he had the highest possible sense of duty and of discipline, and he shrank from no task, however painful, however invidious, in the service of the Nation and of the people.

Senator McPartlin was a man whom one did not need to meet very often in public life to realise that one was dealing with an extremely honest and intensely patriotic man. He had a great love of his kind. The country is the poorer for his passing. I feel this is not a matter that should call for speeches from members of the Dáil. I feel that in asking you, sir, to convey the deep sympathy of the Dáil to the President and other relatives of the late Mr. Cosgrave and to the family of the late Senator McPartlin, I am in fact speaking for every party and for every Deputy here present.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I will ask Deputies to signify their assent in the usual way.

was passed in silence.

CIVIL SERVICE REGULATION (No. 2) BILL, 1923.

FIRST STAGE.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. Blythe): I ask leave of the Dáil to introduce the Civil Service Regulation (No. 2) Bill. We simply propose in this Bill to re-enact and to put in permanent form the provisions of the Civil Service Regulation Act, 1923.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I beg to second.

Motion put and agreed to. Second stage ordered for first day of sitting next week.

MINISTERS AND SECRETARIES BILL, 1923.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The next item on the Orders of the Day is the second stage of the Ministers and Secretaries Bill, 1923.

Mr. THOMAS JOHNSON: On a point of order I would like to point out that when we adjourned on the last day I think it was understood that this Bill would be circulated immediately. At least it was given a first reading on the understanding that it would be circulated and that members would be able to read it before the Second Stage came on. My information is that it has not been circulated, and I submit, therefore, it is not in order to take the Second Stage to-day.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Second Stage was ordered for to-day and appears on the Order paper in accordance with the order made by the Dáil itself. Since the Bill has not been circulated I take it that it is the intention of the Minister to move to discharge the order for second reading to-day and to put in on the Paper for another day.

Mr. BLYTHE: It was unfortunate that we asked for the second reading on the first day we met after the adjournment. There were a couple of points outstanding which had to be dealt with before the draft of the Bill could be circulated and, unfortunately, it was not found possible to deal with them in the interval. As the Bill has been read a first time, I would ask that the Order for second reading to-day should be discharged and the Bill put down for second reading on this day fortnight.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The motion then is that the Order for second reading on the Paper to-day be discharged and that the Bill be put down for second reading this day fortnight.

Question put and agreed to.

THE COURTS OF JUSTICE BILL, 1923.—THIRD STAGE RESUMED.

SECTION 63.

Major BRYAN COOPER: When the Dáil adjourned, an amendment, moved by me, was under consideration, and perhaps it would not be out of place if I were to re-state what the purport of the amendment was. My amendment proposes to delete Section 63 from the Bill. The Section, as it stands, provides that all appeals from the Circuit Courts shall be taken on the notes of the stenographer and only on the notes of the stenographer, and my amendment proposes to delete that Section from the Bill. The reasons I gave for moving the amendment were twofold. The first reason was, that it would be almost as costly to the litigant to pay for the transcript of the evidence as it would be to bring the witnesses to Dublin. The second reason was, that in administering justice you learn a great deal from the appearance and demeanour of the witnesses as to how they answer questions put to them. You cannot cross-examine the shorthand transcript of the evidence. I do think it would facilitate the ends of justice if it were possible for the Court of Appeal, or the Appeal Tribunal, dealing with these appeals from Circuit Courts, which, remember, will have power to hear actions for much larger sums than has been the case hitherto, if the Judges in these Appeal Courts were to have an opportunity of seeing the witnesses and forming their own opinion as to their testimony. I should like to congratulate, not so much the Attorney-General, as the Dáil on the presence of the Attorney-General, and on the fact that he is now able to speak to us face to face instead of through the voice of somebody else. I should like, now that we have the Attorney-General here, to get free counsel's opinion on the subject, and to ask him what, in his view, would happen if this amendment of mine were carried. Would it not leave it optional to the Appeal Tribunal to adopt the procedure it thought best? If they wished to go on the notes of the shorthand writer they could do so, but, if they found that system unsatisfactory, it would be possible for them to turn to another method, and that is to adopt the method of hearing oral testimony. I think if possible we should leave this matter as open as we can, so as not to force the Minister to resort to the expediency of bringing in an amending Bill next year, if it is found that this provision does not work. I do feel that this Section is a blemish on the Bill, and therefore I should be very grateful to the Attorney-General if he would answer the points I have put.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Mr. Hugh

Kennedy): This Section is really one of the principal reforms proposed to be effected by this measure. In considering the proposal it is well to bear in mind what are the existing appeals. The Circuit Courts will comprise, within their jurisdiction, the cases at present heard by the County Courts, and a section of the cases heard by the High Courts. The cases now heard by the County Courts are limited to a maximum of £50. Now, in these cases the existing appeal, known as a Civil Bill Appeal, is taken to the Judge of Assize and has a complete re-hearing. The Judiciary Committee were greatly impressed by the fact, as I think all members of the Bar familiar with Assize Court practice were greatly impressed, that the re-hearing given by the Assize Court has never been a satisfactory re-hearing. In the first place, it tends to a certain vice in the primary hearing before the County Court Judge. The hearing before the County Court Judge tends to become a trial run of the witnesses, and when a case comes on at a later stage before the Judge of Assize all persons interested in the case have learned its weaknesses and its strong points, and the fact of the trial gallop is often very obvious in the testimony that is given on the rehearing.

Further the Civil Bill appeal has suffered from the fact that the Judge of Assize has heard these cases in quantity within a very limited time, generally against a railway time-table. So that you have disadvantage from the point of view of the case as it was presented, disadvantage from the point of view of the tribunal as it heard it, and, in addition, to the successful party there was this added disadvantage that one might get a decree in a County Court, say in October, and would have to wait until the following March to have an appeal disposed of before the decree could be effective one way or the other. The Committee were greatly impressed, as I have said the members of the Bar and solicitors have always been impressed, by the fact that the Civil Bill appeal, as we knew it, was a most unsatisfactory form of proceeding.

The other cases, the cases which are now heard by the High Court, between [Attorney-General.] the limits of £50 and £300 in value, which are commonly called Records, formerly were tried in a great hurry by the Judge of Assize or tried in Dublin. In these cases the existing manner of appeal is an appeal on Judge's notes, not an appeal by a rehearing of the witnesses, and every member of the Bar in this country has been greatly impressed by the great drawbacks that attend a hearing on Judge's notes. Either the Judge takes very elaborate notes, lengthy notes which prevent him having that acute observation of witnesses of which Deputy Bryan Cooper speaks, or he takes inadequate notes, and the result has been that there has been for years a demand in all the Courts here to have a stenographic report of the evidence as they have had in England for a very considerable time. The form of appeal in those cases is an appeal upon the evidence as given, raising the question of its admissibility and whether the verdict has been perverse, against the weight of evidence, or whether the damages have been excessive. There will be nothing novel in the appeal that is provided in this Bill in those cases save that a more complete record of the evidence will be available. A further matter which is of no small importance, as most practising members of the Bar are aware, there will be a record of the Judge's charge to the jury, which hitherto has not been available, and which often might provide matter which would be very interesting on appeal, as has been found in England. So that its novelty has been confined to the cases under £50. It prevents the anomalous rehearing of a Civil Bill appeal, and as regards the other class of cases it simply improves the existing appeal by providing more adequate material.

As regards the cost, the Assizes being done away with, the four circuits, which were a very large and expensive institution, as they had registrars and officials of various kinds, will now give place to the Circuit Court, which will rest upon an establishment practically equal to the establishment of the County Court, and the saving will far more than cover the provision of stenographers for the Circuit Courts.

We have, as a matter of fact at present, in the Chancery Courts, an appeal on what amounts to a stenographer's record of the evidence. The Judge of the two Chancery Courts here is at present provided with a shorthand-writer who takes a complete record of the evidence, and I believe it has always worked very satisfactorily. The Committee laid very great store by this provision. This amendment would go far to impair what they thought was a considerable reform, and accordingly the Government recommends very strongly this Section to the Dáil.

Captain REDMOND: I am very glad indeed that at length the Government thought fit to accept my suggestion, namely, that they should postpone the consideration of the Committee Stage of this Bill until we had the advantage of the presence of the Attorney-General among us. The Attorney-General has replied to my friend, Deputy Bryan Cooper, by making a general attack on the old Civil Bill appeal, and by stating that this method of appeal on stenographer's notes will be an improvement upon that method. As regards his statement that members of the Bar generally, and even, as far as I am aware, of the Judiciary Committee in particular, were against the continuance of the old form of Civil Bill appeal, I am afraid I cannot be in agreement with him. The Civil Bill appeal is the most essentially Irish portion—in fact it is practically the only Irish portion of the existing County Court system in this country. It may be true that in the past it has not worked well in many instances, but I say that that is a matter of finding fault with the past administration of that system, and not with the system itself.

The Attorney-General has thought fit to call what will be an appeal on the stenographer's notes an appeal. I say it shall be nothing of the kind. In the first place, it will not be an appeal upon questions of fact. That appeal goes by the board. It will only be an appeal on questions of law, and anyone who has knowledge or experience of the English system, as it now works, knows that appeals on questions of law are matters very difficult indeed to raise.

In fact, the present proposal is to nullify appeals. It comes to this, that from the decision of the future Circuit Judge there is to be nothing in the nature of a serious appeal.

As far as the cost is concerned the Attorney-General blandly tells us that the cost, taking away the necessity for sending down Judges of Assize, will be about the same as the cost of the existing County Courts. I do not like to make a prophecy; it is a very fatal thing to do in legal as well as in political affairs, but does the Attorney-General mean to say that the new Circuit Judge, travelling round from town to town, for all we know, from village to village, in these huge areas which he will have to traverse with his enormous retinue, will not cost more than the existing County Court Judges? Is one stenographer going to be sufficient for the Circuit Judge? Surely the Attorney-General knows enough about shorthand writing to know that one stenographer cannot remain in Court all day taking down everything, as he will have to do, because questions of appeal do not arise, mark you, until the decision is given. Therefore, every little case and every statement made will have to be taken down. Does he mean to say that one man is going to be sufficient to take down, and, furthermore, to transcribe that night, everything that has taken place during the day? Of course he does not. Not only will there have to be at least two, but, in my opinion, there will have to be more than two stenographers. They will have to work in shifts, just like the official reporters work in this and in every other Parliament. They will have to come on and go off, and they will have to transcribe their notes and transcribe them almost immediately, because everyone knows that shorthand, even one's own shorthand, is a very difficult thing to transcribe unless you go at it immediately after the subject matter has been written in shorthand. All this being so, I am inclined to the conclusion, and I think it is a very reasonable one, that you will require a large retinue of skilled shorthand writers. And what about the typists? You will have to have typists going around as well. A man cannot take notes, transcribe them, and do the type-writing all in one. You will have to have efficient typists, and as this caravan travels from day to day, from place to place, the troupe will have to be increased by typists, shorthand writers and others. As to the system being less costly to the litigant, I am not going to argue that; but one thing I will argue, that it will be more costly to the State, and that it will be more costly in its initial stages. The system of appeal on notes taken by Judges, of course, had its faults, but Judges have had their faults, too. The Judges we are going to appoint in the future under the Attorney-General's supervision, surely will not have the faults of the Judges who were appointed under the alien administration of days gone by. I would suggest that this Section, which is an entire leap in the dark, which is a pure experiment, which has not been tried in like circumstances elsewhere, should be dropped now, and that we should revert to the system which, if it has been maladministered in the past, because of its being a system, need not necessarily be maladministered in the future. The proposal is to have every case, every word, reported. Any one who is acquainted with County Court work—and I am afraid it is some time since the Attorney-General had to go to the counties, unlike some of the rest of his poorer brethren—knows that a case would present a very different appearance indeed upon paper, when A swears black and B swears white, and you do not see either A or B, to what it would present when you see A in the box and you also see B in the box.

A Judge has very often to decide a question upon the general demeanour and the veracity of the witnesses. Therefore, it all comes down to this. This proposal contained in this Section is to nullify appeals and to do away with any right—at least any practicable right—of either party, who through legitimate reasons ventures to quarrel with or differ from the decision of the Judge in making his appeal, both in fact and in law.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I am very grateful to the Attorney-General for his exposition of the Section, but he did not answer my question as to what effect the deletion of the clause would have—whether it would leave the matter open. Therefore, I cannot withdraw my amendment, but I do not propose to put the Dáil to the trouble of dividing, if this question is put, unless I have more support than I think I have at present.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Deputy Redmond has been very entertaining in his description of the future of this procedure, but it is satisfactory to be able to say that these stenographers will not be required to report counsel's speeches, and consequently they will have considerable opportunity for presenting a complete record of the matter that is material to the appeal. At present there is only one stenographer in each of the two Chancery Courts and he, to my own knowledge, discharges that duty without assistance with great efficiency. Deputy Redmond suggests that this section denies appeal in fact. I am afraid that Deputy Redmond cannot have considered the Section as closely as I think he should. The Section provides that a Court of Appeal may order a new trial or may vary a judgment so that if on the report of the evidence, which is presented by the stenographer, the Court of Appeal is satisfied that the evidence has not been acted upon in the order and in the way which the Court thinks is in accordance with law, or the weight of evidence, it will be open to the Court of Appeal to send back the case for re-hearing with such directions as it may think fit. There is one important consideration which I think is lost sight of, if the proposal to delete this Section is adopted. What is the alternative if the Section is deleted? You have appeals to Dublin. Are you to preserve the method of the full re-hearing of cases under £50, and convey the witnesses to Dublin for the full re-hearing by the Court of Appeal of a case already heard before a jury? If this process of appeal, on points upon which the former trials may have been unsatisfactory, is deleted then I say the right of appeal will be denied, because such a thing as conveying country witnesses to Dublin for complete re-hearing would be an unworkable process, and beyond the means of the ordinary people concerned in these cases. The matter goes to the root of the scheme outlined by the Committee and I say, notwithstanding Deputy Redmond, that the Committee was unanimous in recommending this particular provision. Therefore, it seems to me that the deletion of the Section is practically a denial of the right of appeal to these country litigants.

Captain REDMOND: I do not like to trespass on the Committee any further, but I must shew, at least the Attorney-General, that I have read the Section. The Section reads: "Such appeals should be grounded on the report of an official stenographer, but the Court that hears such appeal may if it thinks fit admit fresh evidence, etc." They have first to hear the appeal and it is not the method by which they have to hear the appeal that I object to. But the appeal which they propose to hear will not reflect the true state of the case. In regard to an alternative suggestion, I am perfectly prepared to make an alternative—in fact I made it a few weeks ago. Instead of deleting the Section, I would be prepared to propose another amendment which would make the Bill, to my mind, a more workable and practicable one.

The proposal I made some time ago, which I will ask you to endure for one or two moments longer, was this: I am not yet satisfied in my mind whether it was the intention of the Government ever to create what they defined in the preliminary Section of this Bill as Commissioners of the High Court Circuits. Those are the gentlemen which they say they might create at some future time to take the place of the old Judges of Assize in trying more serious criminal offences. If the Government do intend to send those Judges down the country to try the more serious cases of murder, treason, felony and so forth, I hope their time will not be fully occupied, and my suggestion was this. When they come round to the country they should then and there be empowered to take Appeals from the Circuit Courts up to the sum of £100. That is very reasonable. Here are those fine gentlemen enjoying fat salaries. They will be sent down to the country. They will be engaged in considering the most serious forms of crime which are exempted from the jurisdiction of the Circuit Courts. They will have very little to do. Why not allow them at the same time to take Appeals from the Circuit Courts up to the sum of £100? In all sums over £100 let the Appeals go direct to Dublin. They will be a very small proportion of cases. They probably will eventually find their way to Dublin, and to take a short cut to Dublin, without going around through the proposed Court of Appeal, I say would, if anything, be advantageous to the litigant. That is my suggestion, as an alternative, in case the Government do think of creating these Commissioners of the High Court Circuits. If they have no intention of ever creating these Commissioners of the High Court Circuits, it is another matter. As I said on a previous occasion, I would like to hear what the Dublin jurors would have to say. If they have no intention of creating those Commissioners of the High Court Circuit, it will be seriously unfair to Dublin jurymen to have to try important and heinous forms of crime from all parts of the country. If they do intend creating these High Court Circuit Commissioners, why not give them a little more to do, and why not, in that manner, continue the existing form of Civil Bill Appeal which, I say, has proved satisfactory, and should be a satisfactory method of appeal in the future in spite of what the Attorney-General says?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: There seems to be some confusion with regard to the Commissioners of the High Court Circuit. It is not intended to have two teams of Judges circuiting through the country. There will be a permanent Circuit Court. They will have criminal jurisdiction to a very considerable extent. The power is taken to have Judges of the High Court, which Court alone will have jurisdiction with regard to the more heinous forms of crime. Power is taken whenever the necessity arises to send out to any part of the country Commissioners who will be able to dispose of crops of this particular class of case. It is not intended to have High Court Commissioners going out periodically dealing with any form of case. Only should the occasion arise by reason of a crop of crime of the more serious character, there is power to send Judges of the High Court to the locality to deal with the cases.

Question: "That Section 63 stand part of the Bill," put and declared carried.

Section 64 put and agreed to.

SECTION 65.

Section 27 of this Act shall apply to indictments in the Circuit Court.

Amendment by Professor MAGENIS and Captain REDMOND: In line one to delete the figures "28" and to substitute therefor the figures "27."

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I take it that this amendment refers to the marginal note. That can be altered in the office. There is no need for the amendment.

Amendment not moved.

Section 65 put and agreed to.

SECTION 66.

The Rule-making Authority for the Circuit Court shall be the Minister for Home Affairs with the concurrence of the Minister for Finance in respect of any matter affecting public revenue or expenditure and with the assistance of a Committee consisting of (a) five Circuit Judges selected by the Bench of Circuit Judges; (b) two practising barristers selected by the Council of the Bar of Ireland, and (c) two solicitors selected by the Council of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland. Each member of the said Committee shall hold office for five years and be eligible for re-election and casual vacancies shall be filled in accordance with the foregoing principle of selection. The Chairman of the Committee shall be such one of the five Circuit Judges as the members of the Committee shall elect.

Mr. GOOD: In the absence of Deputy Hewat, I desire to move the amendment standing in his name. It is as follows:—

To insert before Section 66 a new Section as follows:—

[Mr. Good.]

"Where any documents which would, if duly proved, be admissible in evidence are produced to the Court from the proper custody, they shall be read without further proof if in the opinion of the Judge they appear genuine and if no objection is taken thereto.

If the admission of any documents so produced is objected to the Judge may adjourn the hearing for proof of the documents and the party objecting shall pay the costs caused by such objection in case the documents are afterwards proved, unless the Judge otherwise orders."

The meaning of this addition is so obvious that it needs no words to commend it. In the discussions in connection with this Bill, we have had statements about the necessity for sending witnesses to different parts of the country, and I think it is obvious, in adopting such a clause as this, that a considerable amount of expense would be saved, because documents which require proof, of course, need witnesses to prove them, and if we can take any steps whereby the attendance of these witnesses might be avoided, we will materially assist litigants and reduce expense. I understand that this is the practice on the other side, and I am sure that if the Government can see its way to adopt this proposal it will be in the interest of litigants.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I am afraid that this amendment could not be accepted. I do not know if any modification of it might be proposed, but as it stands it could not be accepted. I take it that what Deputy Hewat and Deputy Good have in mind is principally the matter of producing ledgers or account-books in proof of claims of debt. We all know that cross-examination is a very valuable asset with either party, and that it may be open to a defendant to cross-examine, if he has matter for cross-examination, on an account that is pressed against him. The probability is that he is opposing the claim because of some challenge to some material matter in the account. I have myself from time to time seen accounts presented in court and when cross-examination was directed to them they were found to include items which were illegal under the Tippling Acts or the Truck Acts. It seems to me that the commercial community is really protected, inasmuch as they will have the right, both in the High Court and in the Circuit Court, in clear cases, to move for judgment on affidavit without trial, and if they make an unanswerable case on their ledger or account, verified by affidavits, they get their judgment as a matter of course. That is the ordinary procedure. It is only where the defendant has some matter upon which he can challenge the account that these actions ever go to trial, and if such be the case it is proper that the defendant should have the opportunity to cross-examine and apply to produce the accounts, and that the accounts should not be merely admitted to court as proof per se.

MR. GOOD: I quite agree that there are cases in connection with detailed accounts where such a course as the Attorney-General outlines is necessary, but he can recall to mind cases in which documents produced in the ordinary course, must be proved. If they can be accepted as evidence without taking witnesses to distant parts of the country it would certainly be for the convenience of the commercial community.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Perhaps I might add that if it is a mere matter of proving a particular document that is admitted, and the particular document is a genuine document, there is a simple procedure by which that can be accomplished. The party who wants to have a document admitted for what it purports to be serves notice for admission upon his opponent. If his opponent refuses to admit the document and fails afterwards to show that it is not a genuine document, he is mulcted in costs. That is one of the recognised, everyday matters of procedure under the rules of the court.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GOOD: The next amendment also stands in the name of Deputy Hewat. It is as follows:—

To insert a new Section before Section 66 as follows:—

"Wheresoever any Circuit Judge shall in any proceedings brought under and by virtue of this Act grant a Decree, dismiss or order the same shall be with such costs as are provided by this Act."

That is a clause that at present stands in the Civil Bill Act. This Clause was a great convenience in the matter of collecting small debts, and if it could be incorporated in this Bill it would be a great convenience also in the Circuit and in the District Courts.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: That point is covered by the fact that in the Rule-making Section there is provision for the making of rules dealing with liability to costs, and that is the natural place to deal with it. The rules will naturally provide that the costs should follow or be under the control of the judge.

Mr. GOOD: I understand, then, that the Rule-making Authority will deal with this matter?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Yes, and the Rules will be laid on the Table of the Dáil.

Mr. GOOD: And incorporated in the Act?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No; the Rules will be laid on the Table, and may be discussed in the Dáil if Deputies want to raise any points on them.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move:

In line 6, to delete the word "assistance" and insert in lieu thereof the words "concurrence of a majority."

The object of the amendment is to make the wording of this Section identical with that of the corresponding Section dealing with the Rule-making Authority of the High Court, that is Section 36.

Captain REDMOND: I am very glad, indeed, that this amendment has been proposed, because in the Section, as it stood, the Minister for Home Affairs would really be the ultimate and final authority for making Rules for Circuit Courts. The proposed amendment brings the Rule-making Authority for the Circuit Court into line, more or less, with the Rule-making Authority for the High Court, but at the same time I must make this observation in regard to this Rule-making Authority, that in this respect the framers of this Bill have not thought fit to go on the lines laid down by the Judiciary Report. The Judiciary Report on the subject of the Rule-making Authority for the Circuit Courts reads as follows:—

"The Rule-making Authority for the Circuit Courts shall consist of—
(a) Five members of their own body selected by the Bench of Circuit Judges; (b) two practising Barristers nominated by the Bar Council; and (c) two Solicitors nominated by the Council of the Incorporated Law Society."

But the Judiciary Committee never suggested that the Minister for Home Affairs should find a place there at all, and I must really protest in this regard, because in no previous Judicature Act that I am aware of has the Minister for Home Affairs, or one in a similar position to that which he now occupies in the Free State, had anything to do with the framing of the Rules for the various Courts. I think, that in this respect certainly, if not in all others, the Government would have been well advised to have followed the Report of the Judiciary Committee; in fact, I would very much like to know why in this particular instance they have thought fit to depart from the proposal laid down by the Judiciary Committee. I would venture to suggest, even at this late hour, though I have not put down an amendment to that effect, that they might re-consider their decision in this regard, and on the Report Stage delete from the Rule-making Authority, whether for High Court, County Court, or District Court, the Minister for Home Affairs.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I am afraid Deputy Redmond is hardly correct in saying that no similar Executive authority has been associated with the making of Court rules. In point of fact, all the judicature rules in this country up to this have been made by the Lord Lieutenant, who was the concentrated essence of Executive authority prior to the Treaty. Under the Judicature Act and in England, the rules are made in the name of the King and signed by the Secretary for Home Affairs. The reason is that under these rules vitally important matters will be dealt with, and they must be laid on the Table of the House, and there must be some person responsible to the House for them.

Captain REDMOND: May I suggest that there should be some person responsible for the rules, who should not be the Minister for Home Affairs, but the Attorney-General, and, further, may I say in reference to this matter, that it is not of those under whose names the rules are made that I am complaining. The complaint I make is that they are made by the Minister for Home Affairs. Surely the Attorney-General does not expect me or anybody at this stage of the twentieth century to believe that the King or his representative, the Lord Lieutenant, in days gone by actually made rules. We have not yet reached that stage of childishness. If that was done in the past in the name of the Lord Lieutenant, why should it not be done now in the name of the present Lord Lieutenant, the Governor-General?

Amendment agreed to.

PADRAIC O MAILLE: Tá leas-rún annseo agam le chur os comhair na Dála. Tá eagla orm nach bhfuil sé díreach in ordú, ach mar sin féin ba mhaith liom comhairle na Dála d'fhágáil air. Saoilim go mba ceart colas ar teagain na Gaedhilge a bheith ag na daoine a bheidh ag ceapadh na Rialacha.

Má cuirtear ar an gCoisde seo daoine ag a bhfuil an Ghaedhilg, tabharfar ceart agus cothrom do'n teagain. Ba cheart sin a dhéanamh.

I have an amendment which, with your permission, I wish to propose. I regret that it is not on the Order Paper but I think it is a very necessary amendment. I notice that on the Committee of gentlemen who are to compose the rule-making authority there is no mention of the Irish language. I think it should be absolutely necessary that there should be on that authority some gentlemen who would know Irish, so that nothing prejudicial to the Irish language could happen in Court. The amendment that I desire to propose is this:—

“To insert after the word ‘Judges,’ in line seven, the following words, ‘of whom two at least shall know Irish,’ and to insert after the word ‘Barristers,’ in line eight and after the word ‘Solicitors,’ in line 9, the following: ‘Of whom one at least shall know Irish.’”

I hope the Attorney-General will accept this amendment.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Before accepting the amendment formally at this stage, I would like to hear the Attorney-General and see whether the matter cannot be taken up at the next stage, after it has appeared on the Order Paper.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: This is a matter which deserves every consideration. Under Section 67 the Rules rather provide for the use of the National language, and of course under the Constitution the National language has an assured position of equality with the other language, whether in Court or elsewhere. It will be important that the rule-making authority personally should be of such a kind that full effect to that Constitutional position would be given. The most I will say at this present moment is that the Government will consider the best means of reaching that end which we certainly desire.

PADRAIC O MAILLE: Táim sásta leis an geallamhaint sin, agus, ar a shon sin, nilim cun an leas 5 o'clock. rún a chur os bhur g-comhair anois.

I am satisfied with the answer given by the Attorney-General, and on the strength of his promises I beg leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment not moved.

Question: “That Section 66, as amended, stand part of the Bill,” put and agreed to.

SECTION 67.

The Rule-making Authority for the Circuit Court may at any time and from time to time after the passing and before or after the commencement of this Act make rules to be styled "Rules of the Circuit Court" for carrying into effect this Part of this Act (except the hearing of appeals from the Circuit Court but including the hearing of appeals from the District Court) and may annul or alter such rules and make new rules. In particular rules may be made for all or any of the following matters.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move:

"In line 29, immediately after the word 'therein' to insert the words 'and the fixing and collection of fees.'"

This amendment is identical with the amendment already adopted by the Dáil in the corresponding Section of the Bill dealing with the Rule-making Authority of the High Courts.

Amendment agreed to.

Question: "That Section 67, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Question: "That Section 68 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 69.

A District Court of Justice in Saorstát Éireann shall be constituted under this Act consisting of such Justices as shall be appointed as hereinafter mentioned.

Professor MAGENNIS: I move to delete in the second line the word "Justices," and to substitute therefor the word "Justice."

This is merely the correction of a misprint. The Clause says that a District Court of Justice shall be constituted, and of course one District Justice constitutes a Court.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I am afraid the learned Deputy has missed the point. Each of these Courts is called a Court of Justice, and it is hoped that it will be a Court of Justice whether several functionaries or one dispenses justice. As a matter of fact this description of the Court is an important power, and involves an improvement of the existing law. The strictly local jurisdiction of the existing Petty Sessions District of the old removable magistrate led to great inconvenience, and it is now intended that there should be eight District Courts of Justice for the whole country, every Justice officiating for a different place, so that the decrees and judgments of a Court of Justice may run through the country, and one would not have to proceed separately if a delinquent moved to a different district. There will be one Court and not a series of Courts, and the word is deliberately chosen.

Professor MAGENNIS: I was quite aware from the Judicial Committee's report that that reform was intended, but the provision to carry it out was not quite clear. So my amendment has served the useful purpose of having a declaration made officially that the Bill contemplates the same desirable reform.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The amendment is withdrawn.

Professor MAGENNIS: I am withdrawing the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 69 stand part of the Bill," Agreed.

SECTION 70.

When and so soon as the Minister for Home Affairs has divided Saorstát Éireann into suitable Districts there shall be appointed so many Justices of the District Court as may be necessary, at such salaries as the Minister for Home Affairs with the concurrence of the Minister for Finance may fix. Provided that the number of such Justices at any time shall not exceed thirty.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move:

"In lines 44 and 45, to delete the words 'the Minister for Home Affairs with the concurrence of' and in line 45 to delete the word 'fix' and insert in lieu thereof the word 'determine.'"

The effect of the amendment is that the Minister for Finance shall have exclusive control of the amounts of the salaries of the Justices.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would like to ask on this point whether if the amendment passes the position would be that each Justice is to be considered separately, or is it to be a case of appointing one Justice at one salary and another Justice at another salary? There is no suggestion here of a scale of salaries, and, before going on with the discussion, I would like to hear from the Minister in charge whether the clause as amended, or the clause as it stands, would leave the fixing of the salaries or the determining of the salaries to the Minister for the time being. It seems to me that unless there is a specific regulation made in the Bill that there shall be a scale of salaries fixed, there may be a discrimination between one Judge and another Judge, and that is undesirable.

Professor MAGENNIS: When amendments were previously put forward that ran counter to the recommendation of the Committee, the audacious proposal was crushed with the retort that this eminent Committee had advised otherwise than the amendment proposed. And now here, in a very important particular, the unanimous recommendations of these eminent members of the Committee have been set aside. In page 13 of the Committee's report the recommendation reads, "The District Justice shall be paid a salary of £1,000 yearly, increasing by annual increments to £1,200." Now there is a very important principle involved here. Apart altogether from the possibilities which suggested themselves to Deputy Johnson, that one District Justice might have a different remuneration to another, there is this to be considered—that under the Constitution, District Justices are just as much Judges as Judges of the High Court. I may as well document my statement by quoting Article 64, "The Judicial power of the Irish Free State shall be exercised and justice administered in the public Courts established by the Oireachtas by Judges appointed in manner hereinafter provided. These Courts shall comprise Courts of First Instance and a Court of Final Appeal to be called the Supreme Court." . . . and then it goes on "and also Courts of local and limited jurisdiction . . ."

These are the Courts of local and most limited jurisdiction. According to that Article of the Constitution they are Judges. Now, Article 67 declares: "The number of Judges, the constitution, organisation of and distribution of business and jurisdiction among the said Courts and Judges, and all matters of procedure shall be as prescribed by the laws for the time being in force, and regulations made thereunder." The present Bill is the machinery for the carrying out of Article 67. In Article 68 the concluding passage runs: "The terms of appointment of Judges of such other Courts as may be created, shall be prescribed by law." That ought to include the remuneration, and, most important of all, Article 69 declares— and this is what has made me interrupt the harmony of the proceedings—"All Judges shall be independent in the exercise of their functions and subject only to the Constitution and the law."

If a Judge owes his appointment to a bureau, it might seem to the bureaucratic mind that it would follow as a natural and logical consequence that the bureaucrats could interfere with the administration of justice. I think it is most imperative, even if it were only as a matter of policy, that now that we are setting up courts of law, we should set them up under such conditions as would secure the uttermost independence of the Judge and his complete freedom from interference. Now, we do not require to be told the elementary fact of psychology that nothing gives so much independence to the character of a man as the knowledge that so long as he discharges his duties efficiently he has an adequate salary. These men who were appointed to this office should know from the beginning that they are not of the inferior rank of the servants of the Ministry, but that they are Judges, no doubt minor to the higher Judges, but at the same time placed in a status different altogether from that of mere civil servants or of anyone who is like a Centurion's servant. No one should be able to say to the Judge, even though he has a local or a limited jurisdiction, that he can go or come with the assurance that when the master says come he comes, and that when the master says go he goes.

I do not want to introduce anything that might seem irrelevant to the matter, but we do know that there was in the case of the Removable Magistrate in the past continual interference with the administration of justice from the Castle. Now, Castle Government has gone. Let us make sure that it has gone with a vengeance and that it cannot return under any other name. I would press the Minister strongly—as strongly as I am capable of pressing him—not to depart from the recommendation of the Committee in this respect. Let us fix the salaries here just as for the other Judges, by law directly, and not through the indirect intervention of the Minister.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I would like to support as strongly as possible the suggestion made by Deputy Magennis. It is a well-accepted principle that Judges should be absolutely independent and feel that they are independent of the Government or of the Ministry for the time being. The District Court will be the poor man's court. Very many cases that will crop up in ordinary everyday life will be decided there. It is no less important that the poor man's Judge should be made as independent as the High Court Judges by having their rates of salary put into the Bill and so made independent of the Ministry. Otherwise we might find that a Minister for Finance, in times of pressure, might think it advisable to say: "Take off 10 per cent. all round from the District Justices." That might lead to a state of affairs which we, who are prescribing the conditions under which justice should be administered, would not wish to see in the country. I strongly support Deputy Magennis's suggestion.

Mr. O'MAHONY: It will be remembered that in the debate on a previous portion of this Bill strong exception was taken to any interference on the part of a Minister with reference to the appointment of Judges of the High Court and Circuit Courts. So keen were Deputies in that respect that even in the matter of dress it was felt that the Minister ought to have nothing to say to it. One fails to understand why it is that District Justices should be treated with respect to salary in a different manner to that proposed for other Judges. In their case the salary is fixed at a definite figure and it is stated in the Bill. The public knows what it is going to pay for the administration of justice in connection with the two previous portions of the Bill. Is it not equally necessary and equally desirable that the salaries of the District Justices should also be fixed? As Deputy Johnson pointed out, it would be absolutely unfair if it were within the province of a Minister to fix different salaries for the District Justices operating in different portions of the country. If such a contingency arose I would recommend the Judges to form a Labour Union and insist on a flat salary.

Captain REDMOND: They have one already, but it is no use.

Mr. O'MAHONY: I think the Government ought to reconsider this Section of the Bill and treat these Justices in the very same way as the other Judges are treated with respect to salary; that is, have the salary definitely fixed. I can understand, if there is a differentiation to be made, that in so far as the present holders of offices are concerned, their salary might differ from that given to others who will be appointed, for this reason: they came into office at a time of trial and trouble, and they gave their services to the country when there was grave risk in doing so. If there is any differentiation to be made as regards salary, it should be made in their favour. Whether it is made in their favour or not it is incumbent on the Government to state specifically what salaries they are going to pay to those Justices.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: It is the intention, and always has been the intention, that the District Justices should have their positions very distinctly marked in independence from that of their predecessors, the Resident Magistrates. It is believed that they have been established in a position of independence in which they can dispense justice. As regards salary, they are protected by the Constitution from any reduction, once they have been appointed at a particular named sum, so that in so far as any attack might be made on their independence in the manner indicated by Deputy O'Connell, that is rendered impossible by Article 68 of the Constitution.

Having regard, however, to the expressions of opinion that I have heard, I will put the matter before the Minister for Finance between this and the next stage, and see whether he will be prepared to agree to any modification of this provision.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: What does the Attorney-General propose with regard to that particular amendment to Section 70? Does he propose to withdraw it for the moment?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Yes.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I am glad the Attorney-General has taken the line he has taken. I could wish he had gone further, and had accepted the amendment. I think the point made by Deputy Magennis is one of very considerable importance, and in that connection the words used by the Attorney-General himself are not without their meaning, because he stated that the Constitution gave protection against a reduction, and then the words he used in the speech he has just made were: "Once they have been appointed at a particular named sum," and it is with a view to getting that sum, both particular and named, that the argument has been made to it, and I suggest, though the Attorney-General may perhaps be reluctant to state it, that he will urge the acceptance of this amendment.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This is amendment 2, and should be to Section 70.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I realise that.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Am I to take it that leave is given to withdraw amendment 2? It is printed under Section 69, but it should be to Section 70.

Captain REDMOND: I am not altogether satisfied with the reply given by the Attorney-General. I know perfectly well, because I have had previous experience, that when matters like this are re-considered, and when a pledge has been given to re-consider them, that that does not amount at all to a committal on the part of the Government. I could not expect them to admit that, and that being so, I think that this being a very serious question, a serious constitutional question raised by my friend, Deputy Magennis, that we should get a specific reply, namely, not as to the amount of the salaries, but whether the salaries will be fixed and not left to the discretion of the Minister for Finance or any other Minister. It is a serious constitutional question, because the fixing of these salaries, no matter what the sums involved are, according to the spirit of the Constitution at any rate, should not lie from time to time in the hands of the Executive. The salaries should be fixed by the Dáil, and should be fixed by this Bill, and having been fixed, should thereby render the recipients of these salaries absolutely independent of any future action on the part of any future Executive. That being so, I think we are entitled to a little more than the promise which has been graciously given by the Attorney-General, that he will urge, or that he will ask, or that he will appeal, to the Minister for Finance to re-consider this matter. I say it is not a matter for the Minister for Finance at all; it is a matter for this Dáil in carrying out the Constitution of this Free State. I say, therefore, that it is imperative upon us, as the custodians of this State, to insist here and now, if we can, that this principle should be properly carried out, and that a salary should be fixed, and fixed by us in this Bill, and not by the present or any future Minister for Finance, or any other Minister. That being so, I trust that in some way or another the members of this Dáil who are in favour of carrying out the Constitution in this respect should get an opportunity of recording their votes.

Mr. JOHNSON: I want to support the view taken by Deputy Magennis and Deputy Redmond. I am not satisfied that the promise of the Attorney-General was a promise that anything would be done, except to consult. That is not very satisfactory. I want to emphasise the Section of the Constitution read by Deputy Magennis, and to put it to the Attorney-General that he has no option, and, as a matter of fact, that unless he is prepared to name the figure, that he ought to Report Progress until an amendment in the name of the Government is brought forward. Article 68 of the Constitution says: "The age of retirement and the remuneration of such Judges shall be prescribed by law." Now, I do not think that is capable of any other interpretation than this, that the sum to be paid has to be set out in an Act of the Oireachtas. It will not satisfy that Article of the Constitution to say that the sum to be determined by the Minister for Finance is to be the remuneration prescribed by law.

I do not think that will be contended by anyone. It seems to me that the Minister in charge of the Bill, or the Attorney-General, is bound under the Articles of the Constitution, to state in the Bill what the remuneration shall be. Deputy O'Connell's amendment, which is to follow, was the only form in which it would be possible for a non-Minister member of the Dáil to bring forward any proposition of this kind, and we consider that the needs of the case require that the salaries shall be fixed and stated in the Bill itself—it is not within the option of a private member to state any such salary. Therefore, the amendment in the form in which Deputy O'Connell has sent it in was the only form in which it could be moved by a private member. I press upon the Minister the necessity for a definite promise now that the sum shall be set out in the Bill, or else that the whole matter be deferred and Progress reported so that no division on this matter may be taken.

Mr. P. WARD: I desire to press upon the Ministry the necessity of making some amendment with regard to this Section, and to adopt, if possible, the views of the Dáil as expressed by the various Deputies who have spoken. We are dealing, here, with a body of men to whom we are allotting about 75 per cent. of the work at present done by the County Court Judges. We are dealing with men who will be holding Courts on an average of 20 per month, through various portions of the country, and men who will be very much more in local touch with the people, the Bar, and the solicitors, than will be the Judges of the High Courts and the Circuit Courts. I think it is a necessity that these men should be put in a position where they would be absolutely independent, and free from any charge, at any time, that they could be corrupted. They should be put in an independent pecuniary position where no such charge could be levelled against them.

I fail to see why discrimination should be used with regard to this particular branch. You have fixed the salaries of the High Court Judges and the Circuit Court Judges and you have made them permanent. I consider that these District Justices, appointed under this portion of the Bill, will be taking up as important a work as the Circuit Court Judges. Now there is a particular point of view that ought to be impressed upon the Ministry. Nearly 30 men have already been appointed to these positions at salaries of £1,000 a year plus travelling expenses. I am well aware they are only appointed temporarily without any guarantee from the Government that they would be permanent. The District Justices will be made permanent under this Bill. Now, everyone is aware that the services of these men were enlisted at a time of great trial when things were very difficult in the country. They have given up their practice and they undertook this work under promise of a certain remuneration. I think it is due to these men, from the Government, that the Government should here state what they are going to do with them. I do not think it is quite fair to appoint them and make them permanent under the Bill and give the power afterwards to any Minister in the Government to fix salaries that may be low or high, without giving any power to the Dáil to adjudicate upon that salary. I press upon the Government the necessity for the reconsideration of this matter.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I had asked if it would be possible to move an amendment in a certain form that might embody this, and you, Chinn Comhairle, indicated very rightly that it was not in the power of any private member to move an amendment in the form I suggested, and that if such an amendment were to come up for discussion it should come from the Ministerial benches under the provisions of the Constitution. I, therefore, now urge that in this particular section we are discussing, that all the words after the word "necessary" and before the word "provided" in Section 70, namely, "at such salaries as the Minister for Home Affairs with the concurrence of the Minister for Finance may fix," be omitted, and that the amendment moved by Deputy Duggan and grafted upon Section 42 be inserted instead. These words to run, "each District Justice shall receive a salary of £1,000 per annum and be retired after 15 years or upwards, or owing to age or permanent infirmity and shall be entitled for life to a pension of two-thirds of his salary." In other words, provision elsewhere made applicable in the Bill to other Judges shall be made applicable to District Justices and they shall be put upon a parity with them and a parity which, as Deputy Magennis has shown, the District Justice is entitled to claim under the Constitution. I do suggest the moving of an amendment of that kind from the Government benches. I think it is a matter of very great importance and a matter of fundamental principle, and I urge that some amendment on these lines be definitely promised for the Report stage by the Executive Council, which is the party under the Constitution responsible for the recommending of expenditure.

If that promise cannot be elicited now, I urge that it would be desirable that the matter now having been raised should be put to the vote. Exactly how it can come to the vote is rather a difficult matter to decide, because there is no definite amendment upon which it can be raised, unless it is raised for and against the actual Section itself. But it is perfectly clear that the sense of the Dáil is that these

District Justices should be put on the same foundation as the other Judges, and that words that have been chosen to apply to other Judges should be made to apply to these Justices. As I have said, it is pretty clear that not only is it right, but it is constitutionally required.

Professor THRIFT: I rise to support this view, and particularly to draw the Attorney-General's attention to the fact that it seems to me that the safeguard that he has referred to is not conferred by the Constitution upon these Justices. He quoted Article 68 of the Constitution, stating that that held that such remuneration may not be terminated during their continuance in office, and held apparently that that applied to all Judges. I think, if he studies the previous sentence and the rest of that Article, he will see that the sentence he has quoted only refers to the Judges of the Courts that have been named—the Supreme Court and the High Court—and, therefore, that safeguard is not included in the Constitution. It is quite a different question as to whether the next sentence, which says that the terms of appointment of all other Judges should be prescribed by law, does not insist upon the salaries of all Judges being fixed. That is quite a different question to the point to which the Attorney-General drew attention. I do not think that the safeguard that he mentions is in the Constitution, but it does seem to me that "terms of appointment" is an inclusive term which would include salary as well as duties, and that, therefore, the last sentence of that Section of the Constitution would require what is now being urged from various quarters of the Dáil.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: On the general matter, upon which so many opinions have been expressed, I can only say that I am not in a position here to give the undertaking that the salaries will be prescribed in the Bill. I do not know if the Minister for Finance and the Minister for Home Affairs have yet agreed upon the scale of salaries for the permanent appointments to District Justices. There are, of course, other ways of prescribing salaries than in the Bill. It might be done by scales which would, perhaps, be laid on the Table of the Dáil, and be subject to alteration from time to time, and so on. I can only say that I will make representation to the Minister for Finance of the opinions that I have heard here this evening, and that I will bring the matter up in some form upon the next Stage of the Bill. I am not in a position to do any more at present, and I have not been able to get in touch with the Minister.

Captain REDMOND: As the Attorney-General has said that he is not in a position to deal with the state of affairs created by the discussion of this Section, I think it is only right that we should adjourn any further consideration of the Committee Stage of the Bill. I, for one, will not assent to the passage of this Section, with only an undertaking, limited, as the Attorney-General has confessed, and very candidly confessed it must be limited, to an undertaking on his part that he will make representations to the Minister. I think that that is entirely insufficient, and I would therefore propose, before this Section 70 is passed, which an endeavour has been made to show may be in contravention of our Constitution, the Committee should adjourn to give the Attorney-General and the Ministry time to consider their position, and the position of this Section in regard to the Constitution. I think Deputy Thrift has shown perfectly clearly that this Article 68 expressly provides that in the creation of Judges for Courts, other than the Supreme Court and High Court, the terms of the appointment of the Judges shall be prescribed by law, and there is no doubt that within those terms must come the salary or the remuneration to be given to those Judges. I do not know whether I shall have a seconder, but I propose to move to report progress, in order to give the Attorney-General time.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Before the motion is put, perhaps a suggestion that might keep the discussion open while proceeding with other matters would be this: to delete all so much of the Section after the word "necessary," in line 44, to the end of the word

"fix." That will keep the matter open, and it will be raised at a later stage.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That would mean that the question of salary would be left over, and the Government would be obliged to introduce some provision with regard to the salary which could then be discussed.

Captain REDMOND: Is that an undertaking?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Surely it is. It is perfectly obvious that we cannot appoint Justices without salaries. At least we are not going back to the unpaid Justices position, and if these words are omitted it becomes an obligation on the Government to introduce some provision providing for remuneration of some kind before this Bill can go through.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: Would the Attorney-General give that consideration on the Report Stage?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The position, as the Attorney-General has explained, is: if the words which are now proposed to be deleted were deleted, the Section would read:—

When and so soon as the Minister for Home Affairs has divided Saorstát Éireann into suitable districts, there shall be appointed so many justices of the District Court as may be necessary. Provided that the number of such Justices at any time shall not exceed thirty.

That leaves the Government in the position of having provision for Justices and no provision for salary. The Government might possibly find a method, even in the Committee Stage, of introducing the question of salary, or they would be obliged to bring it up not later than the Report Stage. On the Report Stage there is a provision in the Standing Orders which says that if a matter is deemed by the Chair to be of sufficient importance, the particular Section to which the amendment applies may be re-committed for the consideration of the amendment, so that there may, even in Committee, be an opportunity for the consideration of this matter again, if it is brought up on the Report Stage. I think that would dispose of it. The position is this: The amendment, No. 2 on the Paper—in lines 44 and 45, to delete certain words—is withdrawn.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move:

That the words from the word necessary," in line 44, to the end of the word "fix," in line 45, be deleted.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The proposal is to delete the words in lines 44 and 45 "at such salaries as the Minister for Home Affairs, with the concurrence of the Minister for Finance, may fix."

Amendment put and agreed to.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That would dispose of amendment No. 3 as well.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I would like to draw the Attorney-General's attention to one point in amendment No. 3. There is nothing in the Bill showing where the money is coming from. My point is that some words should be inserted stating that the remuneration should be paid out of monies provided by the Oireachtas or from the Central Fund. It is only a matter of form, but it should be clearly known where the money is coming from. In view of the fact, however, that this matter is going to come up again, I think that would be the best time to raise it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: When the whole question of salaries is raised.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I suggest that the course suggested by Deputy O'Connell is open to one objection. It would put the District Justices on the Estimates, and that would give an opportunity to a Deputy to bring up here, which is not a court of law, the actions of a particular District Justice. I think it would be very undesirable. I think if it was stated that the salaries were to be paid out of the Central Fund it would meet Deputy O'Connell's views and avoid certain difficulties.

Mr. O'CONNELL: That would be the preferable course.

Amendment not moved.

Prof. MAGENNIS: The amendment on the Paper in my name reads:

In line 45, to insert after the word "fix" the words "provided that in the case of all District Judges already appointed and acting under the provisions of the "District Justices (Temporary Provisions) Act who are continued in office or re-appointed under this Act the remuneration by way of salary and allowance hitherto payable shall continue to be the remuneration of such Justices."

All the arguments I had to advance have been put before the Dáil by Deputy O'Mahony and Deputy Cooper, so that the amendment can go with the other one.

Amendment not moved.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move, in line 47, to delete the word "thirty," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "thirty-three." The intention was that there should be thirty District Justices outside Dublin. When the figure thirty was fixed upon the fact was overlooked that the three Divisional Magistrates for the City of Dublin become District Justices, so that the total number should be thirty-three.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question "That Section 70, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Section 71 put and agreed to.

SECTION 72.

Professor MAGENNIS: The amendment standing in my name—"In line 54 to delete the word "declaration," and to substitute therefor the word "oath" has already been disposed of.

Amendment not moved.

Question "That Section 72 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 73.

The office of any Justice of the District Court may be vacated by writing under his hand and shall be vacated on his being appointed a Judge of the Circuit Court, and thereupon or whenever the office of any Justice shall become vacant a new Justice shall be appointed in his place. In case of the illness of any Justice a deputy may be appointed to act in his place on the recommendation of the Attorney-General on such terms as to payment of the deputy out of the salary of the Justice or otherwise as may be provided by the Rules to be made under this Part of this Act. Provided however that no one other than a practising barrister or solicitor of six years' standing at least shall be qualified for appointment as deputy of a Justice.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move: "In line 5 to delete the word 'shall' and to insert in lieu thereof the word 'may.' When the Bill was drafted it was made mandatory to fill any vacancy that might arise. It would therefore be impossible to reduce the number of Justices if it was found that a lesser number could deal with the work.

Amendment put and agreed to.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE took the Chair at this stage.

Captain REDMOND: I move: "In line 8 to delete from the word 'out' to the word 'otherwise' inclusive." That amendment, in effect, means that in case of the illness of any Justice a deputy may be appointed in his place, and the deputy so appointed should not necessarily be paid out of the salary of the Justice. I think this point was raised on a previous occasion in regard to Judges of the Circuit and High Court. Certainly, in the case of a Justice who becomes ill through no fault of his own, I think it would be generally recognised to be an extreme hardship on him if he had to pay a deputy out of his salary. If necessary he could obtain a medical certificate of his illness, and though it is suggested that that would be an indignity to the High or Circuit Court Judges, I think that perhaps the Justices would suffer that indignity sooner than be asked to pay the deputy out of their own pockets. I think it is a most reasonable proposal, and I hope it will receive consideration and support from the Government.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I think a similar question arose in connection with the Circuit Courts, and my recollection is that the Minister agreed to consider it. I think a similar undertaking could be given now. This is in a somewhat different position, because the cases where the deductions from salaries are to be made are to be provided by Rules of Court. These Rules of Court will be laid on the Table and will be under the control of the Dáil. Therefore, the matter will be considered with the corresponding matter in connection with the Circuit Courts.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question: "That Section 73 as amended stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 74.

The age of retirement of Justices of the District Court shall be 65 years.

Professor MAGENNIS: I move: "In line 14 to delete the figures '65' and to substitute therefor the figures '70.'" The age of retirement recommended by the all-wise Judiciary Committee was 70 years. "It is recommended that a District or assistant District Justice or Dublin Metropolitan Justice in future shall hold office until the age of 70 years." I need not say anything further than that the Judiciary Committee which knows everything and is impeccable and infallible has recommended it.

Captain REDMOND: It is not omnipotent.

ATTORNEY - GENERAL : The amendment in that form could hardly be accepted. In the case of the Divisional Magistrates in Dublin the position is somewhat different. It is well known that people who lead sedentary lives like the Judges in Dublin preserve their faculties and the capacity to exercise their functions to a very late period, but it is the experience and the opinion that persons whose work involves a great deal of travelling, as in the case of the District Justices, cannot be expected to preserve their alertness or their ability to travel and to dispense justice to advantage. If the age of 70 is observed for the Dublin District Justices there will be always a possibility of promotion for a Country Justice. If an amendment is inserted on the Report Stage, giving an extension to the age of 70, as is now the case with the Dublin Justices, we could then deal with it.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am surprised that the Attorney-General did not bring the Minister for Finance into this. I would imagine that his influence in this matter would be with the amendment. There would be at least a postponement of the retirement and, therefore, of the pension by an acceptance of the amendment, and I would have thought that that would have been playing to the bat of the Minister for Finance. I am amused at the justification produced by the Attorney-General for fixing the age at 65. I have been learning how sedentary judges have been compelled to take the exercise, or something equivalent, which the District Justices will be required to take around the golf links. They are told that they must take exercise to keep their health. The District Justices will take that exercise, and that seems to be an added argument for raising the age to 70. The District Justices will be entitled to retire if they are physically or mentally infirm even before the age of 70, and, if it seems to the Attorney-General and the Chief Justice and other authorities, that a District Justice, having reached the age of 65, is mentally or physically infirm, I have no doubt it will be possible to bring medical influence to bear upon him to ensure his retirement. It seems undesirable to compel him to retire at 65 if he is fit to carry on until 70. Surely it is not contended that less mental capacity is required in the case of High Court Judges and of Circuit Court Judges, and I fail to understand why a District Justice should be called on to retire at 65 when Judges of the High Courts may remain in office until 70. I would urge the Attorney-General and the Ministry to accept this amendment, and I think I may venture to speak on behalf of the Minister for Finance on this matter. It certainly will save the Exchequer something.

ATTORNEY - GENERAL: I am afraid that the amendment cannot be accepted, and that the furthest we can go is on the lines I have indicated. Deputy Johnson, in referring to the exploits of persons of mature years on the golf links, does not bear in mind that on the golf links the Judge is not compelled to put up at a country hotel at every hole before moving on to the next, and has not to drive long distances in all sorts of weathers. Having regard to all the conditions of the life of the District Justice, the Government is satisfied that it should not fix a longer limit than 65 for those doing work in the country. The amendment is offered with a view to extending the time of retirement of a District Justice to 70. I do not agree with the suggestion of Deputy Johnson that the duty should be thrown on any individual or on the Government to call upon an individual Justice to retire. I am afraid the limit I have indicated is the furthest we can go.

Professor MAGENNIS: Many years ago a friend of mine applied for a Government appointment in Blantyre in Central Africa, and he inquired from the Foreign Office what was the age of retirement and the amount of superannuation. The official reply was that none of his predecessors had ever raised the question. There were two predecessors—one shot by a native and the other devoured by a tiger. According to the Attorney-General, the hard life to which these gentlemen will be subject going round country hotels will secure that the retirement at 65 will be an artificial limit, as long before they have reached that age they will have retired to a better superannuation. I hope the Attorney-General will remember his own argument when impressing on the Minister for Finance the importance of this question of proper remuneration.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I do not think that the Attorney-General has any experience of the life of a District Justice. I have known many Resident Magistrates in the old days whose duties were somewhat similar to those of the District Justices and many of them were well over 70 but were active and efficient, although in those days motor-cars were not used for the purposes of their work. It should be remembered that the District Justice does not go round on a bicycle. He will presumably put his first year's travelling allowance into a Ford car, and if he lives at a convenient place he will be able to do his work and keep in touch with his home. There will be no court more than 30 miles away from his residence. I think that this principle of compulsory retirement is wrong. If a man is able and willing to go on with his work why put him on the pension list? There is plenty of work for three District Justices in Dublin, and what about Cork and Limerick, where most of the work will be done inside the town? It is a mistake to lay down a hide-bound age for retirement, as you may get rid of a good man whom you want to keep on, while it will weigh down the pension list.

Mr. GOREY: I appeal to the Attorney-General and to the Minister for Finance on this question. In the next Section they provide for a specific age, and why remove a man if he is perfectly capable? If a District Justice wishes to continue, and if his physical capacity enables him to continue, why remove him? I do not think that any case has been made on behalf of this Section, and I hope, if the Government will not accept the amendment, it will be put to a division.

Mr. O'MAHONY: Surely it would be much more desirable in the interests of economy to extend the age. Deputy Johnson is concerned for the Minister for Finance. If the duties are so arduous, a year or two is likely to wipe out those District Justices. If you require him to retire early he is going to enjoy his pension for a longer time. I suggest if the Government are not prepared to fix an absolute age-limit of 65, that provisional arrangements such as those in Section 12 might be added to the Clause, that is, that on the advice of the Attorney-General the age of the retirement may be extended. I have heard no sufficiently convincing argument which changes the views I hold that the age of 65 is undoubtedly too early to retire, if you have the provision further down, as has been pointed out by Deputy Gorey, that if the Judge is not fit to fulfil his duties you should retire him. It is a great mistake to retire an efficient Judge at the age of 65. To my mind the fact that the Judge is living a healthy outdoor life will tend to extend his years. For that reason you will find that at sixty-five, District Justices will not be compelled to stay at country hotels. Ford cars are available now. Mentally and physically, the country Justice will be a much more efficient individual than the Judge who is living under city conditions. For that reason I think the suggestion to extend the age limit is a reasonable one and ought to be accepted by the Government.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I do not know whether the Deputy who has last spoken has any special prejudice on the matter. I would be prepared to undertake that the Government would consider an amendment on the lines of that suggested by Deputy Cooper, substituting 70 for 75.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I will not accept that. I take the President's view of a Committee, and I only accept their recommendations when I agree with them. I know a County Court Judge in England. He is 76 years of age, is doing a lot of travelling, and is still very vigorous.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: That discussion can arise on your amendment.

Professor MAGENNIS: I would be prepared to withdraw my amendment if it is the general wish of the Dáil.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would urge that this matter be pressed forward. I consider it is of importance that the view of the Dáil should be taken.

Mr. GOREY: I suggest that you deal with the matter now and put it to a division. The picture that the Attorney-General has drawn of the District Justices living in country hotels does not apply at all. The District Justice can work the whole county from his home if he lives in a suitable place. If he cannot do that he should not be appointed a Justice at all, for he is a fool. The area to be travelled over is not very large when you employ 33 District Justices for 26 counties.

Captain REDMOND: Might I suggest, as Deputy Magennis has asked leave to withdraw amendment No. 9, which stands in his and my name, and as amendment No. 11 deals practically with the same subject, and as the Attorney-General has just stated that he is prepared to consider the matter, that it is advisable for us to consider amendment No. 11 now and let No. 9 be withdrawn?

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the important decision that should be taken is whether the normal age for retirement is to be 70 or 65. The proposition of the Government is to make the normal age for retirement 65, and it was suggested that they were prepared to consider the advisability to extend the age. I prefer to think that the normal age for retirement is 70, and they may consider the possibility of extending that age and also, as they do in the next section, the possibility of removing a Justice who is physically and mentally infirm. That may be done at 65 or 60, but I think the view of the Dáil should be taken and that it should not agree to a withdrawal of the amendment.

Major BRYAN COOPER: The only thing I wanted to point out was that my amendment covers different ground, and I cannot agree to the two amendments being disposed of together.

Professor MAGENNIS: What was the procedure with respect to the granting leave to the proposer of an amendment to withdraw it?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: You must have the leave of the Dáil.

Professor MAGENNIS: Is it by a majority? Can any one member, by refusal to agree, block the withdrawal?

Mr. JOHNSON: I submit that if that point of order is taken an amendment put to the Dáil is the property of the Dáil and must be voted upon in this Dáil by universal agreement if leave is asked to withdraw it.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: That is so. If there is not unanimous agreement it must be put to the Dáil and voted on.

Mr. O'MAHONY: Would it not be more advisable to have this brought up on the Report Stage? Let the Attorney-General consult with the Government and see how far they can go in the matter.

Professor MAGENNIS: I suggest, with all respect, to Deputy Johnson that a vote so taken will not express the sense of the Dáil on the point. Personally, I shall vote against the amendment, if put to a division, although it is in my name; for the reason that I do not desire to force it on the Dáil when it has been met in a reasonable spirit by the Attorney-General. It seems to me a far better course for the discharge of business would be to allow the question to come up again. Meanwhile, a better mind may have supervened in the case of those who have opposed it.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the Attorney-General has not given any indication at all that he is prepared to consider making 70 the normal age of retirement. All he is proposing to do is to allow future Attornies-General to extend the age from 65 to 70, which is a very different thing, and it is the view of the Dáil that has now to be taken, not the view of the Attorney-General.

Mr. GOREY: In view of the Attorney-General's difficulty—I do not see many members of the Ministry sitting with him, or that he has an opportunity of consulting them—I think we ought to agree to Deputy O'Mahony's suggestion, which probably would have more real effect than a division now.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Would the Attorney-General be prepared to give consideration to the matter of extending the normal age to 70, in view of the fact that it is going to get consideration, or does he definitely state now that he will not consider that point?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: We will consider that, but without undertaking any obligation in the matter.

Mr. O'CONNELL: What I meant was that I understood the Attorney-General to say earlier in the discussion that what he would consider was that 65 would remain the normal retiring age, but that he would consider the advisability of recommending in certain cases that the age should be extended to 70. What I wish to ask is, in view of the fact that this is to be considered again, will the Attorney-General give a promise that he will consider the fixing of the normal age at 70? I am not asking him to give an undertaking that he will fix it at 70, but that he would consider the fixing of it at 70.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I will see that that is considered.

Mr. JOHNSON: I do not know whether this matter has been discussed, or whether he is prepared to consider it, in view of the full expression of opinion from the Dáil, but as I gather from the Attorney-General while he is prepared to give a verbal undertaking to consider it, his mind is made up, unless he has been impressed by the discussion. He was very definite in the earlier stages that the Government is not prepared to recede from the position taken up in the draft of the Bill, and unless one gets some expression from the Attorney-General which would give us at least a hope and some expectation of a possibility of this figure being changed, I think it is necessary to have the opinion of the Dáil upon the matter.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I do not want to prevent the opinion of the Dáil being taken, but I do not wish to indicate any note of despair.

Mr. GOREY: I am very sorry at the attitude taken up by the Attorney-General. I think he is rather pig-headed, with all due respect to him, and his attempt at wit does not help either.

Amendment put.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move:

In line 14, to add after the word "years" the words:—"Provided that in the case of a Justice of the District Court who shall have been a District Justice under the District Justices (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1923, and at the date of his appointment to the last-mentioned office was over 55 years of age and under 60 years of age, the Chief Justice may, if he thinks fit, extend the age of retirement of such Justice to such date as will enable him to complete a period of service sufficient to qualify him for a pension."

The object of that amendment is to make special provision for certain recently appointed District Justices who undertook the arduous, and at the time dangerous, duties of District Justices at a comparatively advanced age, to enable them to carry on for a sufficient time to qualify for a pension if the Chief Justice certifies.

Amendment agreed to.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I rise to move the following amendment

To add at the end of the Section, line 14, the words "but the Executive Council may on the advice of the Attorney-General extend the age of retirement in the case of any Jus-

This is rather different from the amendment which has been defeated. That made it compulsory to extend the age of retirement from 65 to 70 years of age. This amendment makes it optional for the Government, if they wish to do so, to extend the age to 75. It is precisely a similar provision to that to be found in Clause 12. It allows the Executive Council, on the advice of the Attorney-General, to give a District Justice a ten years' further term of office. That will not be done unless he is anxious to continue, and that he is thoroughly competent to do the work. I gathered that the Attorney-General is prepared to accept that suggestion so far as Dublin District Justices are concerned, up to the age of 70. I think there is a case to be made for the age of 75. The work the District Justice will be doing in Dublin is not more onerous or more responsible than that done by the Recorder of Dublin, and the Recorder of Dublin is 73 years at the present day. It is a discretionary amendment, and it need not be acted upon unless the Government wish to put it in force. It does remove the necessity, that must be unpleasant for the Minister for Finance, to pension off a man who is capable of doing work and who is willing to continue doing it. I think the proposal is a sound and economical one.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The Deputy is inaccurate. I was prepared to accept the suggestion of 70 years for all the District Justices, and it was not merely for the extension to the age of 70 in the case of the Dublin District Justices.

Major COOPER: I thank the Attorney-General. Personally, I would prefer the age of 75. I will withdraw the amendment if the Attorney-General undertakes to put down that on the Report Stage.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 74, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 75.

No Justice of the District Court shall be removable from office save for incapacity or physical or mental infirmity or misbehaviour in office or misconduct, which shall be certified under the hands of the Attorney-General and the Chief Justice. It shall be the duty of the Attorney-General and the Chief Justice to give such certificate in case they are satisfied that such incapacity or infirmity exists or that any such misbehaviour or misconduct has taken place. Any such certificate shall not be questioned or made the subject of proceedings in any Court.

Captain REDMOND: I beg to move: In line 18, after the word "Justice," to insert the words "and the President of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland." In moving this amendment, to which I do not expect any opposition from the Government Benches, my desire is to place the District Justices in the same position in regard to the power that shall be enabled to remove them, as the High Court Judges shall be placed, in regard to the similar power required in their cases. The District Justices may be Solicitors as well as Barristers, and the rule-making authority of the District Courts includes two members of the Solicitors' profession, to be nominated by the Incorporated Law Society, and I think it is only proper that the authority which should have the power to remove these District Justices for incapacity or physical or mental infirmity or misbehaviour in office or misconduct, should include one member, at least, of their own profession. That member, according to my suggestion, would be of the authority and with the authority and on the nomination of the Incorporated Law Society.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The amendment could not be accepted. It would be impossible to impose upon the annually-elected head of a private professional organisation a duty of this kind—the removing of a magistrate. The President of the Incorporated Law Society is a professional gentleman elected every year to the head of his professional organisation. He is not a person who is in any way a public officer, or in any way responsible here, and it is impossible to accept an amendment imposing on him a public statutory duty of this kind.

Captain REDMOND: Might I be allowed to remind the Attorney-General that a public statutory duty has been imposed by Section 66 on two solicitors selected by the Council of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland in regard to rule-making, and I cannot for the life of me see that if a public statutory authority is to be conferred upon the members of a profession in regard to one portion of this Bill, why it cannot be conferred on them in regard to another portion. I think that is a very thin and very flimsy reply, if I may characterise it so, to my very just and reasonable request.

Major COOPER: I think I see the Attorney-General's point, and it is that a person who changes every year might not be a suitable person. Would the Attorney-General in some way meet the case made by Deputy Redmond, because it is very desirable that the solicitors' profession should not feel that they are being discriminated against? Perhaps, he might make provision for a person selected by the Incorporated Law Society? Then, you would have one fixed person who will not vary from year to year.

Professor MAGENNIS: The argument is more specious than sound. True, some of the District Justices will be drawn from the solicitors' profession. They have the protection that their dismissal must be approved and countersigned by the head of the entire Courts of which they are officers. Every practising solicitor would be an officer of the Courts, and the Chief Justice is the head, just as the Attorney-General is the head of the Bar. Therefore, the protection which is so necessary and vital, and which Deputy Redmond is quite correct in seeking for, is provided in the Bill as it stands.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I have interviewed, on several occasions, members of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society, including the President, with reference to this Bill, and no suggestion of this kind has come from them. I do not know on what authority it is put up by Deputy Redmond. I do not know whether he is able to say that the Society would be willing to accept what is very far from an attractive duty. It is perfectly clear when the head of the Courts is one of the authorities who has to act in what is a judicial matter, that solicitors or barristers will be equally satisfied that justice will be exercised with fairness and consideration.

It is quite impossible that the Government can accept the proposal to impose upon this body, which has never been consulted, the unpleasant duty of considering the removal of a District Justice.

Captain REDMOND: I can assure the Attorney-General that I speak in this Dáil on behalf of no society, and that I speak on behalf of no organisation, and that I am speaking entirely on behalf of myself as a public representative. I can further assure him that I have not been in consultation with the Incorporated Law Society; that I have put down this amendment upon my own responsibility, that I take full responsibility for it, and I think, in the interests of the future Justices, that it is only fair that they should have one of the profession, to which a great many of them will very likely belong, to adjudicate upon their action. Now, in regard to imposing this duty upon them I do not think, I hope at any rate, it will not be a great imposition, because I feel confident that the men that shall be selected by this Government to carry out these duties of District Justice will not be men that will be called upon to relinquish their office by reason either of their incapacity or their misconduct. I would also like to add this, that I cannot see why, if two solicitors are to be part and parcel of the Rule-making authority for these Courts they should not also and equally be part and parcel of the authority which shall have power to dispense with, in certain contingencies, the persons who administer the Rules of these Courts. I do not see the inconsistency of it at all. On the contrary, I see that it would be only bringing this Section into conformity with the other Sections and portions of the Bill. To suggest because the President of the Incorporated Law Society may be one man to-day and another man to-morrow that therefore it would be futile to make him as such the determining factor in this contingency, which I trust will be a remote one, is as absurd as to say that the Minister for Home Affairs or that the Circuit Judges should not be members of the Rule-making authority of the future, because the present Minister for Home Affairs is not going to be Minister for Home Affairs for ever, even in this country; neither are the Circuit Judges going to remain the same Circuit Judges for ever and a day. Everyone of us has got to go, and therefore the suggestion that because the President of the Incorporated Law Society will not be the same President to-morrow or next year or the year after that, therefore, he should not in that capacity be given this power, which I say is a very reasonable and a very right and proper one, is, to say the least of it, absurd. I will say this to the Attorney-General—he may like to ask me whether I have consulted this body or that body in the execution of my duty here. I want to tell him here and now that I consult nobody and nothing but my own conscience and my own duty as a public representative, and that it is not in the interest of this society or of that that I move, but that it is in the interest of the public at large. I, certainly, in view of the obdurate, adamant attitude of the Attorney-General to this reasonable proposal of mine, will press it to a division.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: It is not right to take up the time of the Dáil asking that an obligation should be imposed upon a private person, the head of a private society, or the head of a private organisation, without having consulted that society or its head as to whether they are willing to accept that responsibility. The other responsibilities which are extended to the members of the profession, or to the Incorporated Law Society, have been so extended after consultation with the Society, and with its recognised authority.

Professor MAGENNIS: There is a further point. Participation in the making of the Rules is a privilege, whereas this duty that Deputy Redmond seeks to impose is a painful duty from which the ordinary individual would, if it were in his power, withdraw. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court is an institution; if I may borrow the famous phrase of Madame de Stael about Napoleon, he is more of an institution than a man. The Attorney-General is a public officer. The head of the Solicitors' profession is an elected gentleman who holds office on behalf of the solicitors for a limited period. The public are not privy to his appointment, nor he to the public. The Chief Justice is in a different position. Every solicitor practising in the Courts is in a manner subject in his conduct as a professional man, amenable to his control. The situation, therefore, is that there is an incontestable guarantee that no injustice will be done to any solicitor or District Justice, because the proper administration of the law is the duty of the head of the Supreme Court to supervise and to safeguard. The parallel which Deputy Redmond seeks to draw is not a parallel. The making of Rules is a very different thing from having the control of one of the most important transactions of public administration, to wit, the removal from his office, of a Judge. I repeat again that the District Justice is a Judge within the meaning of the Constitution. The removal of such a man from his office through alleged incapacity, misbehaviour, or misconduct, is one of the most serious things in public administration, and to decide whether or not there is a case against a District Judge is one that calls for the exercise of this great power and should not be put into the hands of a man who is not distinctly and decidedly an officer of the public.

Amendment put and negatived.

Professor THRIFT: I beg to move: "In line 22, to delete the word 'any' and to substitute therefor the word 'no,' and to delete the word 'not' in the same line."

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I accept that.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DAVIN: I beg to move: To add a new sub-section:—

"(2) Save in the case of a re-organisation or a re-distribution of Districts, no Justice of the District Court shall be transferred from one District to another without his consent. In all cases the reasonable expenses of removal of a District Justice who is transferred to another District shall be payable subject to regulations made by the Minister for Home Affairs with the concurrence of the Minister for Finance out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas."

The clause as it stands gives security to Justices against dismissal by the Executive Council, or a Minister, but it is quite possible that a Minister might be anxious to harry or worry a District Justice who was behaving in an obnoxiously independent way, and it is for the purpose of safeguarding the District Justice against such interference that this amendment is being put forward. I do not claim, in the words of the amendment, to give an absolute security of tenure in a particular area to a District Justice, but, if the Government wish to avail of the services of any exemplary Justice for the purpose of teaching a lesson in other areas, this amendment makes a claim for reasonable expenses of removal of such a Justice. It is for that purpose I move the amendment, and I hope the Attorney-General will accept it.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The Government are not prepared to accept this amendment. While it is undoubtedly the case that under the old regime there was a possibility of very undesirable operations upon the magistrates, the predecessors of the District Justices, the position now is so far changed with a Parliament here upon the spot where anything of that kind can be raised and challenged immediately, that public representatives have such control that it is impossible to imagine operations of that kind being carried on corruptly, or with the ulterior motives to which Deputy Davin refers.

On the other hand, it may be desirable from time to time to change a Justice from one district to another. A man may be more suitable to a Southern temperament than to a Northern, and vice versa, and it may be necessary, in the honest administration of the provisions of this Act, to change a Justice from one part of the country to another. The very fact that you have here a Parliament in session, a Parliament able to challenge the action of a Justice and to call for an explanation, if it needs explanation, makes unnecessary the provision which the Deputy suggests, a provision which in other times might have been prompted by the fact that you had a Government without responsibility which did move people for particular motives which could never be challenged. For that reason the amendment is not acceptable.

Mr. JOHNSON: In the previous discussion, the Attorney - General rather wisely deprecated the invocation of the Dáil, or of the Minister, in any matter affecting Justices or Judges. That is a sufficient answer to that part of his reply to Deputy Davin where he spoke of the Dáil being in session and that questions might be raised. I think it is undesirable except in very extraordinary circumstances, that the conduct of Judges should be brought into question or that even the conduct of the Ministry for the time being in relation to the Judges, should be brought into question. There may be some other reasons besides those which have been stated by the Attorney-General, but it seems to me that it should not be quite within the option of the Ministry to transfer a Justice without his consent, and in such cases, where there are transfers made, there ought to be some allowance made for the cost of removal, and that is not provided for in the Bill as it is drafted. I think the Attorney-General did not refer to that part of the amendment in his remarks.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I am not sure whether, in point of fact, the expenses of removal would be allowed as a matter of course or not. That is a matter I will have inquired into before the next stage of the Bill is reached.

Mr. DAVIN: Would the Attorney-General be prepared to give an undertaking that he would consider the amendment and bring forward on the Report Stage some suitable way of meeting the case I have made?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I take it what the Deputy means is whether a check of some kind might be imposed upon the removal or change of a Justice from one place to another. I will have that considered.

Mr. DAVIN: And on the question of expense also.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Yes.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question— "That Section 75 as amended, stand part of the Bill"—put and agreed to.

SECTION 76.

All Justices of the District Court shall be entitled to pension, subject to the same conditions and on the same scale as Civil Servants. Provided that any Divisional Justice aforesaid or any District Justice under the District Justices (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1923, who may be appointed a Justice of the District Court shall be entitled to count time served as a Divisional Justice or a District Justice under such last mentioned Act as time served as a Justice of the District Court hereunder.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move the following amendment to this Section:—

In lines 24, 25, and 26, to delete all from the words "All Justices" to the words "Civil Servants," inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following words:—

"Subject to his being in good health at the date of his appointment to the office, the office of a District Justice shall be a pensionable office within the Superannuation Acts, 1834 to 1919, and the pension, gratuity or allowances granted to or in respect of a District Justice on his retirement or death shall be ascertained in the manner and subject to the conditions prescribed by those Acts, and a certificate by the Chief Justice shall be a sufficient certificate for the purposes of Section 8 of the Superannuation Act, 1859."

The amendment does not in any way alter the effect of the clause as it stood originally. It merely states in a more definite way the terms under which a District Justice becomes entitled to a pension.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: The opening words of this amendment "Subject to his being in good health at the date of his appointment to the office," seemed to me to afford an example of unconscious humour. I would like to have heard a little more explicit definition from Deputy Duggan in moving this amendment of exactly what responsibility is involved and as to what the subsequent operations are likely to be. The opening phrase of the amendment says, "Subject to his being in good health." Surely it might start off by saying that no man shall be appointed unless he is in good health. How is it to be discovered at a subsequent date with no medical certificate available that at the time he was appointed some years before he was in good health or not in good health. I ask has the phrase any meaning at all? If it has not any meaning whatever, why, then, I ask, put it into this amendment?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The Section as it stood originally contained the expression "subject to the same conditions and on the same scale as Civil Servants." It did seem to us that it was not desirable that Judges should have that suggestion made that they were in the position of Civil Servants. From the original wording of the Section it might be supposed that they were in any way subordinate to some Department or Ministry, and it was accordingly decided to change that and substitute the clause introducing the provisions of the Superannuation Act. It makes no substantial alteration. The provision as to good health merely involves producing a medical certificate at the time of appointment so as to qualify afterwards for a pension. The Chief Justice is substituted for the head of the Ministry or Department. Otherwise there is no substantial alteration.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would like to congratulate the Attorney-General and the Ministry for this revision, because Section 76, as drafted, was in keeping with certain other sections in suggesting that the Justices were to be placed in the category of Civil Servants. There are two or three other suggestions, and when we were speaking of the age retirement being 65 that rather emphasised the fear that the Justices were to be considered as Civil Servants. I am very glad to find that that defect in the Bill has been amended at the instigation of the Ministry itself.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: The point to which the Attorney-General directed his remarks and the point taken up by Deputy Johnson is one with which I am in entire agreement. I think the substance of the amendment is of very great importance indeed, that these District Justices should be appointed in a manner different from the manner of appointment for Civil Servants. I was merely addressing myself to the question with regard to the opening sentence of the amendment and as to what would be its effect. Would it not be very much better, and I put this now to the proposer of the amendment definitely, that the amendment should begin with the second phrase, and that the words, "the office," in the second line, "the office of District Justice shall be a pensionable office," omitting the words, "subject to his being in good health at the date of his appointment to the office."

Mr. GOREY: Personally, I can imagine no form of words more calculated to lead to future law suits or to more contention than these, "subject to his being in good health at the time of his appointment to his office." If at the end of ten or twelve years a District Justice is retired, who is to decide the question of his being in good health at the time of his appointment? What evidence can be produced? I can conceive nothing more conducive to lengthy law suits than the effort to prove whether a man was in good health or not. There is no necessity for such a form of words at all.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The intention is that only men fit and capable for the position will be appointed. The idea is that at the time of appointment they would satisfy the Ministry that they are fit. I shall certainly consider the suggestion of Deputy Gorey as to ambiguity because it is not intended that the matter should be re-opened subsequently. The idea is that the Ministry, when making these appointments, should be satisfied that they are appointing fit men for the particular offices, and I will consider the wording with a view of making that clear.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Still it would be in the power of the ordinary Minister at any time, though not the wording of the Bill. They have the power to appoint, they have the power not to appoint, and they need not appoint on medical grounds. I suggest that the amendment might begin:

“The office of District Justice,” leaving it to the Ministry at the time to say whether such and such a person should or should not be appointed for a variety of reasons, health being included amongst them.

Professor MAGENNIS: Does Deputy Darrell Figgis suggest that some deserving member of the Bar or of the Solicitor's profession should not be appointed a District Justice simply because he does not happen to come up to the standard of good health, as some doctor understands it? I think Deputy Darrell Figgis is in a facetious mood upon this point, but it was not to deal with the jocosity of the Deputy that I rose, but to have the guidance of the Leas-Cheann Comhairle, upon a very important matter. The amendment which follows in my name is to delete lines 24-26 from the words, “All Justices” to the words, “Civil Servants,” inclusive. That is identical with the beginning of Deputy Duggan's amendment, and the second part of mine is to substitute the provisions of Section 43 above. That is, in other words, to treat these judges as all other judges are treated; and that would have the effect of carrying out Deputy O'Connell's intention to the effect that the remuneration and pension payable to every Circuit Judge shall be payable out of the Central Fund, in like manner as they are payable to the Judges of the High Court and of the Supreme Court. Now, it occurs to me that I would like to have your decision as to whether, if Amendment 15 is passed, my amendment goes by the board; yet the spirit of both is identical in so far as they are amendments aiming at the deletion of these words, to prevent any person getting a wrong impression that these District Justices are the servants of the Ministry; in other words, an impression that might have been conveyed by Section 70, as it stood originally, is to be made impossible. Now, so far, I am with the amendment of Deputy Duggan, but after all the proposal is a proposal to make them, for the purposes of superannuation Civil Servants, although it is not to be stated. Now I would suggest that the dignity of the office, and its capacity to impress the public, so as to have its proceedings and its decisions received with proper respect and obedience, would be better served by leaving them in the position in which the Circuit Judge is left, and I would respectfully urge that upon the Attorney-General and the Ministry. These, as has been said repeatedly since the discussion began, are the poor men's judges. They will be concerned with 75 per cent. at least of the litigation of the Counties, and the standing of the judge is therefore of the last importance. If litigants in the courts get the impression that the judge is not paid better than the State Solicitor of the County or the Clerk of the Court, it will not make for that desirable end: the treatment with respect and the acceptance obediently of the decision of the District Justice. It seems to me, therefore, that since it does not involve any expenditure larger than it is intended, and as it does not commit the Exchequer to any undue extravagance, and does elevate the status of the District Justice, it would be far better to apply to him mutatis mutandis the words in Section 43.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The pension provisions in the case of the Judges of the other Courts are not capable of being applied to the District Justices for this reason. District Justices are appointed at a much younger age and are capable of working out their pensions in the ordinary way in the ordinary process of time. Judges of the other Courts are usually appointed and will continue to be appointed, I suppose, at later ages, when it becomes almost impossible to work out their pensions under the Superannuation Acts, and for that reason they have to be dealt with on a special basis to enable them to qualify for pensions in a special way. These reasons do not apply in the case of District Justices, whom it will be necessary to appoint at a considerably younger age, and who can, therefore, be allowed to qualify for pensions on the ordinary lines.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Amendment 16 not moved.

Question: “That Section 76 as amended stand part of the Bill,” put and agreed to.

Section 77 ("Temporary Assistant Justices") was agreed to and added to the Bill.

SECTION 78.

The District Court shall have and exercise the following jurisdiction:—

A.—In Civil Cases—

(i) In contract and breach of contract where the claim does not exceed £25.

(ii) In tort (except slander, libel, criminal conversation, seduction, slander of title, malicious prosecution and false imprisonment) and claim for damages unconnected with contract where the claim does not exceed £10, provided that no Justice shall have jurisdiction when a bona-fide question of title to land is in issue and the act giving rise to the proceedings before him was done bona-fide in assertion of such title.

(iii) In ejectment for non-payment of rent or overholding in any class of tenancy where the rent does not exceed such sum as amounts or might amount to £26 per annum.

B.—In Criminal Cases:—In any of the following cases, if the Justice shall be of opinion that the facts proved against the accused constitute a minor offence fit to be tried summarily and the accused shall elect to be so tried—

(i) In larceny, receiving, embezzlement or false pretences—Jurisdiction where the money or property involved does not exceed £20 in value.

(ii) In assault—Jurisdiction in assault occasioning actual bodily harm.

(iii) In indecent assault—Any such case may be heard in camera.

(iv) In burglary or housebreaking or attempts at either.

(v) In riot or unlawful assembly—Jurisdiction in cases in which the Justice shall be of opinion that the crime was not in furtherance of an organised conspiracy or if it was in furtherance of an organised conspiracy.

nised conspiracy that such conspiracy is at an end.

(vi) In malicious damage to property—Jurisdiction in cases of damage not exceeding £20.

Provided that a sentence of six months' imprisonment with or without hard labour shall be the maximum sentence to be imposed in any of the said cases disposed of summarily. Provided also that any criminal cases not disposed of summarily shall be sent forward for trial (subject as in this Act otherwise provided) if within the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court to the Judge of the Circuit within which the District lies and if not within such jurisdiction to the next ensuing Court of the High Court (Circuit for the District or to the Central Criminal Court in cases within its ambit.

C.—In licensing cases:—All licensing jurisdiction heretofore exercised by Justices of the Peace at Petty Sessions or at Quarter Sessions or by Courts of Quarter Sessions or by Recorders or by Justices of the Peace out of Petty Sessions except the power of granting new licences conferred on the Circuit Court by Section 50 of this Act.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move:—

In page 15, lines 41 and 42, to delete the words "the following jurisdiction" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "all powers, jurisdictions, and authorities which immediately before the 6th day of December, 1922, were vested by statute or otherwise in Justices of the Peace sitting at Petty Sessions and also (by way of addition and not of exception) the following jurisdictions."

The effect of that is to transfer to the new District Courts the jurisdiction of the old Justices of the Peace, and to effect that transfer without reference to the District Justices (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1923, which is only a temporary Act and will shortly expire.

Amendment put and agreed to.

R

Mr. BEAMISH: I beg to move:—

In page 15, line 45, to delete “£25” and to substitute therefor “£5.”

Under Section 78, page 15, line 45, it is proposed to transfer much business heretofore dealt with by the County Court Judges to the new District Courts presided over by District Justices. Decentralisation may be generally assumed to encourage the tendency to inefficiency, and it is therefore clear that cogent reasons involving a distinct improvement in laws as they at present exist must be advanced and proved before so serious a change takes place which, while benefiting a few individuals will, on the other hand, tend to depreciate the effort to sustain justice and efficiency for the community at large. The old adage “where the carcase is there will the eagles be gathered together,” has a distinct bearing upon this question. Once we proceed to divide the carcase into many minor portions the eagles may disappear and we may find ourselves relegated to smaller birds who do not possess the power of pressing forward justice with the strength or the ability of the former eagles. This would constitute a distinct loss to the community in general.

It may be found that the work sought to be imposed upon a District Justice under the Bill is beyond the physical powers of such a District Justice who, in exercising all the jurisdiction of a former Resident Magistrate, is at present engaged to his full capacity, especially as to time. A District Justice so pressed and, perchance, without the full qualification of the former County Court Judge, may at times be tempted to rush his judgment to the detriment of the justice which he is desirous to administer. Most complicated legal questions would have to be dealt with by the District Justices, by thus transferring, say seventy-five per cent. of the existing County Court administration to the District Courts. Most of the present Clerks of the District Courts are officials having no previous experience in dealing with the legal work of the Petty Sessions, to say nothing of further important work that it is proposed by the Bill to hand over to them, and, when we add to this fact that the proposed District Justices may not possess the qualifications of the former County Court Judges, a serious danger at once arises that the administration of the law may be derided and errors may arise as the result of the proposed change.

This amendment may increase the number of the Circuit Court Judges; but, despite the increased expenditure thus involved upon the State, the law will be, in all probability, more efficiently administered to the benefit of the general community. It may be admitted that local sympathy is generally extended to the local defendant. On the other hand, if such sympathy is thus extended without any true reason, the general local community may be injuriously affected to the sole benefit of the individual interested.

In addition to what has been stated, the result of such a transfer of legal business would be that litigants in such Courts would be unable to provide legal assistance except at an expense out of all proportion to the sum involved in the litigation. General credit will be at once curtailed and the prosperity of the community will be diminished. It would, therefore, appear wiser to legislate rather for the general welfare of the majority, even at a slight sacrifice, on behalf of the individual. Many of these District Courts are held in country districts far removed from the place of business of any solicitor. Naturally, no solicitor would incur the expense of attending such a Court, and the great loss of time involved, for any fee in proportion to the amount at issue in the case. This is clearly not in the interest of the public. On the other hand, the Circuit Court is held in the principal town of the county, where there are resident practising solicitors available at all times, who, under the present County Court scale of charges attend to small cases at a cost to the client of a few shillings for professional charges. Independent of this reason, it is considered that the Circuit Courts are in every way more fitted to deal with the large and varied business proposed to be transferred than the District Courts.

Under the proposed amendment the District Courts would still have jurisdiction in cases of contract and breach of contract where the claim does not exceed £5, and it is considered that this is as far as the extended jurisdiction should go.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I gather that I need only say a word upon this, and it would be this, that in all the proposals of this Bill I do not think there was anything for which there was so general and insistent a demand as that we should give to the District Justices a jurisdiction in small debts and similar cases to dispose of them locally, expeditiously and cheaply for the people. In fact, for months past we have had representations from all over the country urging that even during the temporary period of the District Justices that jurisdiction should be conferred upon them. It was not feasible, but we feel that in this provision we are giving the people a thing that has certainly been generally and universally demanded.

Amendment put and lost.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: The amendment in my name is:—

In page 15, line 45, to delete “£25” and to insert in lieu thereof “£10.”

I have decided, after mature consideration, to withdraw this amendment, as I consider that the £25 jurisdiction is more compatible with modern considerations than £10.

Amendment not moved.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: On a point of order—I do not raise this in any contentious spirit, but merely as a matter of guidance for the future—if there do happen to be three names to an amendment, and the first of them wishes to withdraw, does he withdraw the amendment or does he merely withdraw his support of it?

AN LEAS CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I called the amendment, and there was no one to say a word in favour of it. I took it that none of the other Deputies wished to move the amendment.

Mr. BEAMISH: The next amendment in my name is:—

To delete Clause A. (ii), page 15, lines 46 to 53.

This is practically the same as the other amendment which I moved and I think, therefore, it is better to withdraw it.

Amendment not moved.

Professor THRIFT: I beg to move:—

In Clause A (ii), line 48, to delete the word “claim,” and to substitute therefor the word “claims.”

This is another verbal amendment. In moving it I would suggest that perhaps a better verbal amendment would be to put the word “a” before “claim” in line 48, but certainly as it stands it is hardly correct.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I accept the word “claims.”

Amendment put and agreed to.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I beg to move:—

In clause A (ii), to delete lines 50 to 53 and to insert in lieu thereof the words “Provided that no Justice shall have jurisdiction when a bona fide question of title to land is in issue and the act giving rise to the proceedings before him was done bona fide in assertion of such title unless the Poor Law Valuation of the land the title to which is in issue does not exceed £10 in which case the Justice shall have no jurisdiction subject as in this Act provided, to try the case and to decide the issue of title involved.”

This Bill, in giving District Courts jurisdiction in actions for debt and contract up to £25, and up to £10 in actions for damages, makes a very valuable proposal. It will be a very valuable enactment and will be of great service to poor people in the remote parts of the country. But it has a very grave defect. It does not give any title jurisdiction to the District Courts. About 70 per cent. of the cases in counties like that which I represent are concerned with questions of title—disputes about rights of way, fences, water rights, etc.—and to my mind it will be an intolerable hardship if people are compelled to travel long distances to Circuit Courts to have such cases decided. These cases must arise among small farmers, because land is more valuable to the small man than to the big farmer. A great deal of the disturbance and the unsettled conditions among the people in the remote districts arise from these little contentious disputes.

I take a case from my own county of two neighbours from Tweedore or Rosses, whose valuation would not exceed £2, and who have a dispute about a piece of rocky land or about a fence. Under the Bill, if this Amendment is not accepted, these poor people will have to travel to a Circuit Court, a distance of 50 or 60 miles, bringing with them a host of witnesses, and perhaps have to stay away three, four or five days. I am perfectly certain, since the District Justices are lawyers, that these small cases could be better dealt with in local Courts, where the witnesses could walk to the trial and where the Justice, if necessary, could inspect the ground. We have been listening to the amendments which have been suggested, and I have been amazed to find that the interests of the people, who have to bear the expenses, are not receiving much consideration. If it concerns the professions the whole subject is examined carefully, but we have not had a single agency making itself vocal on behalf of the people who are to be saddled with taxes, so that law may be made convenient and cheap. I think that is wrong, and I hope that I will not have any opposition to this amendment from the Minister in charge of the Bill. A great many of the public Boards in my constituency have passed resolutions calling for such jurisdiction, and there is a very strong feeling in favour of it. I believe that what applies to Tirconnail applies also to other counties. If you side-track this little concession, which is going to give facilities that are needed, or if you withhold these facilities in the interests of any profession, a wrong is going to be done.

Mr. WHITE: I appeal to the Attorney-General to accept the amendment. Three-fourths of the litigation in the County Courts in counties like Tirconnail was made up of small title cases, rights-of-way, water and grazing disputes, and, as Deputy McGoldrick stated, were carried on between small farmers, men with small valuations. If title jurisdiction is put into the hands of the District Justices they will be in a position to decide such cases. By doing so, the Attorney-General will be rendering a great service to poor men, as he will give them cheap law. As the District Justice is a trained lawyer, he will be in a position to decide such cases as well as a Circuit Judge. As a result, a large amount of money will be saved to poor people all over the country. I have experience of litigants travelling from remote places like Malin Head to the county town of Lifford, a distance of 60 miles, across two railways, the whole matter in dispute not being worth 5/. If these title cases are to be continued in the Circuit Courts, money will be put into the pockets of solicitors, whose interests have already been well safeguarded in the Bill. I appeal to the Attorney-General to accept the amendment, as by doing so justice will be done to the people in counties like Tirconnail.

Mr. O'CONNELL: The next amendment is in my name and embodies in the first paragraph the same idea as is put forward by Deputy McGoldrick in the present amendment. I strongly support the object of the amendment while not committing myself exactly to the wording, which I have not closely studied. As other Deputies have pointed out, it is true that in areas where there are small land holders, and where land is precious, they have not much to fight about except small pieces of land. In the old Petty Sessions Court, title cases could not be heard or adjudicated upon, the idea, I suppose, being that the magistrates were not lawyers and could not readily deal with questions of the kind.

Questions of title were therefore sent forward to the County Court Judge. What often happened in cases which did not strictly arise out of land disputes, assault cases, or something of that kind, was that a clever lawyer always managed to plead that a question of title was involved, and thereby prevented the local magistrate from deciding the issue. He put the onus on the opposing party to bring his case forward to the County Court, knowing, perhaps, beforehand that the other party would have great difficulty, owing to the cost, in bringing it forward to the County Court and would possibly let it drop. It was, I believe, a well-known trick in the game to plead title in such matters. As I understand the position now, it is open to a barrister or a solicitor to make the same points in these District Courts. I see no reason why these small title questions should not be decided in the District Court, and I support the idea put forward in the amendment of Deputy McGoldrick.

Mr. BAXTER: A later amendment which stands in my name is in essence that of Deputy McGoldrick. Those of us who come closely in contact with rural life will agree that 80 per cent. of the cases which went before the County Courts previously were petty cases in which title was involved. We were accustomed to see ten or twenty witnesses coming distances of sixty miles into the county town, sometimes having to stay there two or three days and spending, perhaps, half the proceeds of the work on their farm on small matters involving, perhaps, five or ten shillings. Now, unless the District Justice gets jurisdiction, we are to continue that system, and the poor man is not going to benefit. I think it only fair that this Dáil should take into account the position of the poor man, and if possible accommodate him. It may be argued, of course, that the District Justice may not be capable of deciding questions of title. In many cases it is not difficult to decide questions of title. If it were possible for the District Justice to go into the field or path where the dispute arises and spend five minutes there he would act with more justice to all sides than a County Court Judge or a High Court Judge would in two days. That is a point which the Dáil should take into account, and if the Attorney-General adopts that point of view he would be doing the best possible service to the poor of the Saorstát.

Mr. DOHERTY: I desire to endorse the statements made by my brother members from Donegal. In this matter it is a positive nuisance and injustice that poor people should be put to the great expense of proving title. In Donegal there is really no such thing as title, but whenever transactions in land and property take place poor people who have to live by the sweat of their brow have to come to the county town to establish a title. I hope the Attorney-General will accept the views unanimously expressed by the members from Donegal.

Mr. WARD: I am not one of the unanimous members from Donegal in regard to this proposal, for several reasons. One of these reasons is not, as Deputy White suggested, that the dropping of this amendment would put more money into the hands of professional gentlemen. As a matter of fact it would pay the profession better if these cases were tried by District Courts at a scale fee. We have had statements here that 75 per cent. of the business of the County Courts at present is taken up with title cases. I should have just as good an idea of the work of the County Courts as some of the Deputies who have already spoken. At the last Sessions there were about seventy or seventy-five defended cases, and I would like to know how many of them were title cases. There were not more than three or four. The reason that some Deputies believe that the Courts are taken up so much with title cases is that these cases drag on for a whole day. That is one of the reasons why I am opposing this amendment. You have to consider upon what Court you are conferring jurisdiction. A District Justice in Donegal has to attend about twenty Courts in one month.

You have already conferred on him a big jurisdiction. He has a time table fixed a year before for the whole area where he will hold his Courts. He has to hold a Court in Dungloe, the home town of Deputy McGoldrick. He may be due the next day at Carndonagh, the home town of Deputy White. Listed before him in Dungloe there may be 10, 20 or 40 cases. If a title case comes first, it may last the whole day, and then he has to adjourn until next month.

Mr. WHITE: He can re-cast his time table.

Mr. WARD: He cannot, because he does not know what will arise. I say it is of more expense to the public to [Mr. Ward.] give this jurisdiction to the District Court. You will drag witnesses there, but if they do go to a Circuit Court Sessions the Judge there has the power of carrying on from day to day and will hear them eventually. £10 valuation is the amount specified in the amendment. I wonder does the Deputy realise how many farms in the County Donegal are under £10 valuation? I think at least a half.

Mr. WHITE: Three-quarters.

Mr. WARD: That would mean that all the law in that county would be handed over to the District Justice. You cannot ask men to do more than they are able to do. These men have to cater for a big area on stated days and hours of those days. I have met many litigants in these title cases and I have not heard any expression that they were anxious to go into the Sessions Courts. I do know they were always anxious to have them fought out to a finish in the County Court. I do not know that they want their cases rushed. They want all the time possible devoted to those cases. Witnesses, maps and engineers are produced in the Courts. One point was made by Deputy White, that the solicitors did not want to lose these cases. It would be better for the solicitors' profession if jurisdiction were given to the Sessions Courts. Solicitors only practice in a certain number of towns in any county. The nearest town to Dungloe is Letterkenny. To come to a District Court in Dungloe solicitors will charge special fees. Deputy White knows that when a solicitor has to travel out of his own town he charges a special and very heavy fee. Those are much higher than the costs a man would have to pay at his own County Court. One thing is omitted. There is in this Bill an amendment adopted by which the Circuit Judge has the power of transferring to the District Judge any business he thinks fit. If solicitors, by consent, agree that that can be heard by a District Court Justice, it is very easy to have that done. The case can be transferred on the ground of witnesses. It will be more convenient for witnesses to attend at the District Court. That would meet the case. If you put all this jurisdiction on to the District Justice he will not be able to compete with the work.

Mr. WHITE: Deputy Ward is speaking from a professional point of view as a solicitor. Deputies McGoldrick, O'Doherty, Baxter and myself are speaking from the point of view of the poor man litigant, and we consider we have a right that our argument should be considered here. I have experience of County Courts and Assize Courts, and I know what consideration the poor man will get from County Assizes, say, at Lifford. Probably the Court will be adjourned or sent on to Derry City. The amendment is a humane amendment and is proposed in the interest of the poor man and the poor litigant. Three-quarters of the valuations of the farms in Tirconnail are under £10. I have seen Sessions in Lifford where there were 23, 24 or 25 title cases. I had often to put my hand in my pocket and lend money to those poor people to help to pay their expenses at Lifford and Strabane. If the litigant were defeated he had to go into the bank to pay the solicitors' costs. Every interest has been well supported in the Dáil, that of the Judges, District Justices, Circuit Judges, solicitors, except the interests of the poor man, and we are here to support the interests of the peasant. I think under the circumstances that extending the title jurisdiction to the District Justices where a valuation of £10 is concerned is reasonable, humane, and ought to be accepted.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Deputy Ward made a very clear and persuasive speech, but I think he made one superficial point when he spoke of the District Justice working a time-table. He works a monthly one. The Circuit Judge works a yearly one. Which is more disadvantageous to the litigant—to have his case adjourned for a month in his own local Court, or for three months to one 30 or 40 miles away? He adjourns a case and cannot finish it until he has been to Manorhamilton, Cavan or Monaghan. On the point of finance there is nothing to be said. I notice Deputy Ward did not answer Deputy Baxter's point that if you go and look at a place you can give an accurate decision, and it would be easier for the District Justices to do this and easier for them to settle the case by doing it. The advocacy in District Courts will be in the hands of solicitors. In dealing with questions of title it is my opinion that solicitors are better than barristers unless the barrister is a Chancery barrister who has specialised in that work. Solicitors are dealing with titles every day. They are used to the forms and used to looking into mortgages. Titles are solicitors' business. I say you will have more instructive advocacy if those cases are tried under District Courts than if they are tried, as a sort of by-product, in the Circuit Courts.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I merely wish to say that I hope the Government will not be influenced by the argument of expediency in this, because a very important principle is at stake, and the expediency of whether the time-table of the District Justice is able to accommodate itself to the requirements of the community or not is not a question that should be entertained by the Government at all. What we want is to give to these people the chance of having their little cases settled in a convenient, cheap way and not as in the past, when they had to drive from pillar to post at enormous expense. I can understand Deputy Ward, who is, perhaps, not so conversant with the requirements of the litigants as with another side of the business, and which possibly accounts for the curious view that he took on this question. However, I am sure at bottom he is as anxious as we are to facilitate the people, but at the same time he will understand that if a man has professional obligations he stands up to them, as he stands up to his obligations as a representative of the people to get for them the facilities they require in these cases. I hope the Government will accept this amendment, because no other part of the Bill is so faulty as this. It is the only real fault that I see in the Bill, that it does not give title jurisdiction to the District Courts. I think my amendment a very moderate one. The average valuation in the county of Tirconnail is £8, so that this will cover a great number of the cases where litigation would arise among people in the remoter districts where the population is very congested, and where these disputes are numerous, and I ask the Government to accept the amendment and not to be guided by any desire for expediency at the expense of the people.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think Deputy McGoldrick has fairly expressed the views of most of us who are democrats from Tirconnail, but I think he has been rather hard on my friend, Deputy Ward. He is representing the professional side of the case, but he does not touch the side of the subject which concerns these unfortunate people who have no title in many districts. In my own district there are 3,500 families without any title whatever to the land that they occupy, and when they come up to the courts to establish a title they will have to employ Deputy Ward who, I hope, the Attorney-General will not forget would make an excellent District Justice. They will have to employ a professional man. I strongly urge on the Attorney-General that this amendment should be accepted.

Mr. JOHNSON: I want to support the amendment, or, at least, the idea behind the amendment. I prefer the form of the next amendment. But one would imagine from the arguments of Deputy Ward that the question of the jurisdiction had to be subordinated to a very small detail which fixes the number of District Justices. If we think that the primary purpose of the Bill is to appoint 33 District Justices, and the work of the Courts must be adjusted to fit in with 33 District Justices, then Deputy Ward's case is a good one, but only if we assume that. If it turns out that the amount of work to be done by these District Justices is too great for the number allotted to the country, then it is a very much easier matter to appoint more District Justices to satisfy the needs of the litigants and not to ask that the litigants should adjust their litigation to the number of District Justices. And, I think it is well worth reminding the Dáil that this is not a case that affects County Tirconnail alone. There is no clause in the

Bill, or in the amendment, which confines the jurisdiction in this matter to the County of Tirconnaill, and from the information that has come my way, the demands of the people are that the District Justices should have their powers extended to cover the cases referred to in the amendment. I think Deputy Ward had in mind the allegation that very many people in the country live for the day when they will have a burst in the courts. That is a luxury that, I think, ought not to be encouraged. We ought not to encourage the people to live for that day when they will make their entry in the courts and when the competition will be as to the number of witnesses they will bring, and to have a regular blow-out. We know that that happens, but it is desirable, I think, that we should restrain the wish to have that great day, and the case for allowing the District Justice to have jurisdiction in such matters of title where he can, as has been pointed out, easily deal with the dispute on the spot where it comes from in the category of a conciliator even, before he comes to decide, is a good one. He is on the spot, and he can easily see what is at the bottom of the dispute. It seems to me that the case for easy and cheap litigation demands that this amendment, or some such amendment, should be agreed to. I hope the Attorney-General will agree, or will indicate that he is prepared to accept some slightly amended form which will embody the purpose of the amendment, and I would like to have his view before this matter is discussed further.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: I think at the best only a superficial case has been made for the amendment, which, on analysis, cannot be sustained. Its central ideas seem to be economy and the convenience of litigants. I say nothing as to the convenience. It is true that to have the case heard in the district would be a convenience, but when we turn to economy what are the facts? It is suggested to have the jurisdiction of the District Justices extended to valuations not exceeding £10, but let me point out that a £10 valuation does not represent the value of the land. It is very much higher, as anyone knows who has put up land of a £10 valuation for sale. Let us realise then that the litigants will go into litigation to the neck, and they will brief counsel and solicitors. All this will be very expensive. It will mean far more expense than if they were brought to the county town, and I think, in the interest of the litigants themselves, the Dáil should not pass this amendment. After all, the amendment at most seems to be pandering to an appetite for litigation.

ATTORNEY - GENERAL: Before touching the amendment there is this one observation I would like to make. Deputy McGoldrick, in proposing his amendment, and Deputy White, in seconding it, suggested that this Bill has been approached from a professional point of view only. I venture to say that no Bill so far involving professional consideration has ever been presented to any Parliament with more regard for the people and for the litigants and with less regard for the professions interested. This question of title jurisdiction has only arisen at a late stage. The demand for giving civil jurisdiction to the Justices had gone on for a very long time and related only to questions of small debts, assault cases, and similar matters. It was not until the Bill was in the Dáil that one sensed any demand for giving to the Justices jurisdiction in title cases. So far we have heard practically only Tirconnaill in advocacy of that particular jurisdiction. Clare, apparently, is against it, and Cork has not yet spoken. I have, however, had the matter under consideration. I am not prepared to deal with the amendment at present. It is a matter that we have been examining and considering. It is partly a matter of the capacity as regards time and opportunity of the District Justices to deal with a class of case which everyone who ever practised in the County Courts—I myself put in a number of years there in the usual apprenticeship—knows, occupy more time and excite more feeling and passion and are more important to the people concerned than almost any other class of case that can come before a Court. It becomes a question whether District Justices, who primarily, after all, are magistrates for dealing with certain classes of criminal jurisdiction who have had added to them a certain limited class of civil jurisdiction, should be entrusted with this complicated, difficult and lengthy class of litigation. There is a good deal to be said on either side, but at the present stage, as I say, the matter has only been pressed from a limited part of the country, and at a late stage, and at the present point I am not prepared to accept the amendment, but I am prepared to pursue the enquiry I am having made as to how far it will be feasible to give some title jurisdiction to District Justices.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment by Mr. O'CONNELL:

To add at the end of Clause A (ii), line 53, the words "except

"(a) where the land, the title to which is in issue, does not exceed £10 in Poor Law Valuation; or

(b) where the land the title to which is in issue does not exceed £20 in Poor Law Valuation, and the parties agree in a form to be prescribed by the Rules made in pursuance of this part of this Act to leave the matter in issue to be decided by the Justice subject to the ordinary right of Appeal to the Circuit Court."

Mr. O'CONNELL: This amendment is practically the same as the preceding one, and as the Attorney-General has given an undertaking to consider the matter I ask leave to withdraw it. I would like to direct the special attention of the Attorney-General to the second portion of my amendment, and he might find along these lines a solution of the whole question.

Amendment not moved.

Motion made to report progress.

THE DAIL RESUMES.

Progress reported, the Committee to resume on Thursday, November 1st.

THE ADJOURNMENT.

ILLEGAL FISHING OFF TIR- CONNAILL.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move the adjournment.

Mr. WHITE: I desire to draw the attention of the Dáil to the continued and persistent illegal fishing within the prohibited areas along the Tirconnail Coast line, between Lough Foyle and Lough Swilly. I do not propose to make any charges against the Ministry.

Mr. MORRISSEY: On a point of order, might I draw attention to the fact that the Minister for Fisheries is not in the Dáil.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I am afraid that is not a point of order, if there is someone on his behalf in the Dáil.

Mr. WHITE: He was here a moment ago and I had a discussion with him in the Lobby. I am not raising this for the purpose of making any charges against the Minister for Fisheries. My object is to place before the Dáil the condition of affairs existing on our far Northern coast line. I put on a question by private notice to the Minister for Fisheries on the 11th instant. In reply he said:—"I have, within the past week, entered into an arrangement with the Minister for Defence by which a certain number of patrol boats of that Ministry will be devoted entirely to fishery protection, and I propose to have a base for one of these vessels in Tirconnail, so that there may be constant patrol of the Tirconnail coast." Since this question was answered a flagrant and defiant attitude has been shown by those foreign pirates. They are unprincipled and audacious thieves, and they are thieving all the fish along the Tirconnail coast line. It is scandalous and outrageous that no effort is being made to check this thieving and piracy. It never went so far, and their audacity was never so strong as it has been since the Minister for Fisheries answered that question. It seems to have given them more energy, and they are working with more barefaced persistency than they have ever done before. They are trawling without lights, and they have their identification letters and registration numbers covered by tarpaulins so as to conceal their identity, and where boats' crews in Lough Swilly and elsewhere come out to identify them they make an effort to sink the boats. I am informed that at present.

[Mr. White.] about 30 trawlers are illegally operating in the area between Lough Foyle and Lough Swilly. I have recently been informed that several of these trawlers lie in the shelter of Innistrathull Island during the daylight, and during the night they come inshore, take up all the fish, and return to the sheltered ground as soon as daylight breaks. I suggest to the Minister that he should, through the Irish Lights Board, call for a report from the Innistrathull Lightkeepers, with regard to this allegation, and get from them the identity of these trawlers and where they come from. It is an absolute necessity that the Minister should take immediate steps to cope with the outrageous and illegal action of these English and Scotch trawlers. The fishermen at present are practically in a state of starvation. The potato crop has entirely failed along the whole North Donegal coast line, and these people have a hard prospect before them for the winter. It is an absolute necessity that something should be done in justice to prevent the piracy by these audacious robbers who are taking the fish. This fish is intended for the food of man, and it should not be stolen by English and Scotch thieves, who come along there, and run into Fleetwood, Morecambe, and other ports with their hauls.

I would also suggest to the Minister that when he sends a patrol boat round, or when he puts the patrol 8 o'clock. boat in Lough Swilly, or in any of the Donegal ports, that he will insist that the crew of the patrol boat will do their duty fearlessly and independently, because the allegation has been made to me, or rather the suggestion was made to me, that within the past couple of months, the crew of a certain patrol boat and the crew of some of these trawlers were consorting—I suppose about swopping a dog—at Burtonport. There is another matter which I want to bring to the notice of the Minister when dealing with this matter. I have here a letter which I received from the Tory Island fishermen. It reads:—

“ We, the witnesses, who caught an English Steam Trawler inside the three-mile limit on the 25th and 26th May, 1922, wish to say that the case was heard at Falcarragh District Court on the 27th April, 1923. Benjamin Holt, Fleetwood, skipper of the fishing trawler, was fined £100 and £70 costs. But we, the witnesses, have never since got a penny of our honest expenses, and we would feel very thankful if you would enquire into the matter and make the Ministry of Fisheries send us our expenses. James Carroll, Denis Duggan, Patrick Rogers, James Dooohan, William Dooohan and James Dooohan (John).”

This boat was caught on the 13th March, 1923. Identification letters F.D. Registry number 192. F.D. 158 was caught on March 24th, 1923. F.D. 413 was caught on March 24th, 1919. G.N. 33 was caught on November 23rd, 1922. G.N. 18 was caught on October 28th, 1922. G.N. 33 was also caught fishing in prohibited waters between Tory Island and the Coast Line. I do not raise this question this evening for the purpose of raising any charges of neglect against the Minister for Fisheries, but I am doing this for the purpose of letting the Dáil know the condition of affairs on the Donegal Coast Line. This is the condition of affairs that the Minister for Fisheries should take as quick steps as he possibly can to endeavour to end.

Mr. O'CONNELL: This matter of which Deputy White complains is not a County Tirconnaill matter. It is one of the aspects of the Fishing Industry which needs urgent and immediate attention. The whole question of prohibited areas, and what constitutes the prohibited area does not seem to be very clear. Some people speak of the three-mile limit, but I am not so sure that what is internationally spoken of as the three-mile limit is the proper limit in this matter. I understand that it is within the power of the Ministry concerned to extend that limit if necessary. I do not know whether that is a case or not. But I think the Minister for Agriculture on a former occasion, before the present Ministry of Fisheries was established, made some statement which would leave one under that impression. Another point in connection with this prohibited area, or the definition of a prohibited area, is this, that it is sometimes set out by means of a line drawn from one particular part of the coast to another.

Some parts of the coast will approach that line or, I should say that line will, in some places, approach within a mile or a mile and a half of the coast. I would like if the Minister in his reply would make clear what exactly constitutes a prohibited area, and how these areas are arrived at and defined. In cases that I do know, I am aware that the fishermen themselves are not by any means clear on that point. There is no doubt whatsoever that the allegations made by Deputy White are true so far as practically all the fishing grounds are concerned. They are being continually raided by English and Scotch steam trawlers, and even by French trawlers, and it is clear, I think, that the provision made for the protection of the fishing grounds is not ample. I think that is quite clear from the evidence that is available. I do suggest that the Minister should make such arrangements and press that such arrangements should be made as will give this necessary protection to the fishermen. I, myself, during the month of August, saw quite close to the Arran Islands twelve steam trawlers. They go out and fish during the night apparently, and come into the harbour during the day. The only fish that was available on the island on that particular Friday was the fish that was sold by the Fleetwood trawler there. This, as I say, is only one aspect concerning the fishing industry, but it is a very important one, and one that requires, in my opinion, the immediate attention of the Government.

Mr. JOSEPH McBRIDE: It appears to me that Deputy White and Deputy O'Connell do not exactly appear to remember that poaching is a very time-honoured profession. I do not blame these trawlers in the very least for poaching upon Irish grounds, when they get their chance. Poaching takes place in Scotland, where admittedly the place is well controlled and where there are thousands and thousands of native fishermen. There were 300 cases of poaching last year in Scotland. Poaching takes place in England also, even where they have large numbers of local fishermen and where there is considerable amount of patrol work. I do not see why you should blame them. I would do it myself if I got a chance. I do not see why these men should be blamed for poaching along the coast where there is not a patrol boat nor a fisherman. It is the local fisherman we want to have in these places. If you have these local fishermen that will prevent poaching.

Mr. O'DOHERTY: I am not quite sure how this matter stands at the moment. Has Deputy White made a motion?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: He is merely drawing attention to the matter.

Mr. O'DOHERTY: Permit me, then, to support Deputy White's statement. As to his proposal, it is a different matter. He comes into my bailiwick and takes some of my best fishermen, but these are matters that we will settle. As far as I can understand, the proper course in this matter is that as we have a Minister for Fisheries, Deputy White could discuss the things with him in the corridor. There cannot be much harm in telling the Minister how matters stand and asking for his assistance. I do not think that this is a matter which the Dáil should trouble with; but if it is necessary that the Dáil should be troubled with it, and that this evil should continue, then I think Deputy White would be justified in drawing the attention of the Minister to it. That would be the proper way, and the matter might rest there.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: I rise, not to censure the Minister, but to outline a helpful policy. I believe a lot of this poaching could be prevented by greater efficiency and more watchfulness on the part of the patrol fleet. If their numbers are insufficient to deal adequately with the situation and patrol the coast, why not increase the numbers of those boats? I believe that the Dáil would readily grant the requisite amount for a larger number of those boats. The best argument to put against those poachers would be to fine them severely, to confiscate their trawlers and their catch, and, if possible, give them a term of imprisonment. There is something more. It will be readily admitted nowadays that the line of territorial waters under International law extends to only 3 miles, and that is not at all adequate under modern conditions. We have, as it happens, a League of Nations. For what I am going to suggest there is a precedent. The Americans, at the present time, are searching ships and detaining them outside the 12 miles limit for rum-runners. Is not there a sufficient analogy between the American case and ours, and is it not feasible that we should extend our territorial waters to a 12 miles limit? I was never a believer in giving something for nothing. I would rather the Irish people would not be placed in the position of a Don Quixote. The League of Nations should give us some return for the hard cash they receive, and the head of the Government should apply for an extension of the territorial waters to 12 miles.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I wish to join the Deputies in the complaint made as regards poaching. Some of the Deputies are rather new to the subject. Most of us, or at least some of us, have been acquainted with it for some time back.

I know the Minister for Fisheries has been doing all he possibly can for a long time to give protection against poaching. But the question of the poacher is only one phase of the problem. The question of the development of the industry is still more important. In the past, tied as we have been to England, our coasts and harbours were always open to these trawlers while they fished outside the three-mile limit. As far as that was concerned they brought in their catches to the coast, but now when they fish in the same place they bring their catches to England. At the present time the fisherman's position is a very serious one. The outlook for him is very bad. It is growing gradually worse. While the Minister for Fisheries should take steps as drastic as he possibly can to stop poaching and to deal with the poacher, he should at the same time take action in order to assist and direct in some way in the development of the fishing industry around the coast. If something is not done in that line, and done very rapidly, the position with regard to the fishermen is going to be more difficult than the position you have in the Metropolitan area at present, consequent on unemployment. The question of poaching only brings the general question of the Irish fisheries more strongly before us. They naturally resent the raids upon their fishing-grounds of steam trawlers who take away the fish that these fishermen require themselves and out of which they have always been making a living. At the same time, while they are all anxious for that, it is only one of their objectives at the moment, but the most necessary and imperative one is the development of the industry. I am sure that the Minister, when he gets his whole machinery working, will ensure that poaching will be dealt with and that all poaching will cease, at any rate as far as the three-mile limit is concerned. I ask the Minister to apply himself with the utmost energy towards the solution of giving people engaged in this industry a chance of looking to a future in which they can live, and not to have to depend upon relief for their very existence. That applies to a great number of people, because the coast line is big and a great many people are employed, and the Ministry should be very active in trying to apply some machinery to provide employment for the people in this industry and who are dependent upon the industry for their support.

Mr. McFADDEN: I happen to come from the coastline also. In the particular part of the country that I come from the complaint is not so much about the poaching. Their chief complaint is their want of proper gear for carrying on the fishing. Their gear at present is very much dislocated. What is wanted is a good supply of gear and a proper repair of the boats. In the year before the war they shipped 8,000 barrels of cured herrings to Russia. You would not get as many herrings to-day as would be eaten with a barrel of potatoes. I think the matter for Lifford and Falcarragh would be a proper supply of better tackle and improved boats. I appeal to the Minister to help the Donegal fishermen in the way I have suggested, and then I promise they will hold their own.

MINISTER for FISHERIES (Mr. Fionan Lynch): I have listened with very great interest to what has been said on this subject, and I propose to deal first with the question that has been raised primarily by Deputy White on the adjournment. I have had several reports, as a matter of fact, with regard to illegal trawling along the Donegal coast. About a month ago I sent around there specially the Helga, which lay in wait at the north coast of Donegal for some time. It did not catch anything, as I expected it would not, because it is too well known, even though it operated with lights out that night. One of our patrol boats was around there, too. We caught one vessel, and a prosecution is pending. In addition to that we had in the last few weeks a report from a fisherman at Tory Island. We sent the report back for confirmation to our agent in Tory Island. I should tell Deputies that we always require confirmation for certain reports from that district. With regard to the Deputy's request for a report from the lightkeepers, these men do not come within my province at all, but I can get copies of their reports from the Minister for Industry and Commerce. The Deputy mentioned that patrol boats should be required to do their duty fearlessly, and suggested that there was ground for complaint against certain patrol boats. That may be quite well founded, and if it is so I should certainly like to have the facts. I am afraid my information from that particular area especially is to this effect, that a lot of the persons there, the inhabitants, and even persons who should be interested in the fishing, are doing far more "colloguing" than the staffs of the patrol boats. I have been several times informed that certain persons along the coast and on the islands along the Donegal coast are in the pay of these trawlers; that they afford them shelter and give them the tip, as it were, when a patrol boat or the Helga is coming along.

Mr. WHITE: They give them bribes of coal.

Mr. LYNCH: And something more, perhaps. The point the Deputy mentions about Falcarragh is at the present moment being considered. With regard to Donegal generally, there is a boat station at Killybegs which will operate more on the northern portion of Donegal, for the moment from Lough Swilly. I had better, I suppose, not go into details as to how it is going to operate. Deputy O'Connell raised the question of prohibited areas. Normally, a prohibited area under International Law is what is known as the three mile limit. There are then certain bye-law areas. At the moment there are bye-law areas with respect to fishing. There is a bye-law, for instance, made by the Department of Agriculture. These bye-law areas really only apply to our own fishing boats, and to those, for the moment, of Great Britain. The foreigner can fish in these areas so long as he does not attempt to land his fish in this country or in Great Britain. That is exactly the legal position. At the moment we have no power, as a Ministry, to make bye-laws. We cannot do so until the Ministries' Bill is through. The question of further extending the three mile area is a matter for international convention. For the moment the Americans have extended theirs; they chanced it, as it were. The Russians did it before, but it did not come off, and the American action has not yet received international sanction.

Mr. McCABE: On a question of order, on this three mile limit—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is not a question of order.

Mr. LYNCH: Deputy Hogan raised the question of greater efficiency in the patrol service and of greater numbers. At the moment at any rate, once the additional patrol boats that are being available for us—they have not actually come under my control yet—but once they come under the control of the Ministry, that is to say, the four additional patrol boats, we will have sufficient numbers, and I think the patrol service then will be quite efficient. Deputy McGoldrick raised the question of general development. I think that is a matter that will come up under other matters; for instance, under the

[Mr. Lynch.]
Governor-General's address, and I think it need not be dealt with in detail here.

Mr. WHITE: I desire to thank the Minister for his reply, and for the amount of trouble he has gone to in dealing with this matter.

The Dáil adjourned at 8.25 p.m. until Thursday, the 1st November, at 3 p.m.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS. [ORAL ANSWERS.]

SECONDARY TEACHERS' GRIEVANCES.

LIAM MAG AONGHUSA asked the Minister for Finance if he is yet in a position to say what arrangements are being made to carry out the promise made by his predecessor in the last Dáil to redress in part the financial grievances of the secondary teachers.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. E. Blythe): I am in communication with the Ministry of Education on this subject, but am not in a position at the present moment to say what arrangements are being made.

DUBLIN MONEY-LENDERS' RATE OF INTEREST.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS (for Ailfrid O Broin) asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether he will take steps to regulate the rate of interest which money-lenders may charge clients; if he is aware that, in the working class districts of Dublin, persons describing themselves as financiers are now lending three pounds three shillings to the wives of workmen, conditionally that they sign promissory notes to pay five pounds, at the rate of 5s. per week, and that failure to pay regular instalments in one case has resulted in threats to sell the contents of the borrower's room.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. K. O'Higgins): Money-lenders' transactions are regulated by the Provisions of the Money-lenders' Act, 1900. This Act enables a borrower to bring a money-lender before the Courts if it is considered that the rate of interest charged on a loan is unduly high. Harsh and unconscionable transactions are provided against under the Act. The protection of borrowers is thus provided for and it is not considered that any more practicable machinery can be set up.

A CLARE OUTRAGE.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether he is aware that a band of masked and armed men, travelling in a lorry and four motor cars, arrived at the district between Ennis and Quin, Co. Clare, in the early hours of the 30th ult. and carried away, with nine others, Messrs. James and John McCormack, Doora, to Fenloe House, where the kidnapped men were subjected to repeated floggings, as a result of which the lives of several of these men were in danger from the injuries received; to ask what steps, if any, have been taken in the matter.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: On Saturday night, the 29th September, a number of armed men, some of whom wore masks, arrived in a Ford motor lorry and carried away Messrs. James and John McCormack, of Doora, together with nine other men. Most of the kidnapped men have since refused to make any statement; but, from information supplied by certain of them, it appears that they were, as stated, subjected to repeated floggings with butts of rifles and revolvers, and questioned as to what they knew concerning the whereabouts of Mrs. Crowe, who had been kidnapped on the 23rd of that month. The attackers represented themselves as friends of Mrs. Crowe from England and spoke with English accents. The kidnapped men are unable to identify their attackers, and can give no information which might lead to their arrest. They were released on the 1st October, after Mrs. Crowe had returned to her home, and were warned not to communicate with the Garda Síochána or with the Army. Inquiries are still proceeding.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: I would like to ask the Minister if he credits the statement that they were friends of Mrs. Crowe from England, seeing that [Mr. Connor Hogan,] she is a Unionist lady, and will he consider a written statement made to me by one of the prisoners?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I will consider any statement or any information the Deputy will lay before me.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: All right

PUBLIC MEETINGS—OBSTRUCTION TO TRAFFIC.

MAIGHREAD NI CHOILEAIN BEAN UI DHRISCEOIL asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether he is aware that very considerable inconvenience is being caused to the residents of the north side of the city, and to the people of Dublin generally, by the practice that has grown up of late of allowing the tram service to be held up during the progress of meetings in O'Connell Street, and whether he will issue instructions that no such meetings be allowed in future without a permit from the Chief Commissioner of the D.M.P.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: My attention has been called to the inconvenience caused by the dislocation of traffic during the progress of public meetings in O'Connell Street, and I hope shortly to introduce legislation which will enable police regulations to be made governing public assemblies.

IRISH SLATE QUARRIES DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. THOMAS O'MAHONY asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce whether he is aware that Irish slate quarries have ample reserves of excellent slate rock for all Saorstát requirements; whether any steps have been taken

(1) To provide that in Government and Public Bodies' Contracts the slates used shall be procured from Irish quarries;

(2) to investigate and report on the possibility of quarries now working to provide such supplies;

(3) to consider the appointment of a Committee or Commission to investigate the methods of working and the output of these quarries, and of such others as have had to suspend operations owing to indifferent support or insufficient working capital, with power to recommend subsidies or loans from Public Funds in favour of promising undertakings, and so provide much needed employment, and the development of an important industry.

MINISTER for INDUSTRY and COMMERCE (Mr. J. McGrath): The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative.

I am informed that the Ministry of Local Government specially provided for the use of Irish slates in the model specifications prepared by that Ministry relating to both urban and rural housing schemes, and that the Board of Works are taking steps to specify Irish slates in Government contracts wherever practicable.

I understand that evidence has been given before the Fiscal Inquiry Committee regarding the present circumstances of the slate quarrying industry in An Saorstát, and pending the receipt of the Final Report of that Committee a separate investigation, such as is contemplated in the question, would not be desirable.

Mr. O'MAHONY: I wish to say, with your permission, a Chinn Comhairle

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy cannot make a statement.

LONGFORD CO. COUNCIL ACCOUNTS.

Mr. PATRICK McKENNA asked the Minister for Local Government when the accounts of the Longford Co. Council were last audited; whether the surcharges then made were collected; whether £80 was advanced to each of the Assistant County Surveyors for the purchase of motor bicycles, to be repaid by annual instalments of £10; whether any of the instalments due have been paid, and, if not, what steps it is proposed to take to collect the amount outstanding; when it is proposed to hold the next audit, and whether any action is contemplated, in view of the fact that the Council has not met since August last.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERN.

MENT (Mr. J. Burke): The accounts of Longford County Council were audited for the year 1920-21 in August, 1922, and the auditor furnished his report on the 14th of that month.

The surcharges he made have been appealed against, and are under consideration. Owing to the death of the auditor some special inquiries have been necessary.

Sums of £80 each had been advanced to each Assistant Surveyor for the purchase of motor cycles, repayable by annual instalments of £8 not £10 as stated in the question. During the audit those assistants who were in the employment of the Council, lodged the amounts due by them.

In the case of an Assistant Surveyor who had ceased to be employed, the auditor directed that steps be taken to recover the motor cycle for the use of the Council.

Notice of audit for years 1921-22 and 1922-23 has been issued.

There does not appear to be any failure on the part of the Council in the matter of holding meetings, and the next statutory meeting is due to be held on the 21st instant.

CLAIM FOR GOODS.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for Defence whether he has received a claim from Mr. W. Wogan, 3 Richmond Row, Portobello, for goods taken from his house by Military on March 15th, 1923, and when it is proposed to investigate and settle this claim.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): A claim has been received from Mr. Wogan and it is at present under consideration.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Arising out of that answer, is the Minister aware that it has been under consideration for more than six months and can he give any hope that shortly the consideration will terminate and a decision will be arrived at?

General MULCAHY: The case is a very unusual one. The only piece of property which is actually in hands at the present moment is a typewriter. Instructions have been issued which will,
Vol. 5.

I anticipate, secure the return to Mr. Wogan of the typewriter within the next two or three days. There are certain other articles which it is established were taken by the Military, and there is no reason why the full matter of settlement in respect of those articles could not be finished inside a fortnight. There are some other items which it is established were in no way interfered with or taken by the Military and in respect of those items I cannot say that any decision will be taken. The matter is at dispute, and the Minister for Finance may have something to say if it is to be considered at all.

COMPENSATION FOR DECEASED SOLDIER'S PARENTS.

Mr. P. J. EGAN (for Mr. Patrick W. Shaw) asked the Minister for Defence if suitable compensation will be paid the parents of the late Sergeant Major James McNamee, who was killed in the discharge of his duty, in Mullingar, on the 6th July, 1922.

General MULCAHY: The case of the late Sergeant Major James McNamee appears to be one for compensation and will be considered as soon as possible.

A COMMANDEERED MOTOR CAR.

Mr. P. J. EGAN (for Mr. Patrick W. Shaw) asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that a motor car, the property of Michael McMunn, Stoneyford, was commandeered by military on 24th May, 1922, that the car was worth £350 0s. 0d., and is now a complete wreck, and if suitable compensation will be granted.

General MULCAHY: I am aware that Mr. McMunn's car was taken by military and has been returned. The question of compensation is at present under consideration.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

DECEASED D.M.P. CONSTABLE'S DEPENDENTS.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Finance whether he is aware that the late Constable E. Dunphy, D.M.P., when on duty at the General

[Ailfrid O Broin.]

Post Office, on Easter Monday, 1916, was taken prisoner and held captive for a week, and was wounded whilst escaping; whether he is aware that, as a result, Dunphy contracted an illness, resulting in his discharge from the Police Force on 2nd April, 1917, and in his death on 10th October, 1919; whether an Act was passed in 1918 under which the widow would have become entitled to a pension of £26 0s. 0d. a year, had her husband served in the D.M.P. up to 1918; whether, in view of the circumstances resulting in Dunphy's discharge before 1918, steps will be taken to enable the widow and children to come under the 1918 Act.

Mr. BLYTHE: I am not prepared to extend the provisions of the 1918 Act to cover cases not already within its scope (an extension which would require legislation), more especially in cases which arose during the British administration.

EX-SERVICEMEN'S HOUSES IN CÓBH.

TOMÁS DE NÓGLA asked the Minister for Local Government if he can say when the Sailors' and Soldiers' Trust will commence the building of the 15 houses proposed to be erected in the Cóbh district.

Mr. BURKE: I would refer the Deputy to my answer of yesterday to Deputy O'Mahony on a similar question, and would suggest that in such matters of detail he would communicate directly with the Sailors' and Soldiers' Department, 30 Lower Fitzwilliam Street, Dublin, which is administered solely out of British funds.

CUT IN CIVIL SERVICE BONUS.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Finance whether it is a fact that according to the Cost of Living Report of the Ministry of Industry and Commerce for Mid-June, 1922, the Index Cost of Living figure in Mid-March, 1922, was 91.4, and whether it was 85 on the 1st September, 1923; if so, will he now say why the Civil Service bonus has been cut 4/26 during that period, while according to those figures the cut for the period should only amount to 1/26.

Mr. BLYTHE: I must refer the Deputy to the reply given to his question of the 4th ult., in which I explained that Civil Service bonus is paid by reference to the average cost of living figure over a period of six months.

QUESTION ON THE ADJOURNMENT.

ARMED BRIGANDS IN COUNTY CLARE.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: I beg to give notice that on the motion for the adjournment I desire to raise the question of armed brigands in Co. Clare and the immunity they seem to enjoy.

DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

THE COURTS OF JUSTICE BILL, 1923.

THIRD STAGE RESUMED.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Progress was reported yesterday afternoon when amendment 23 to Section 78 had been disposed of.

Amendment 24 to Section 78 (Mr. BEAMISH) not moved.

Mr. D. MORRISSEY: I beg to move amendment 25:—

In Clause B (iii), page 16, line 7, after the words "in camera" to add the words,
"provided, however, that in any case of indecent assault upon a female person there shall be at least one woman present in court during a hearing in camera."

The object of the amendment is, as it states, to ensure that there should be at least one woman present in the Court during the hearing. There is no need to say much on the amendment; it speaks for itself.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Mr. Hugh Kennedy): I do not know whether it is proposed that a person should be there for hire or on voluntary terms. Is it intended that someone should be invited in from the road to hear the case? As put in the amendment the thing is impracticable.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is it not a fact that in some Courts such a practice has already been established? I am given to understand that in such cases it is laid down as a rule that a woman should be present. I do not know whether it applies in this country, but I think that in England, America, and some other countries there is such a rule, and if it is found practicable there I have no doubt it will be found practicable here, too.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I can see the object of it, but the thing, as it stands, is wholly impracticable. It would really amount to having a wardress in court all the time. How far Deputy Johnson thinks that would be sufficient protection I do not know.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I think the Clause, as it stands; leaves no discretion or power to have a woman present in court. I quite agree that you could not send a wardress, because the District Court might be fifty miles away from a prison. As the Clause stands it says "the case may be heard in camera." It should be made clear that "in camera" does not exclude having a woman present in this court. Suppose a woman goes to court with her sister to support her, they should not be able to exclude the sister. I agree there is no compulsory power to have a woman in court.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: On that line I think something might be done; that is to say, in preparing the rules of court dealing with the question of hearing such cases in camera, it could be provided that the person preferring the charge during the hearing should be entitled to have a female friend in court. I will consider the matter on that line.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Would not that require some addition to this particular part of the Section, and would not such addition be met by a change in the wording of the amendment from "shall be at least" to "may be at least"?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I think the rules of the court will quite adequately provide for that.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think if the Minister in charge of the Bill gives some assurance on that point, it will be satisfactory. The point of the amendment, I understand, is that it is within the discretion of the court to say that these cases shall be heard in camera, and you would have the person preferring a charge present in the company of a man hearing a case of this kind, and no woman present except herself, unless there is some rule or obligation that an opportunity shall be provided for a woman to be present during the hearing of the case.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: It really turns on whether the words "in camera" are really exclusive, and would prevent a rule being made. I am not at the moment certain that they do, but I will consider it, and see whether the person preferring the charge would be enabled to have one woman present in court during the hearing.

Mr. MORRISSEY: Under these circumstances, I beg leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. EAMON DUGGAN: I beg to move amendment 26:—

"In line 27, page 16, to delete the words 'licensing cases' and to insert in lieu thereof the words 'granting certificates for spirit and other licences.'"

Amendment put and agreed to.

Amendment 27 (Mr. Duggan) not

Question—"That Section 78, as amended, stand part of the Bill"—put and agreed to.

SECTION 79.

There shall be transferred to the District Court all Jurisdiction which at the commencement of this Act was vested in or capable of being exercised by District Justices under the provisions of the District Justices (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1923, or under any Act now in force, and also all Jurisdiction which at the commencement of this Act was vested in or capable of being exercised by the Divisional Justices of the Police District of Dublin Metropolis, and also all Jurisdiction which at the commencement of this Act was vested in or capable of being exercised by the Court of Conscience, and the provisions in Section 21 and 22 of this Act contained shall apply mutatis mutandis to the Jurisdictions by this Act vested in and transferred to the District Court.

Mr. GOOD: On behalf of Deputy Hewat, I desire to move the amendment standing in his name, and which is, to insert before Section 79 a new Sub-section, as follows:—

“ Provided that in the City of Dublin Justices shall sit for the hearing of Civil and Criminal cases as separate Courts and on different days, and shall have no jurisdiction in Criminal matters when sitting as a Civil Court, and vice versa.”

The main intention of this new Section is quite obvious. The District Court under the new regime will be the present Metropolitan Police Court, and as we know, the business in these Courts, at the moment, is fairly congested, and if we are to add to that business a large number of debt cases that will arise in the District Courts, it is obvious that some arrangement must be made whereby the Civil cases will be kept separate from the Criminal cases, and that is the object of the amendment I now move.

ATTORNEY - GENERAL: This amendment deals with what would be a quite obvious matter of organisation of the business of the Court. I think the probability is the Justices will divide it amongst themselves, and that one will take civil cases and another criminal cases. It is a matter of arrangement of the business and of the rules. It is not a matter for this Bill, and in the drafting of the rules I undertake that that matter will be properly attended to.

Mr. GOOD: On this Rules Committee, as I understand it, there is no commercial representative at all. Upon the original Commission which enquired into this matter and upon whose report this Bill is based, we had a commercial representative, and I would like to ask the Attorney-General if he would not now consider the necessity of having a commercial representative on this Rules Committee when considering these matters, which are of very great importance to the commercial community.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Of course, that will arise on Section 91, where the Constitution of the Rule-making Authority is dealt with. The Rule-making Authority is purely a legal body that deals with the matter from a point of view of the ordinary legal procedure and rules of court. These will be laid upon the Table of the Dáil when the full force of commercial knowledge will be, I take it, applied to examining and correcting them.

Mr. GOOD: I should think if it was necessary to have a commercial representative on the original Committee, it is obvious that the Rules Committee cannot be discharging work of greater importance than the original Committee had to discharge, and, therefore, I hold it is equally necessary we should have a commercial representative on that Committee if that is at all possible. I understand some similar question was raised yesterday.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy can raise that point on Section 91 when we reach it.

Mr. GOOD: Quite so, and I accept the assurance of the Attorney-General, and I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move Amendment 29—in line 42, after the word “conscious” to insert the words “or by a person acting as Justice of the Peace under the Towns Improvement (Ireland), 1854.”

The person who usually exercises that jurisdiction was the Chairman of the Town Commissioners, and in the drafting of the Bill the transfer of that jurisdiction from him was omitted.

Captain REDMOND: Before passing from this might I ask who will be the person who is now to act in a similar position?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: If the Deputy will read the Section he will see the effect is to transfer the jurisdiction of these peculiar Town Courts, that are only in operation in a few places, to the District Justices. That will have the advantage from the point of view of the Minister for Finance that the revenue from these Courts, which does not reach the State Treasury now, will reach it in future.

Mr. JOHNSON: Will the Minister say where it goes now?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: It is applied purely locally. There is no stamp required, which is from one point of view an advantage, but a disadvantage from another point of view.

Question put and agreed to.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendment No. 30 (Mr. P. F. Baxter) stands in the same position as 22 and 23.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: It is in the same position as the amendments proposed to Section 78.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Then amendment No. 30 is not moved.

Professor MAGENNIS: I beg to move Amendment 31 to add at the end of the Section the words: "nothing in this Section shall be construed to affect injuriously the status, salary and tenure of office of the existing Dublin Metropolitan Divisional Justices and the provision of Section 44 of this Act shall apply equally in the case of these existing Divisional Justices."

The Dáil will recollect that at the end of Section 70 yesterday we altered the wording to read that "the number of District Justices is not at any time to exceed 30" into "33" so as to include the three Dublin Divisional Magistrates; and the operation of this early Section has the effect of making the Divisional Magistrates District Justices. Now in this Section the jurisdiction vested in, or capable of being exercised by, the Divisional Police District of Dublin Metropolis and so on, is transferred, and the purpose of my amendment is to secure that after and when these Magistrates take on the character of District Justices their present rights shall be safeguarded. It is an interesting fact that outside the City of London there are no other Magistrates of this type, and, in fact, the existence of these is the mark of the character of Dublin as a capital city of a nation. If in the interests of administration these changes are to be made I hope they will be made without affecting the status of the City Magistrates. I think the question has only to be brought under notice to be dealt with satisfactorily.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I do not know what the Deputy refers to, precisely, by status. The scheme of this Bill is to supersede all existing Courts by establishing other Courts in their places. The existing Dublin Metropolitan Magistrates, as such, will give way to the District Justices of the city. It would be inconsistent to say that their position is to be preserved in the way proposed in this Sub-Section. It is intended to propose a further clause in the transitory provisions which will enable any of these Justices or Judges, who are disqualified by reason of age in the Bill as it stands, to be continued, and suitable provision will be made there for that contingency. In the meantime, they have their existing pension rights, and their existing position which cannot be touched under the Treaty. It would be impossible to accept the amendment on the lines proposed.

Professor MAGENNIS: The point is this: that one of the three is the Senior Magistrate, and has a superior salary in consequence, and that all three will be simultaneously reduced to the same common level. The purpose of the amendment is to draw this under the notice of the Attorney-General. I quite realise that all the existing Courts are being replaced by those of a new model, and that that reform will extend to the City Magistrates' Courts inevitably. At the same time I think the peculiar position of these magistrates does require special treatment.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If I

[An Ceann Comhairle.] might suggest it, Section 70 has been amended so as to delete all questions of salaries, and the question of the salaries of District Justices will have to arise separately. Could not this matter be raised when that question comes to be discussed?

Professor MAGENNIS: Yes, I am quite satisfied to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question: "That Section 79, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 80.

"Provided that the Jurisdictions by this Act vested in and transferred to the District Court shall be exercised by the Justices severally as follows:—

"In civil cases, by a Justice for the time being assigned to the District wherein the defendants reside or carry on any profession, business or occupation.

"In criminal cases, by a Justice for the time being assigned to the District wherein the crime has been committed or the accused has been arrested or resides.

"In licensing cases, by a Justice for the time being assigned to the District wherein the licensed premises are situate."

Mr. GOOD: I beg to move the following amendment, which stands in the name of Deputy Hewat:—

In line 50, after the word "wherein," to insert the words "the plaintiff or," and at the end of the Section, line 56, to add the words "Provided that, if the case comes for hearing in the District Court where the Plaintiff resides, where a bona fide defence can be shown, the Court may transfer the hearing of such case to what appears to be a more convenient venue, having regard to the convenience of witnesses or any good considerations which may occur to the Court."

I am sorry that Deputy Hewat is not here. As you know, he is engaged at Geneva, and I am sorry he is not here personally to move this amendment, because I feel that the insertion of the word "plaintiff" in this amendment strikes at what we may be told is the basis on which this Bill is built. We have been told in the discussions on this measure, that under this Bill the plaintiff has to follow the goods for payment, and all the difficulties under the Bill, if one may call them such, have been cast on the plaintiff in trying to recover his debt. The object of this amendment is to give some small assistance to the plaintiff in the collection of small debts in the District Courts.

Now, the position at the moment is this: Under this Bill, take the case of a debt over £20, which is for goods sold by a merchant in Dublin to a trader, say, in Wexford; if there is a disposition, as there is sometimes in Ireland, to get rid of liabilities, the merchant will have to proceed in the District Court in Wexford to recover his debt. That means that he will have to bring his staff and his witnesses there to recover a small debt. The merchant may consider, seeing that the debtor will be a local man and that the Court, possibly, will be composed of local people who will have more sympathy with the defendant than with the plaintiff, that it is much better for him to cut his loss in the case of that debt rather than to follow it, because, while he may recover the original amount of the debt, he may not succeed in recovering the costs, and thereby be at a disadvantage instead of at an advantage in proceeding in the District Court. That is the position under the Bill. Take the present position of such merchant who has a case for over £20. If the Wexford man fails to make payment within a reasonable period a writ can be issued in the High Court here and judgment marked in ten days for the amount of the debt, and he can also recover his costs.

You can see from the two cases that I have put before you the position of the merchant. Under the new regime, he will be more severely handicapped in the matter of collecting his debts than he is at the moment. Bearing on this point, let me read a paragraph from a letter which I have received within the last few days from a very large Association of wholesale merchants in the city. They sent me the following resolution, of which I will only read a portion. The resolution states: "That the Judiciary Bill before the Dáil, if passed in its present form, will create a great hardship on merchants in Dublin owing to the difficulty in recovering debts throughout the country and the inconvenience and expense in sending witnesses to attend the hearing of Civil Bills in remote districts, and we respectfully submit to the Dáil that in the event of the Bill becoming law that merchants will have the right to elect to proceed in the High Court, and that the costs of such proceedings be allowed as heretofore."

I read that paragraph to show the feeling—because I think that fairly represents the feeling—which exists at the moment amongst a large body of the commercial community with regard to this Bill. It is with the object of giving some help to that large section of traders that this amendment is put forward by Deputy Hewat, who was a member of the Committee that dealt with this matter, on whose report the Bill is based.

ATTORNEY - GENERAL: I am anxious to intervene on this amendment, before it is further discussed, in order to deal with this point which has been persistently made in various quarters against the Bill. I believe that this particular criticism is largely due to people confining their reading to one or other comment, whether in speech or newspaper, instead of studying the text of the measure. Deputy Good has mentioned that at present one can proceed by a writ in the High Court and recover judgment in ten days. That is the procedure to which I referred yesterday—the procedure on affidavit in simple cases where there is no genuine defence. Let the commercial community take it from me, and from the Bill, that that procedure remains. They will still be able, in a straight case where there is no genuine defence, to move for judgment and have their judgment within ten days or so on a simple affidavit verifying the account. The only cases which proceed are those in which the defendant has not been able to disclose to the Court a genuine defence to the claim. In some of these the defence is a matter of accountancy. In that case the Court commonly sends the account before an official of the Court to have the account examined, and if the matter still remains in doubt it comes back on some point before the Court to decide. That procedure will remain.

But I must say this: some of the people who are very anxious about this particular procedure are anxious because they see a particular form of revenue, which I think has not been justified, disappearing. It has been the practice—I consider to an unjustifiable extent—to issue writs in the High Court for small debts of from £5 to £10 and so on, and recover judgment with full High Court costs—the costs that are allowed under the High Court rules. Certain persons in Dublin have found that a very profitable source of revenue. In future the High Court—if it is the Court in which the application is made for this summary judgment—will consider whether the application should not have been made in the Circuit Court and, inasmuch as the application can be made on an affidavit without witnesses, there is no reason why it should not be made in the Circuit Court and at the Circuit Court rate of expense to the defendant who is mulcted. The general principle of this amendment cuts across a well-established principle that the venue should be laid where the defendant resides. We have not heard in any of the discussions on these various Sections any reason why that principle should be dislodged. The only argument has been an argument which, as I say, is founded upon an erroneous reading of the Bill. It will still be possible to recover in cases where there is no real defence on a simple affidavit and get judgment within as short a period of time as at present.

Major COOPER: If there are misunderstandings as to the Bill, and I think there are, those misunderstandings are very largely the fault of the Government themselves, because on the Second Reading the President did not give any general sketch of the scope of the Bill. If the Attorney-General had been in the Dáil and had been able to make the statement he made to the Press on the Second Reading of the Bill these misapprehensions would not have arisen. We are a House very largely of laymen—the world outside is largely composed of laymen—and it is very hard to read a long and complicated measure of this kind and take in every detail. The Government should have treated the Dáil to a fuller exposition of the principles of the Bill and shown exactly how the business community would be affected by it. Business people have had a very bad time. Business in the city of Dublin has suffered enormously in the last two or three years, and the business community are naturally apprehensive of anything that will disturb trade further, and their apprehensions have a right to be met. I think what the Attorney-General has stated, both on this amendment and in his statement to the Press, will reassure them. I think that some of the President's statements in reply to amendments I have moved have also tended to reassure people. It was because the Government in the first instance did not fully meet their responsibilities in explaining the Bill to the Dáil and the country that these misapprehensions arose.

Mr. GOOD: Do I understand from the reply of the Attorney-General that in a case where a defence is put in as against a writ issued in the High Court the case must go to the District Court to be decided? If that is the position, there is practically no use in saying that the plaintiff has the same redress as he has at the moment, because if it is only necessary to enter a defence in order to bring a debt to the District Court, and to bring a plaintiff with his witnesses and his staff down to some distant part of the country, then a defence will be entered in every case where a writ is issued, and in all cases the matter shall be heard in a District Court with the result I have mentioned.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: No, the practice now, and I see no reason to apprehend that it will be changed, is that if a defence has been actually filed before the hearing of a motion for summary judgment the nature of the defence is examined by the court. It has to be substantiated by the defendant on affidavit, and unless the court is satisfied that it is a genuine defence, and there is a case to be fought out, the court gives judgment. If the defence appears not to be a genuine defence, and that the defendant's affidavit in support shows that it is of no substance, then the court gives judgment, and that, of course, purely on affidavits, and without the attendance of witnesses.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I think it will be agreed that the Attorney-General's statement has allayed a great deal of the misgivings that were felt, due to a misreading of the Bill, a misreading that was perhaps natural under the circumstances, and which, as Deputy Cooper has stated, could have been dispelled had the Government realised its responsibilities earlier. So far as that element of it is concerned I leave it. But there is a further case that I would like to bring to the Attorney-General's attention, which has been urged upon me by influential circles in this city, and is one, I think, to be very carefully considered. Assuming that an adequate defence is entered in a case, such a case would be carried down to the local court. The Attorney-General justifies that procedure on what he claims to be a well-accepted principle, that the case should follow the goods—that the case should be heard near the defendant rather than near the plaintiff. It is in respect of that that I wish to put this consideration before him. Let us assume, and the assumption is a very natural one in the circumstances, that in the given case 75 per cent. of the documents that are required and 75 per cent. of the witnesses that it will be necessary to bring into court are to be brought from the plaintiff's side. Why then should not the case be heard in the plaintiff's city rather than in the defendant's town? It would create a great deal less inconvenience, it would be a great deal less expensive ultimately for both sides, and would lead to a quicker and better administration of justice.

One particular case that has occurred within quite a short time was brought to me as an illustration, where it would have meant the taking down of very costly ledgers to a remote town in the west. Clearly, if there is to be a great deal of removal of persons or of documents it would be better that the case should be heard where that removal would cause both sides the least amount of inconvenience. Behind the case that has been made, I put it to the Attorney-General, that the court should have the option, even where an adequate defence is entered, if it be for the lesser inconvenience of all parties concerned that a case should be heard in the city of Dublin rather than in a local town, of causing the case to be heard in Dublin rather than removing all books and persons some distance into the country.

Mr. JOHNSON: I just want to put in a word in favour of the plan, which, as I understand is in the Bill, that the plaintiff must sue in the place where the defendant lives. I have confessed my ignorance of these legal matters very often in the Dáil, but looking at the matter plainly from the common-sense point of view, it seems to me that the debtor in the remote districts has been pressed to buy by the central selling organisation in Dublin. In nine cases out of ten the selling organisation has pressed the defendant to purchase, and I contend it has the responsibility that that pressure involves. The plaintiff should therefore sue, if it is a case for suing, at the place of residence of the debtor. One can quite understand that the big central organisations, the big wholesale merchants, would very much rather arrange that some firm like Stubbs or some of these other debt collecting agencies should do the job of debt collecting in a wholesale way, and do it cheaply and throw the onus of big expenses upon the defendant. Notwithstanding the fact that I represent a Dublin constituency I am prepared to stand for the rights of the poor debtor as against the rights of the big wholesale merchants in the city of Dublin, and it seems to me that is the issue in question between this amendment proposed by Deputy Good and the Bill itself. I cannot enter into any of the technical discussions as to the procedure, but apart from the question of procedure, it seems to me that the purport of the amendment and the object of the criticism directed against the Bill is to facilitate the big wholesale merchants in Dublin to sell in the country parts to the disadvantage of the country traders, and at the expense, when a dispute arises, of the poorer debtor.

I believe that the small debtor ought to be protected in this Bill as against the big wholesale merchant.

Mr. GOOD: May I point out, before the Attorney-General replies, that I do not think what Deputy Johnson has outlined will exactly follow. In a great many of these cases the customer writes from the country to a wholesale house to supply him with so-and-so, and as a result of fulfilling that order trouble arises in collecting the debt. In some cases there is a certain amount of anxiety on the part of travellers to secure orders, and to that limited extent Deputy Johnson is justified in his view, but what will be the result of putting this difficulty in the way of the wholesale houses from collecting debts from the small debtors? The wholesale house will come to the conclusion, in view of the cost of litigation, that it is unwise to risk the collection of small debts and will cut them off. The small shopkeeper, having had the advantage of buying from wholesale houses, will be unable to buy in the future, and will have to buy from a larger house than his own, in, possibly, his own town. Thereby the cost of the article is increased to the small trader and, as many of the customers of these small traders through the country are of the working class, it is obvious that by the action of this particular clause in the Bill, the price of the goods will be increased to the poor people, and the cost of living will be raised thereby.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I cannot accept the last pronouncement of Deputy Good. I do not know what the position would be if Deputy Figgis's suggestion of the plaintiff city were accepted as the city of trial when, from another point of vantage, in this Dáil, I find that the city he was most concerned with was the city of Manchester.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I would

like if the Attorney-General would state exactly when he dis-
4 o'clock. covered that solicitude of mine. Seeing that I based the case I made at that time on special Irish grounds, and inasmuch as action was taken by Manchester merchants to insert a clause derogatory to our Courts, I protest strongly against the perversion of my argument, and seeing that the Attorney-General was present, or was at least in the precincts of the Dáil, I cannot help saying that this was a deliberate perversion.

ATTORNEY - GENERAL: I am afraid it must have been due to the less advantageous position in which I then was that I misunderstood the Deputy. I am not greatly impressed by this matter of ledgers. In the first place, if there is a genuine defence, it is important that the ledger should be produced in Court. I have often seen in the country claims ruled out, when the ledger was produced, under the Tipling Acts, Truck Acts, and so forth. The modern system of ledger lends itself to conveyance, even in parts, to various districts in the country because, I think, the loose-leaf system of ledger has established itself in all the big commercial concerns which seem to be concerned in this particular matter.

Perhaps, I may further allay the anxiety of Deputy Good in this respect. When motions for summary judgment are made to the court it is a common procedure on the part of the defendant, if he has a show of defence, to serve a cross-motion to have the hearing of the action transferred to his own venue. One of the considerations which under the existing rules, and presumably under the new rules, the court must look to is the comparative cost and convenience of hearing in the local venue as compared with the hearing in the Dublin venue. I really think that all the points which have been made by Deputies in the supposed interests of the commercial community are really covered either directly or indirectly in the Bill. They will still have their summary judgments. They will still have the question of comparative cost and convenience considered when the question of the transfer of hearing arises, and it will be open to the High Court or the Circuit Court to have the hearing in Dublin or locally as these considerations affect the mind of the Court.

Captain REDMOND: I would like to ask the Attorney-General one point. I had an amendment down to Section 49. It was to insert a new Section before Section 49. The amendment was in effect that where there was an action pending in the Circuit Court which might have been commenced in the District Court, any party to the action might move to have the action removed to the District Court. I understood the spokesman of the Government to say that that was already provided for in the Bill. Be that as it may, I would like to ask the Attorney-General whether, supposing an action was pending in the District Court, it would be possible for any party to that action to ask to have it sent forward or transferred to the Circuit or to the High Court. It is for information I desire to ask this question.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I will not say at the moment that it is actually so, but I will examine the provision as it stands and see whether it is possible to transfer to the Circuit Court. I think the power of transferring these very small cases to the High Court should be of the most restricted character.

Captain REDMOND: I am very much obliged. Perhaps when the Attorney-General is looking into this matter he might have regard to this amendment put down to Section 49, and assure me it is provided for in the Bill.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Leave is asked to withdraw amendment 32.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move in line 50, in Section 80, to delete the words "defendants reside or carry" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "defendants or one of the defendants ordinarily resides or carries." Obviously there is a case in which all the defendants will not reside in one district, and the object is to provide for such cases.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question—"That Section 80, as amended, stand part of the Bill"—put and agreed to.

SECTION 81.

A Justice of the District Court shall sit once a week, if requisite, in a special Court in the City of Dublin, to be called "The Children's Court," and shall deal with such charges against children as he may consider to be of a trivial nature in such manner as may seem just. Children herein shall include young persons of either sex under the age of 16 years.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I move, in Section 81, to delete the words in line 58 "City of Dublin" and to substitute therefor the words "Cities of Dublin, Cork, Limerick and Waterford." The effect of it is that a Children's Court should be set up in Cork, Limerick and Waterford, as well as in Dublin. The provision is only made for the setting up of a Children's Court in Dublin. It is highly desirable that all charges against children should be held in a special Children's Court. The probability is that it would create difficulties at first. I think it would be highly desirable to extend the provisions of this Section to the other three cities mentioned. Those Courts are specially desirable in cities where very many of the offences arise from street trading and matters of that kind, and I urge that the provision should be extended to those other three cities.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I agree with the Deputy that this is a matter affecting the city population, or a large town population particularly, and it is, perhaps, not justifiable to confine it to Dublin. Of course, we have not been able to develop the subject of the Children's Court beyond the point shown in this Bill, namely, the providing a hearing for cases against children in special surroundings other than the formal courts and have them dealt with in a paternal rather than a judicial manner. I am prepared to accept the amendment of Deputy O'Connell, applying that provision to Cork, Limerick and Waterford, as well as Dublin.

Mr. GOOD: Might I point out that in places even apart from these large cities it would be very desirable if any arrangements could be made, when it is necessary to bring children and their mothers to court, whereby there should be the absence of any connection with the criminal proceedings in this court, so that there should be no mixing up of criminals and children and their mothers in the same court. If separate courts cannot be provided in small towns, separate days and hours should be at least provided.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I do not think it is feasible to do anything on so wide a line at present, as Deputy Good suggests. The problem is, of course, a very difficult one. If one were to deal with all cases of a criminal character in which children are involved it would become an extremely difficult matter, but at present we are dealing simply with a case where children have charges preferred against them. I understand that the District Justices are, wherever possible, trying to deal with children's cases apart from other cases. I have spoken to a number of them on the subject, and I believe they are actually doing so, but it is not possible to make any provision here save in respect of these cities.

Mr. GOOD: Of course, it is only trivial cases we are considering. I take it that some of the charges dealt with here would be where schools have not been attended. Surely in such cases it would be highly undesirable that the children should mix with criminals in the same court.

Mr. D'ALTON: I think what we might ask the Attorney-General to do in this case would be, as far as possible, to see that the procedure he has stated, as taking place in some courts, would be adopted in all courts. I am aware of the fact that in my particular district the District Justice brings all these children into what was formerly the magistrates' room and deals with them previous to the other court proceedings.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move:—

To delete all after the words "deal with," in line 59, down to the words "just," line 61, and to substitute therefor the words:—

"charges against children in any case which he may consider, by reasons of the age of the child, or of the nature of the charge, should be dealt with in a Special Court, and shall deal with such charges in such manner as may seem just."

The object of the amendment is practically to extend the authority of the Children's Court to cases which may not be of the trivial nature referred to in the Section, as drafted, but even more important cases, at the discretion of the Justice. The reason for removing the child from the atmosphere of a criminal court is, I think, just as great when the charge is more serious than contemplated in the Bill and designated to be of a trivial nature. If there is a more serious charge it is still desirable, I submit, that the atmosphere of the criminal court should be avoided where possible, and the object of the amendment is to give the discretion to the Justice to say that by reason, either of the age of the child or the nature of the charge, the case shall be dealt with in a special court;

And shall deal with such charges in such manner as may seem just." That is, of course, the phraseology of the amendment, as it is drafted. The real change suggested is that the discretion of the Justices should be used as to whether it is the kind of case that could be dealt with in a Children's Court, and not to confine it to a case of a trivial nature. I hope the Attorney-General will agree to accept this amendment.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I am inclined to agree that the word "trivial" is not a very happy one. I will undertake to consider the amendment or some other form of words that perhaps would meet the case better than the word "trivial."

Professor MAGENNIS: In connection with this matter, I would like to remind Deputy Johnson that the clause to which his amendment applies intends to carry out the recommendation of the Judiciary Committee, as set out in page 14. There, what is recommended is that on one distinct day in a separate court charges preferred against children shall be heard. I perhaps misunderstood Deputy Johnson to suggest that it should be in the discretion of the Justice whether he would hear a case when it came forward, in this particular way, or not. But the clause of the Bill is better in that respect, because it provides for a special day and a special sitting in a separate court, but the words used in the Judiciary Committee Report are better than the word "trivial." They are: "Except those of an aggravated or heinous nature." What to me is more important still is why the recommendation of the Judiciary Committee is not followed here: "The court to be separate and disconnected from the Police Courts"—this is the case of the Dublin City jurisdiction—"And the presiding Justice to be one or other of the two Junior Metropolitan Justices, with an assessor selected from a Panel of women who consent to act." That, at the time that I first studied this important Report, struck me as exceedingly valuable, and yet, for some reason, not explained, it is omitted from the Bill. It seems to me that when the clause in question is being reconsidered, to meet Deputy Johnson's suggestions, the opportunity should be afforded for considering the Judiciary Committee's suggestion as we

Mr. JOHNSON: I would like to make clear to Deputy Magennis that if the amendment were to be adopted as drafted the Section would read: "A Justice of the District Court shall sit once a week if requisite in a special Court in the Cities of Dublin, Waterford, Cork, and Limerick, to be called 'The Children's Court,' and shall deal with charges against children in any case which he may consider by reasons either of the age of the child or of the nature of the charge, should be dealt with in a Special Court, and shall deal with such charges in such manner as may seem just." The Special Court will be maintained; the only change that will take place is that the charges may be more serious than contemplated in the Bill as drafted and yet may be dealt with in the Special Court.

Mr. WOULFE: I sympathise entirely with what Deputy Magennis and Deputy Johnson said with regard to separate courts for children. I think not only should there be separate courts in the big towns and cities, but also through the country. I have a long experience, of between 30 and 40 years, of jurors' and grand jurors' work in county towns, and I have been shocked, beyond measure, on many occasions, by seeing children brought for trial before crowded courts, upon cases varying from trivial things to very heinous offences. I thought long ago, and I think still, that it has a most demoralising effect on them and on their after life. I thoroughly sympathise with this, and I think not only the towns but the country districts should have a chance of having separate courts for children. It is in the interests of the nation. After all, we look to the children to carry on the traditions of the nation. If they are demoralised what can we expect?

Mr. JOHNSON: As I understand the Attorney-General is prepared to consider some alteration of the clause which will embody the ideas expressed, I beg leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put: "That Section 81 as amended stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 82.

A Justice of the District Court shall have power to make such orders under Section 6 of the Debtor's Act (Ireland), 1872, and any Act amending the same for the enforcement of any decree of the District Court as may seem just.

Mr. GOOD: I beg to move the amendment standing in the name of Deputy Hewat:—

To insert before Section 82 a new Section as follows:—

"Where any documents which would, if duly proved, be admissible in evidence are produced to the Court from the proper custody, they shall be read without further proof if in the opinion of the Judge they appear genuine and if no objection is taken thereto.

If the admission of any documents so produced is objected to the Judge may adjourn the hearing for proof of the documents and the party objecting shall pay the costs caused by such objection in case the documents are afterwards proved, unless the Judge otherwise orders."

I moved a similar amendment yesterday to the clauses dealing with the Circuit Court, and the Attorney-General on that occasion was unable to agree with the object of this new Section, but I think the Section applies with much greater force in the District Courts where the sums are small, and where it is very desirable that the expenses of recovering them should be kept as low as possible. I would ask him if something could not be done to meet cases here outlined in the District Courts. It was pointed out yesterday that it was possible to deal with these documents in another way, but of course that would mean an action or motion in another Court, which possibly would be out of all proportion to the expense involved. The intention of this proposal is fairly clear: In the case of a letter or some document of some importance being produced, and which satisfies the Judge with regard to its genuineness, he should have the power to admit that document as evidence without the necessity of calling for proof of that document, as I understand is the custom. I say that procedure would apply with particular force in the case of the District Court where the sums are small, and where it is exceedingly desirable, for the reasons I have stated in another clause, that the expense should be kept down, and I would be glad if the Attorney-General could see his way to accept these proposals in connection with these Courts.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The amendment, as it stands, I think cuts into the law of evidence in a way that it is difficult at the moment to estimate, but as regards the suggestion I made yesterday, I see no reason why that should not apply to District Courts as well. I take it that in suggesting this method of admitting documents the Deputy is only referring to civil cases and not criminal cases.

Mr. GOOD: Civil cases.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: But the amendment is not so qualified. The Deputy must have misunderstood me yesterday, because I did not intend to convey that a motion is required in any court for the particular procedure to which I was referring. A document can be made the subject of notice to admit without any motion under the existing rules of the High Court. It is a matter of form. A printed form is served, and in the schedule to that form is set out the documents and the other party is compelled to bear the costs of proof, if he does not succeed. I see no reason why that procedure should not be applied by the rules of the District Court to civil cases in the District Courts also. That is the best way to provide for it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. GOOD: I move the following:—

To insert a new Section before Section 82 as follows:—

“Wheresoever any District Justice shall in any proceedings brought under and by virtue of this Act grant a decree, dismiss or order the same shall be with such costs as are provided by this Act.”

This amendment is of a similar nature to the last. I understand that the clause, as proposed, is taken entirely from the present Civil Bill Act, which, of course, applies to smaller cases of debt as will come under the jurisdiction of the District Court. I am told by those who have a good deal to do with debt collecting that it is very desirable that the decrees, dismisses, or orders, shall be with such costs as are provided, and they shall be embodied in the Act. I am told it is of great advantage in the Civil Bill Act, and it will be looked upon by the large section of the community dealing with commercial matters as a great advantage if incorporated in this Bill.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: That particular Act does provide for costs, and this amendment which, referring to this present Bill, says “shall be with such costs as are provided by this Act,” will hardly do, because this Bill does not provide for costs. It provides that costs shall be the subject of rules, and consequently this amendment could not apply.

Mr. GOOD: Is it then the rule-making authority that will deal with this?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes.

Mr. GOOD: That being so, I am satisfied, but this being already enacted at the moment, one thought that there should be some strong reason why it should not appear in the new Act.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made and question proposed.
“That Sections 82 and 83 stand part of the Bill.”

Agreed.

SECTION 84.

A Justice of the District Court shall (if requested by any party to any proceedings before him unless he consider the request frivolous) and may (without request) refer any question of law arising in any case before him to the High Court for determination, and the determination of the High Court thereon shall be final and conclusive and not appealable.

Mr. GOOD: I move: To insert before Section 84 a new Section as follows:—

“Any action in the District Court may be registered as a ‘Lis Pendens’ and the judgment in any action for any sum exceeding £20 over and above costs may be registered in the Central Office of the High Court in like manner as Actions and Judgments of the High Court.”

The object of this amendment deals with the rights of registration, which are obvious, and which need no remarks of mine.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I do not know who is responsible for suggesting that actions of the District Court be registered as a lis pendens. It cannot have been any person who really understood what lis pendens is. The process of registering a lis pendens is one which relates to land. It enables actions which deal with land to be registered so that if a person is about to buy land, he has to ascertain whether there is any lis pendens; that is to say, whether there is any pending action affecting the title. The person is put upon search as to whether there is any lis pendens. There is no object whatever in registering for little actions for debt as a lis pendens; it would have no purpose. The only things now registered in the High Court or anywhere else are actions for specific performance of a contract, a sale of land, probate actions affecting land, in some cases matrimonial suits where alimony is granted against land, or administration suits.

Mr. GOOD: Under the new procedure will there be any registration of judgments?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Do you mean registration of judgments by way of a judgment mortgage? I do not know whether the Deputy is referring to registration for the purpose of subsequently converting the judgment into a mortgage against land. If so, that procedure can be made applicable to the judgment of the District Court where it exceeds £20. I do not know what other purpose of registration he has in mind.

Mr. GOOD: At the present moment there are registrations of judgments which are very useful to the commercial community, and we want to know under the new regime will there be any similar registration. Of course, as the Attorney-General can understand, they are very useful in matters of credit.

ATTORNEY - GENERAL: Perhaps the only other form of registration would be for the purpose of bankruptcy. Under the present law a judgment must be registered within 21 days of its having been obtained in order to be made effective in bankruptcy. That is under the bankruptcy law. If I knew what exactly the Deputy was pointing to—

Mr. GOOD: At the moment it is possible to register a judgment for debt, and, of course, that is useful to the commercial community. It guides them as to whom they will give credit and to whom they will not give credit. I was anxious to know under the new regime will there be any similar registration.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I take it, it is for the purpose of two well-known Gazettes. Do I understand that is the purpose of registration that the Deputy has in mind?

Mr. GOOD: Yes. Might we know, under the new regime, whether it would be possible to have that information obtained even by those two bodies and circulated among the commercial community?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Yes.

Mr. GOOD: That is all I want to know.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment by Mr. P. HOGAN:—

“ To insert before Section 84 a new Section as follows:—‘ In any proceedings against any person in the District Court in respect of an offence triable by such court, the accused, or his or her husband or wife (as the case may be), shall be competent but may not be compelled, to give evidence.’ ”

PADRAIC O h-OGAIN (An (‘lár):
Ba mihian liom an leas-rún seo do chur os comhair na Dála. Uaireanta thuitcann sé amach nach mbíonn acht beirt duine a thabhairt fiadhnais i gcúis éigin sa (‘húirt agus do réir an t-sean-fhoela, bíonn dhá imsin ar gach sgeul. Ba cheart go dtabharfaí an oiread aire do sgeul aon fhir amháin agus a d-tabharfaí do sgeul an fhir eile.

In moving this amendment I am merely asking the Dáil to sanction a very old principle of justice, that is, hearing all sides involved in a dispute. It does not require much knowledge of things in general to know that often cases will arise where there will be only two people capable of giving adequate or accurate information to a court, and in these cases where it is proposed to set up courts and where cases will be decided without any jury, there is the danger that if you concentrate on one side of the evidence you will very often lose your proper perspective. You will have before the court, plaintiff and defendant, or accused and accuser, and if you hear one side and neglect to hear the other you will be giving an unfair advantage to one and you will not do justice to the side of the accused. I do not know whether it is an advantage to say that this principle has been accepted across the water, but whether it is an advantage or not the fact remains that it is an accepted principle in other countries; even the English Military Courts accepted it during the Reign of Terror here, when the accused were entitled to give evidence on their own behalf. The legal luminaries opposite indicated a little while ago that it enabled the Judges in arriving at a decision to examine the accused, and to ascertain from his demeanour whether he was telling the truth or not. From that point of view it would be to the advantage of the Judge to hear the second side of the case. If I understand the function of a Court of Justice aright it is to secure the maximum amount of information for the Court, so as to give the maximum amount of justice, and I, therefore, consider it is to the advantage of the Judge and of the Court to have the maximum amount of information, and so be in a position to give the maximum amount of justice.

Captain REDMOND: I think that Deputy Hogan has done a great service by proposing this amendment to this particular Section. I also think that it is a great pity that both he and others of us Deputies overlooked this principle before, and did not propose it in regard to the previous portions of the Bill. This principle here enunciated should, if adopted with regard to District Courts, certainly be adopted all through the legal system. The proposed amendment raises a much larger question than appears upon the face of it. In this Bill we have already adopted the Court of Criminal Appeal from across the water. It was only quite recently enacted there. It met with considerable opposition at the time it was proposed. However, it seems to be working satisfactorily now. We did not adopt in this country the principle that an accused person should be entitled to give evidence himself in all cases, nor that his wife (or the husband, as the case may be) should also be entitled to give such evidence. Now, I think that it would be very advisable, indeed, if the Attorney-General would consider the possibility of inserting, if not at this stage of the Bill, or in regard to this particular Section, a similar Section to that embodied in the Criminal Evidence Act which now obtains in England. There it is possible for an accused person in a criminal case to give evidence. He is not compelled to do so, but it is thought that in the interests of justice it is advisable that he should not be prohibited from doing so. Therefore, I would urge upon the Attorney-General, at least, the advisability of seriously considering whether in this Bill we could not at some stage, not necessarily this one, embody the principle of the Criminal Evidence Act which now obtains in England, as we have already embodied the principle, and actually have set up a Court of Criminal Appeal which obtains there now, and which has not until now been brought into existence in Ireland.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Deputy Redmond has stated that this matter was overlooked by the Deputies up to this. I am happy to be able to inform him that it has not been overlooked by us because we have a Bill under consideration at present which I hope will be introduced fairly soon, containing this principle which in present circumstances is, I think, a beneficial reform. The extension of the Act for enabling prisoners to give evidence to Ireland, was for many years opposed by Mr. Redmond and others at Westminster. It was at that time properly opposed.

Captain REDMOND: Give the reason.

ATTORNEY GENERAL: Because the manner of prosecutions at that time and the general atmosphere of prosecutions were of such a character that it was not considered advisable that prisoners, particularly political prisoners, should be subjected to what they would have to face in the witness-box. I hope we have changed the atmosphere and manner of prosecutions. I think that we have. We certainly have tried. For my part I have, in dealing with various persons responsible under me for prosecutions through the country, told them frequently that their programme is not to bag the largest quarry possible, but to administer justice fairly and equitably. I think that with the new atmosphere, and the new manner of prosecution that this particular reform is now ripe. A Bill will shortly be presented to the Dáil providing for it with such safeguards as would be proper in relation to such a matter. I consequently suggest that the amendment should be withdrawn in this Bill as it is not a proper subject nor a proper way to achieve what the Deputy desires.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would like to say that the fact that this amendment only deals with the District Courts and might well have been inserted in some previous Sections in reference to the higher Courts was not through advertence. We felt that there were technical difficulties, that we were not perhaps in a position to deal with; and that such amendments as Deputy Redmond thinks ought to have been suggested, would better have come from those who are able more effectively to deal with them with a full legal knowledge. We thought that if the District Courts were put into the position of receiving evidence from an accused person that it might very rapidly lead to a similar reform in regard to the higher Courts. I think that Deputy Hogan will gladly agree to the withdrawal of the amendment on the promise of the Attorney-General that this reform is under consideration with a view to adoption.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 84 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 85.

An appeal shall lie in Civil Cases and licensing cases from any decision of a Justice of the District Court to the Judge of the Circuit Court within whose Circuit the District of the Justice lies, and the decision of the Judge of the Circuit Court on any such appeal shall be final and conclusive and not appealable.

Vol. 5.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move amendment 40:—In line 14 to delete the words "civil cases and licensing cases" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "all cases other than criminal cases."

This is merely a drafting amendment and it is really consequential upon amendment 26.

Question put and agreed to.

Amendment 41 (Mr. Richard H. Beamish) not moved.

Question—"That Section 85, as amended, stand part of the Bill"—put and agreed to.

Section 86 ("Appeal in Criminal Cases") agreed to and added to the Bill.

Section 87 ("Case stated, or appeal, to be in form, etc., prescribed by Rules") agreed to and added to the Bill.

Section 88 ("Appeal in Licensing Cases") agreed to and added to the Bill.

SECTION 89.

(1) The Minister for Home Affairs may from time to time by warrant under his hand appoint and remove such and so many fit and proper persons as he shall think expedient in each District to be called "Peace Commissioners" and to perform and exercise within such District the duties and powers of Peace Commissioners under this Act.

(2) A Peace Commissioner shall have all the powers and authorities which immediately before the commencement of this part of this Act were vested in a Peace Commissioner under the District Justices (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1923, in respect of the several matters following, that is to say:—

- (a) signing summonses;
- (b) signing warrants;
- (c) administering oaths and taking declarations, affirmations and informations;
- (d) committing dangerous lunatics and idiots to Lunatic Asylums under Section 10 of the Lunacy (Ireland) Act, 1867;
- (e) signing certificates for the admission of lunatics and idiots to Lunatic Asylums;

[Section 89.]

- (f) signing the certificate required by Section 2 of the Registration of Clubs (Ireland) Act, 1904.

Provided always that any summons against any member of the Civic Guard shall be signed by a Justice of the District Court.

(3) Whenever any person charged with having committed an indictable offence shall be arrested by a member of the Civic Guard, such person shall, unless a Justice of a District Court is immediately available, forthwith be brought before a Peace Commissioner, who, after hearing such evidence as may be offered shall remand such person either in custody or in such bail as the Peace Commissioner shall think fit and remit the case for hearing before a Justice of the District Court on a date not later than the next sitting of the District Court to be held in the District where such person was arrested.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move amendment 45:—

Before Section 89, to insert a new Section, as follows:—

“At or before the commencement of proceedings in a District Court, the District Justice may, with the consent of all parties to the proceedings, endeavour to effect a settlement of the case by way of conciliation. In the hearing and determination of such a case the District Justice shall act according to equity, good conscience and the substantial merits of the case, without regard to technicalities or legal form, and shall not be bound by any rules of evidence, but may inform his mind on any matter in such manner as he thinks fit. The hearing and determination of any case by way of conciliation shall be without prejudice to the right of any party to institute formal proceedings in the District or other Court unless all parties to the case agree to accept the determination as final, when the determination shall be recorded as and shall have full force and effect as if it had been a formal decision of the Court.”

The introduction of the principle of the conciliator that is sought for by this amendment is perhaps a new principle in form, but I think in fact it has been not at all unusual, and it is a desirable submission that the statutes should allow the District Justice to act as Conciliator with a view to avoid continuous legal proceedings, and to avoid the bad blood that very often follows legal proceedings. This is not a new principle; it has been adopted in many other countries and with great success. It is being strongly advocated in Great Britain by experienced judges, and I hope it will not require very much argument to secure the support of the Dáil. The actual language of this amendment is taken from an Act of the Australian Commonwealth Parliament in reference to a similar office, and I think it defines clearly enough the kind of case and the manner of dealing with it that should be embodied in this Bill. I daresay there will be objections from the legal gentlemen because of the removal to the atmosphere of conciliation and the reference to discuss the merits of the case without regard to legal technicalities or legal forms. But I do not think the legal profession will object as a whole. They do, very often, themselves act in their own practice as Conciliators, and do not allow cases to go to the Courts very often. This new clause desires to give the District Justice the power to act with the consent of both parties as Conciliator, and so avoid the expense, ill-will and possible vendetta that very often follows adverse decisions against one party or another. I think the proposal speaks for itself, and may not require very much further advocacy.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I had the advantage of reading the suggestions already made on the part of the Labour Party to the Judiciary Committee, and in substance stated here to the Dáil on previous occasions. I think it will be found that in countries where this functionary, the Conciliator, operates you have a Code system of law with a rather bureaucratic system of judicial tribunal. Under the Code system you have a very rigorous cast-iron method of dealing with cases, and the functionary who administers the law simply declares the sentence prescribed, or the decision prescribed by a particular clause of his Code. The Conciliator in these countries means rigidity of the Code, and rigidity of the bureaucratic tribunal.

Here we have inherited a different system in which the Judge has wide discretion and range, in which he may decide the case according to the merits and justice as it appears to him. I do not think the setting up of a separate Conciliator is one that is called for by the system that we have here. Deputy Johnson does not propose a different person. He proposes that the District Justice should, in the first place, act in the capacity of Conciliator, that he should first hear the case, disregarding all the rules of evidence, and then if he failed to conciliate he should assume the ermine and rigidly bind himself by the rules of evidence as regards the facts.

Mr. JOHNSON: Will the Attorney-General read the amendment? It says "at or before the commencement of the proceedings the District Justice may with the consent of the parties to the proceedings——"

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: But then should he fail to conciliate he has already had his mind opened to matters that it would not be legitimate for him to consider were he approaching the subject from the judicial point of view as a tribunal, and how is he to discharge his mind of matter that he has admitted to it in his futile effort to conciliate? Speaking from my own experience of agreed settlement of disputes, I really do not think that on the whole settled disputes meet with the satisfaction of either parties. Fixed decisions of the Court in the settlement of affairs between people are better, whereas the settlement of the affairs between people compelled to agree leads to this, that for the rest of their lives they never cease to regret what they might have got had they fought the case out. Now, save that this Section purports to authorise the District Justice to entertain matters which he could not legitimately entertain as a judge, it really does not do anything new in principle. This Section, I think, only enables him to do what he may now do. He is now at liberty, with the consent of both parties, to bring them together and reconcile them and arrive at an agreed solution of the dispute if he can, and I think when these District Courts develop with this extended jurisdiction, close to the people and with their disputes known and thoroughly understood by the District Justices moving amongst them, that there will be a tendency in this direction. It is not necessary to authorise the District Justice to do a thing with the consent of both parties. He can do that as the matter stands now and enter it down in his book as the matter stands, but it is very inadvisable to invite him to consider matters that he is not otherwise at liberty to consider for the purpose of settlement, and then, if he failed to settle, to approach the case with his mind charged full of those matters that should not legitimately be present to his consciousness. For these reasons I cannot accept the amendment.

Mr. GOREY: I think the Attorney-General has taken the correct view on this matter. At least the opinion he has expressed agrees with our view. As far as we are concerned, we have no objection to Arbitration or Conciliation Courts. I do not see very much distinction between these courts, but as we know very good work has been done both by Arbitration and by Conciliation Courts. However, I do not think they can be at one and the same time Arbitration and Conciliation Courts and also District Courts. For myself, I could not understand a District Justice being also a Court Arbitrator. The position, I think, has been very clearly explained by the Attorney-General, and I might say that our views agree with his. We do think, if it were possible, outside of the District Courts Bill, to have Conciliation or Arbitration Courts, they might serve a very useful purpose. As I have stated, they were in operation in recent years, and they did a lot of good, but at the same time I do not think you could have them linked up together with the District Courts.

Mr. GOOD: I would like to ask the Attorney-General if there is anything in this Bill that would prevent a decision arrived in an Arbitration Court being registered in High Court?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Under the existing law, in the ordinary case of arbitration with proper submission, the submission and award can be made a rule of the High Court, and can take effect as a judgment of the High Court.

Mr. GOOD: Can the same practice follow, then, under the new procedure?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The whole law of arbitration in this country has not been developed as it should. There is an up-to-date Act in England, the Act of 1889, and probably if opportunity arises soon we could consider introducing an Arbitration Act. We still depend upon the provisions of the Act of 1856.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am not convinced of the impracticable character of this amendment, but it is a layman's amendment, and I am not going to try to put the layman's view before that of the Attorney-General. He says it is impracticable and unnecessary. Then I cannot help that, and I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. BURKE: I beg to move the following amendment:—

“In Sub-section 1, to delete the word ‘District’ in lines 44 and 45, and to insert in lieu thereof in each line the word ‘County.’

It is a purely verbal amendment, and I do not think there will be any trouble about its acceptance.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move the following amendment:—

“In Sub-section (2), lines 48 to 50, to delete the words beginning ‘commencement of’ and ending ‘Act 1923’ and to insert in lieu thereof the words ‘6th day of December, 1922, were vested in a Justice of the Peace.’”

As it stands, the Bill refers to the District Justices (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1923, and it is considered undesirable that permanent powers should be conferred under a temporary Act. That is the object of the amendment. It does not alter the Section in any way.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move the following amendment:—

“In Sub-section (2) (c), line 55, to delete the word ‘and’ and to insert immediately after the word ‘informations’ the words ‘and recognisances.’”

This amendment is really only a correction of a clerical error.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: I desire to ask the Attorney-General if he would reconsider the position of Peace Commissioners, and if it would be possible to extend their jurisdiction, excluding the hearing of cases under the Licensing Acts and cases of serious assault?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I am afraid it cannot be reconsidered.

Question: “That Section 89, as amended, stand part of the Bill,” put and agreed to.

SECTION 90.

Section 90—(No further appointments under District Justices (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1923)—was agreed to and added to the Bill.

SECTION 91.

The Rule-making Authority for the District Court shall be the Minister for Home Affairs with the concurrence of the Minister for Finance in respect of matters affecting public revenue or expenditure and the assistance of such of the Justices of the District Court as the Minister for Home Affairs may from time to time nominate for this purpose.

Major BRYAN COOPER: On this Section, I desire again to bring forward the question of the Rule-making Authority, and to ask the Attorney-General why in the District Courts alone the Rule-making Authority contains no representative of those who practise in these Courts. In the High Court, you have that transient phantom, the President of a private corporation, the President of the Incorporated Law Society, and in the Circuit Courts you have two barristers and two solicitors on the Rule-making Authority, but in the District Courts the Rule-making Authority is the Minister for Home Affairs "with the concurrence of the Minister for Finance in respect of matters affecting public revenue or expenditure and the assistance of such of the Justices of the District Court as the Minister for Home Affairs may from time to time nominate for this purpose." On the Rule-making Authority for the District Courts there is no solicitor and no representative of the general public. There is no representative either of the commercial community, but I am certain that is an aspect of the question that Deputy Good will speak on. I am speaking now for the general public, and I suggest that the Rule-making Authority in these District Courts should have on it a representative of the general public. The majority of those appearing in the District Courts will attend in person, and, as we know, the vast majority of defendants in criminal cases are usually not represented by a solicitor or by counsel. They attend to answer the charge made against them, pay the fine if they are fined, and then go out. I think that some machinery should be set up to give the general public representation on this Rule-making Authority. I admit it is not easy to devise machinery required to do that, but still I think if the Attorney-General set his mind to it that something could be done to give the general public representation. Perhaps it might be possible to allow some solicitor to act on the Rule-making

Authority on behalf of the 5 o'clock. general public, and possibly some person might be nominated by the Minister for Industry and Commerce to look after the interests of the people represented here by Deputy Good. If the suggestion I make were adopted I think it would lead to greater confidence in these Rule-making Authorities. The Section states that the Minister for Home Affairs may, from time to time, call in the assistance of District Justices to act on this Rule-making Authority, but presumably he would not select District Justices who would be likely to disagree with him.

Captain REDMOND: On this Section I beg to supplement what has been said by Deputy Cooper by a few remarks on the whole purport of the Section. We have had Rule-making Authorities set up for the High Courts. We have had Rule-making Authorities set up for the Circuit Courts. We have arrived at the final stage and are setting up a Rule-making Authority for District Courts. In the matter of the High Court the framers of this Bill followed, more or less, the proposals laid down in the Judiciary Committee's report. In the matter of the Rule-making Authority of Circuit Courts, they were not so particular. In fact, the Minister for Home Affairs was to be the sole Rule-making Authority in the Circuit Courts, because the word "assistance" was used in the original draft of the Bill. But I am glad to say that the Government saw their mistake in time and by a Government amendment have substituted the word "concurrence," thereby not making the Minister for Home Affairs the sole Rule-making Authority for the Circuit Courts. But here we have, in regard to the District Courts: "The Rule-making Authority for the District Court shall be the Minister for Home Affairs with the concurrence of the Minister for Finance in respect of matters affecting public revenue or expenditure," but with only the assistance of Justices, and such Justices as the Minister for Home Affairs chooses to nominate. Therefore, it comes to this, that the Rule-making Authority for a District Court is to be the Minister for Home Affairs. The Minister for Home Affairs may be, and possibly is at the present time, a very able and energetic person, but certainly this Bill confers upon him not only powers but duties which no other Judicature Bill has ever proposed to confer upon any Minister in any country in the past. But the importance of it is more than that. This Rule-making Authority is to be constituted of a Minister of the Executive of the Government of the day, and in this respect, as in many others throughout this Bill, the Government, while purporting to introduce a measure on the lines of the Judiciary Committee's Report, have disregarded the report wherever they disagreed with it, and have upheld the report wherever they agreed with it—a very accommodating sort of report indeed.

The Judiciary Committee reported in favour of the setting up of a Rule-making Authority for District Courts, and the Rule-making Authority that they suggested was to consist of five District Justices to be nominated, but not by the Minister for Home Affairs. In fact, this Judiciary Committee, of which the Government have such a high regard, I do not think have mentioned the Ministry of Home Affairs from cover to cover in their Report. Certainly they say that the Rule-making Authority is to consist of five District Justices nominated by the general body of Justices, two practising barristers, to be nominated by the Bar Council, and two qualified solicitors to be nominated by the Council of the Incorporated Law Society. Then they go on about the tenure of office and so forth. They suggest that no rule is to come into operation unless it has been submitted to and approved by the Rule-making Authority of the Circuit Court, and they also add that the authority is to select its own Chairman. Here we have the Government proposing, in the face of their own Committee's report, in the face of the Committee which they have been throwing at the head of everyone who has dared to criticise any proposal which they have made in conformity with the views of the Committee, to throw the Committee's suggestion upon one side, and putting forward something entirely and distinctly apart.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE

took the Chair at this stage.

Captain REDMOND: What is the object, I would like to know, of making the Minister for Home Affairs the sole Rule-making Authority for the District Courts? That cannot be denied, because the Government themselves amended the Section in regard to the setting up of a Rule-making Authority for the Circuit Courts by substituting the word "concurrence" for "assistance," because they know as well as I do that the word "assistance" conveys nothing more or less than acquiescence, whereas the word "concurrence" means, in legal parlance, that the Minister for Home Affairs could not frame any rules without the consent of the other parties. Therefore, I think I am entitled to ask from the Government an explanation in the first place as to why they have departed from the proposal of the Judiciary Committee in this respect; in the second place, why they have appointed the Minister for Home Affairs to be the sole Rule-making Authority for these District Courts; and, above all, why they have not, as Deputy Major Cooper has said, placed upon this Rule-making Authority some representative of the professions which will be engaged in pleading before these Courts? Why is the distinction drawn between the District Courts and the Circuit Courts and the High Courts in this respect? I certainly think that it is due not only to the professions but to the public that we should get this explanation. The Rule-making Authorities in all these courts will have a very large say indeed as to the future of this Bill. The Rule-making Authorities will have very large and very wide powers. In fact much as we hear about the eagerness of country solicitors for the passage of this Bill, I can assure the Attorney-General that, from what I can learn—and I do know a few country solicitors—the country solicitors are very anxious indeed to know certain details. I will not mention what ones in particular, but probably the Attorney-General will be able to follow me when I say that they are anxious to know certain details of the rules to be made by the Rule-making Authorities in connection not only with the High Courts and Circuit Courts, but in particular with regard to the District Courts. To say that solicitors themselves are to have no representatives on the Rule-making Authority for the District Courts—a body which shall provide rules which shall have such a force and such a bearing upon the future of their interests—certainly requires some explanation on the part of the Government.

We have heard that there is a great demand for the extension of the jurisdiction, both in the Circuit and District Courts. Well, I have found it very difficult to discover that demand, either among the public or among the members of the legal profession, because I think their interests are one. But, however great the demand may be, I certainly believe that the Rule-making Authority, in the opinion of all classes, whether legal or non-legal, should not be confined to a Minister of the day, whether he be Minister for Home Affairs or anything else, or even the Attorney-General himself for that matter. I think, certainly, if any solitary Minister of the Government is to be the sole Rule-making Authority for the District Courts, the Attorney-General should have been that authority. I do ask seriously if the Attorney-General can give the Dáil an explanation as to why this departure has been made, in regard to the Rule-making Authority for the District Courts, both from the Judiciary Report itself and from the nature of the authority set up in regard both to the High and Circuit Courts.

Professor MAGENNIS: The most objectionable line in the Section, as it at present stands, is that which provides that the rule-making authority is to be assisted by such Justices of the District Courts as the Minister for Home Affairs may, from time to time, nominate for this purpose. I had expected that Deputy Duggan would have introduced an amendment modifying that, so as to keep this Section in line with the reforms already made since the Bill came into Committee. Before the measure came into Committee it was quite obvious to anyone who studied the Bill closely that the District Justices were to be depressed into an unfair position. Deputy Redmond was not a member of the last Dáil, and it may, therefore, have escaped his attention that the District Justices were created by the Minister for Home Affairs in the last Dáil under a temporary measure, and they have been under the control of the Home Affairs bureau ever since. We have changed the status, very much for the better, of the District Justices in the last few days. Section 70 provided that they were to be set up at such salaries as the Minister for Home Affairs might fix. We have removed these words and have left the Section over for further consideration to make that as it ought to be. Likewise, the wording which seemed to suggest that these judges—for judges they are unmistakably—were to have the status of Civil Servants has been modified. Now, I think a modification was due that would prevent even the semblance—even the merest suspicion—of interference by a bureau with these men in the discharge of their duties. If the representatives of the District Justices, who are to figure on the Rule-making Authority, are not to be elected out of their own body, as recommended by the Judiciary Committee, but are to be nominated by the Ministry of Home Affairs—I do not at all suggest that the public would rashly conclude that there was something in the services of those men which recommended them to the favourable notice of the Minister—undoubtedly as years go on, and as there is less and less of this devotion, that at present exists, to Ministers in the country, it is easily conceivable that something like suspicion would arise that these were favourites of the Minister, and when the probing, the enquiry would be set about, various grounds or reasons could easily be found in support of this suspicion, and then the well springs of justice were poisoned. I stand here as I stood in the last Dáil to resist every encroachment of a Ministry upon the administration of justice. We are all here as defenders of democratic rights and liberties, and we should all be equally strong opponents of bureaucracy. I hold seriously that to allow the Minister for Home Affairs to nominate the District Justices who are to take part in the making of the rules for their courts is to open the door—I will not say the back door—for bureaucracy. There is no reason that I can discover why the District Justices should be treated differently in this regard from any of the other judges in their respective domains. It is a small matter. Some people may say I am creating a tempest in a teapot, but though it may be a small matter, from the point of view of the printer or the amount of time it

[Professor Magennis.] takes to read what is printed, there is a very, very important principle involved.

Mr. JOHNSON: I want to support the views expressed by Deputies Magennis and Redmond on this matter. I think this Section and the two following Sections carry on their face the idea that there was the intention to subordinate the Justices in some way to the Ministry for the time being. Perhaps I should not say there was the intention, but it is certainly capable of that interpretation, and more so, when one notes the fact, that whereas the rules for the Circuit Courts and for the High Court are to be laid on the Table of the Oireachtas, the rules for the District Courts are not to be so laid upon the Table. That is added evidence of a difference in status and a difference in relationship between the Judges of the High Court, the Circuit Courts, and the Ministry, and the Justices of the District Courts and the Ministry.

I think the sense of the Dáil has been clearly expressed that in respect to the relationships of the various Judges in the three Courts to the Ministry, they should be identical—that is, they should be independent. I think that the objection to the form of this Section is valid, inasmuch as it fails to maintain that independence, and especially, as I said a minute ago, it failed to provide for the laying on the Table of the Dáil rules which are to be made and which may be amended by the Ministry of Home Affairs from time to time with the concurrence of the Ministry of Finance, with the assistance only of certain chosen Justices. That I think is defective and, while there are no amendments down, I am sorry to say, affecting this point, I hope the Attorney-General will give us an assurance before we pass this Section that there will be an alteration made in the name of the Government in this Section, and that the independence of the Justices will be made secure in every possible way, both in the rule-making and the validation of the rules by the Oireachtas before they come into operation.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: We have had a good deal of discussion on this Section without, however, having any amendment proposed. The reason why the solicitors' profession was not specifically mentioned in this case was that the District Justices are chosen practically equally from both professions, so that a Rule-making Authority would almost of necessity contain solicitors. I am quite willing to consider the question of having practising solicitors added to the rule-making authority. I do not think that the suggestion conveyed by Deputy Magennis is just. The Government has not, nor have I personally, ever attempted to subordinate the position of the District Justices. We regard the District Justice as being one of the best things that the Government has done, and as being on a par with the Civic Guard—something which the people ought to trust and look to. It is undoubtedly the intention of the Government to maintain the Courts as something that the people can look to as their own and can understand. Anything that will make that position more assured will certainly receive every consideration. I am satisfied that the rules should be laid on the Table of the Dáil, and I will undertake that an amendment to that effect will be added. In referring to this word "assistance" in Section 91, Deputies have ignored the fact that in Section 93 the Rules cannot take effect until they are approved by a majority of the Justices on the Rule-making Authority.

Captain REDMOND: Nominated by the Minister for Home Affairs.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Certainly, and why not? The reason is obvious. The District Justices are in somewhat a different position from the other Justices, who will be in Dublin from time to time, and in choosing Justices for the Rule-making Authority one must have regard to those available, because the drafting of Rules is a matter to which one must give consecutive thought and consecutive time, and it will be necessary to choose men accessible for a sufficient period to give sufficient attention to technical clauses of this kind, and men of standing and experience. If the Rules are laid on the Table any defect will certainly be discovered by one or other of the critics to, whom we have been listening. I will consider the question of adding solicitors to the Rule-making Authority.

Captain REDMOND: I am indebted to the Attorney-General for what he has said in regard to laying the Rules on the Table of the Dáil, but my principal objection to this Section is that it is departing from the Report of the Judicial Committee. I want to know why they made such departure. Secondly, they have differentiated from the structure of the Rule-making Authority in regard to other Judges, and I want to know why. Further, it is perfectly true, as the Attorney-General said, that according to Section 93 such rules shall be approved by a majority of the Justices nominated by the Ministry. My objection is that they are to be nominated by the Ministry. No matter what the Attorney-General may say about not having time at their disposal to frame the Rules, surely in an important matter like this, it would not be impossible to find substitutes for the present Justices to take their places while they did consider what proper Rules should be adopted in regard to their own Courts. I think it would be fit and proper that they should be given time, and the time need not necessarily be too great, and facilities for the election of five of their number, as has been suggested by the Judiciary Committee, and these five Justices, in conjunction with two solicitors, whom the Attorney-General is now willing to recommend on the Authority, should act also in conjunction with two practising barristers. He, himself, has said that some of the Justices will be solicitors and some barristers. Why should there not be two practising barristers also, as suggested by the Judicial Committee, on this Rule-making Authority? Therefore, I would submit that it would be far simpler if the Attorney-General could see his way to adopt the suggestion of the Judiciary Committee, or, at least, that portion of it where it is proposed that there should be five District Justices elected by the District Justices themselves, and that there should be two practising barristers and that those should constitute the Rule-making Authority. Of course, if the Government want to have the Minister for Home Affairs there, I presume we will not be able to interfere with their intentions. Let the Minister for Home Affairs also take his part, but in conjunction, at least, with those other parties proposed by the Judiciary Committee, and not with the assistance of those parties, as is proposed in this Section, but with their concurrence as is proposed and approved by the Government in the Section regarding the setting up of a Rule-making Authority both for the High Court and the Circuit Court. I do not think it will be in any way a climb-down or submission on the part of the Government. It will only be doing what they profess to want to do, and that is to make sure that by this Bill they are exhausting every endeavour to put on foot and set up a proper judicial system, both in regard to the limited and High Court jurisdiction, for the people of this country.

Professor MAGENNIS: I fear I have failed to make my position intelligible to the Attorney-General. I pointed out elements of the Bill which, by amendment or promise of amendment in Committee, have been already removed. I argued that to retain this phrase or clause is to retain something which is discordant with the spirit of the creation of the District Justices—the conferring of enlarged jurisdiction upon them and the effort made by the Dáil to secure them the status that comes of a superior remuneration. It is not good policy to bring the Minister and the Judges into the possibilities of conflict. So long as the Minister is the Rule-making Authority, with the assistance of certain District Justices to be nominated by him, and those do not become Rules of Court and operative unless they are approved by a majority of the District Justices, there is the possibility of collision. That is one of the objectionable features of making a Minister the Rule-making Authority, namely, that it is contrary to public policy and highly undesirable. Furthermore, these enlightened and able representative men of all the various [Professor Magennis.] branches of the profession and its work recommend that the District Justices should select five of their number. Nothing has been said to show that that is not a feasible and wise proposal. We have been told of the inconvenience and the taking away from their work. That inconvenience was there no matter who was the selector. Let the District Justices themselves select from amongst their members those whom, from age, experience or ability they know to be the best qualified for this duty. If the Minister is to select them it will provoke a suggestion of bureaucratic interference. I am most anxious we should do nothing that would create a bureaucratic spirit in the least degree.

Mr. GOOD: Might I say another word on the necessity of having a commercial representative on this Rule-making Authority? In the case of the District, 75 per cent. of the work coming before that Court will be matters of the very greatest concern to the commercial community. It is obvious, therefore, that this Bill should have the confidence of that community. We are all anxious when the Bill passes through here that we should, as far as possible, mould it so that it will carry with it the largest measure of the confidence of the people. As has already been pointed out, there is in the minds of a very large section a suspicion with regard to this measure. We all recognise, as commercial men, that much, if not all, of the success of this measure will depend upon the work of the Rule-making Authority. I would, therefore, impress on the Dáil, and especially on the Attorney-General, the necessity of appointing a representative of the commercial community on that Committee so that we may thereby get the confidence of a large section in the Committee and in the Bill.

ATTORNEY - GENERAL: I have really very little to add. I am surprised it should not be proposed that the President of the College of Surgeons, the President of the College of Physicians, and all the archbishops and bishops of the churches should be members of this Committee.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: And the farmers and the beggars.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON: And the criminals.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Yes, a very large class. These Rule-making Committees are persons employed to do entirely a piece of technical work. When the task is done the result will be laid here on the Table of the Dáil. All the classes represented here, except the one referred to by Deputy Johnson, will be able to criticise the Rules and point out their defects if they should continue. It is essential that it should not be a very large body, and that certain members should be chosen for their ability in draughtsmanship, and technical work of the kind. Some also must be chosen who will have a knowledge of the language which is so largely used in a portion of the country in which the Courts are functioning and which has come into such considerable use, particularly along the western seaboard. I am not accepting the proposition to enlarge this Committee. I believe there is an honourable organisation in England called the O.B.E. which has come in for some criticism recently. It looks as if appointment on this Committee will become a violation of the Articles of the Constitution with regard to the conferring of titles of honour. The undertaking I gave is that the Rules will be laid on the Table of the Dáil. I will consider whether two practising members of the two professions might be added to the Committee.

Captain REDMOND: I must trespass once more on the Committee. Step by step the Attorney-General is softening and softening. Perhaps we may succeed before we finish in bringing him the whole way, but I am indebted to him for acknowledging the senior branch of the profession by considering the placing of two practising barristers on the Rule-making Authority. I was not proposing an omnibus committee at all, and probably when the Attorney-General was making those exceedingly humorous references he was not referring to my remarks. What I was proposing was that we should adopt the Judiciary Committee's Report, and I want to know for the third time—and I suppose it is the last time I shall have the right to ask it—why we have departed from the Judiciary Committee's Report in regard to the District Justices and not in regard to the other Judges. No answer has been given to that question. Very well; that being so, we have been promised that a report is to be laid upon the Table of the Dáil. I know something about reports upon Tables of Houses, and I know that often very little attention is paid to them. All I can say is this, that the idea, because the District Justices themselves would have the power to select five of their number, that therefore they would not select among that five men who had as good a knowledge of Irish, required, as the Attorney-General says, for certain parts of the country, as the Minister for Home Affairs would, or that they would not select from among their number as learned members as the Minister for Home Affairs would, I think that is rather too much to ask me to acknowledge. I cannot see why the principle of nominations by a Minister from among a number of District Justices should be pressed upon the Dáil by the Government and why the principle of election, such as is admitted and proposed by the Government themselves in regard both to the Circuit Court and to the High Court, should not be admitted in the case of the District Justices. No reason whatever has been given for departing from this principle and for engaging in this purely bureaucratic proposal. The Minister for Home Affairs is being placed upon all these Rule-making Authorities, but why should he have to perform the whole of the duties of the District Courts Rule-making Authorities? I would suggest from the point of view of the Minister for Home Affairs himself that it places him in a rather invidious position, and it would make it far easier and better for him if the District Justices were to be selected by that body than to be chosen by him.

Furthermore, the Attorney-General has not answered another of my questions, which I shall put again for the third time, and that is why the word "assistance" is used here instead of the word "concurrence." Why was the word "assistance" deleted at the incidence of the Government, and the word "concurrence" substituted in regard to the Rule-making Authority for the Circuit Courts, and why is the word "assistance" insisted upon here and the word "concurrence" rejected? The answer is perfectly obvious but the Government will not give it. It is that the Minister for Home Affairs is to be the Rule-making Authority, otherwise there would be no point whatever in the attitude adopted by the Government differentiating from their attitude in regard to the other courts, and from the Judiciary Committee's Report in regard to all the courts. Once again—and I am afraid it is the last time I will have the power, according to the rules, at this stage at any rate—I ask these questions of the Attorney-General in the hope that, this being the third time, I may be more successful in obtaining a reply.

Major COOPER: It is not every day that we can cross-examine an Attorney-General, and I want to add one more item to the catechism. He has been good enough to say that he will consider whether he cannot add two practising solicitors to the Rule-making Authority, but I should like to ask him in what capacity they are to be added? Are they to concur or are they merely to assist? If they are merely to assist they will be very little use; if their concurrence is necessary then that would be a very valuable concession indeed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: That would be a matter for consideration.

Major COOPER: Careful consideration, I hope?

ATTORNEY - GENERAL: Careful consideration.

Prof. MAGENNIS: Is the Minister obdurate as regards insisting upon the presence only of District Justices who have been named by the Minister instead of District Justices who would be elected out of their own number? He has taken no notice of that whatsoever. He was careful to repudiate what it was unnecessary to repudiate, that the Government had a desire to depress the District Justices. I allege, and I repeat that the wording of the Bill, until it was amended by the Government in the last two days, did give ground for that suggestion. Why do they cling now so desperately to the one phrase in the entire measure which is the spirit of the desire to depress, when they have shown that they are anxious to carry out the idea of the Constitution and make these men judges in every sense of the word? Why do they, as I say, cling so desperately to the one phrase? Either it is because they have conceded so much already to proposers of amendments that the spirit of obstinacy has now set in, or they have some solid and good reason. I am willing to be convinced, but I have heard no good reason. These Rules are of the last importance, because the whole success of the administration of the District Justices' courts depends upon them. The confidence of the people in these is of vital importance also. We have not been told why the Minister for Home Affairs is to be a sort of demigod in this connection. There has been no attempt whatever to persist in making the Minister for Home Affairs the central figure in regard to the other courts. But the origin of the District Justices must be taken into account. They were created by the Minister for Home Affairs under a temporary measure. Their administration has been controlled by the office of the Minister for Home Affairs from the time they began to administer the laws, and now if at the last moment we are to retain words that make the Minister for Home Affairs the central figure a situation is to be created in which it is conceivable at least that there would be collision between the District Justices and the Minister in regard to important Rules. These are things that have not been elucidated, if it is the desire to make this Bill as good a Bill as it can possibly be made. We are proud of the measure. We have approved most heartily and agreed with the Minister, not merely in passing it but in bettering it. But here is an unmistakable blot upon the Bill, and one word from the Attorney-General can remove it. We are still waiting for that word to be said.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I only hope that the Attorney-General will stand firm in his resistance to this proposal. The Dáil and the nation are not to be stampeded by the fusilade of oratory which we have heard here. I think the Minister for Home Affairs should have some control so far as this selection is concerned, because the control of the Minister for Home Affairs is the control of the Dáil, and the Dáil represents the people. I do not see why the Attorney-General should allow himself to be stampeded by any fusilade of oratory about an attempt to set up a bureaucracy, a form of bureaucracy which pertains to law and the control of law. I think the Ministry should take care that they will not be stampeded in any shape or form into doing something that the Dáil would not be allowed to wink at in the future. I think that is the object that inspires all the oratory that has been directed against the Attorney-General.

Mr. JOHNSON: The doctrine enunciated by Deputy McGoldrick compels one to protest against the very expression of the notion that the administration of justice should to any extent be controlled even by the Dáil, and it is perhaps well that there should be some disavowal that any such notion is in the minds of Deputies. The pride with which the Attorney-General looks on the establishment of the District Justices, coupled with the pride in the establishment of the Civic Guard, rather suggests what has been hinted at, that it is the pride of parentage that makes him stand firm on the proposition that in making the Rules for the conduct of the District Courts the Ministry of Home Affairs shall be the over-riding authority. Deputy McGoldrick and any, if such, who think with him, ought to remember that the Rule-making Authority of the Circuit Courts is the Minister for Home Affairs, plus other people whose concurrence must be secured, and similarly with regard to the High Court. No answer has been given to the question raised as to why there should be any differentiation. It is unfortunate that no amendments have been sent in to this Section. It is not, of course, too late. It is desirable, I think, that the Dáil should insist upon the same kind of authority in respect of District Courts as has been agreed on in respect of Circuit Courts—the same kind of authority, possibly with some slight differences in numbers, though I do not know why even there should be that difference—but it should not be an authority which is purely a political authority, whether of the Ministry or the Dáil. I hope that the Attorney-General will, on behalf of the Ministry, give us an indication before this Section passes that he is prepared, in this as in other respects, to make the District Courts harmonise with Circuit Courts, as regards the relations between these Courts and the Ministry of Home Affairs.

Captain REDMOND: I do not know whether I am in order or not, but in concurrence with the idea suggested to me by the Attorney-General, I propose to move an amendment now to this Section, if I get permission.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I think the Deputy must have the permission of the Dáil to move an amendment without notice.

Captain REDMOND: May I ask for the permission of the Dáil?

Professor O'SULLIVAN: On a point of order, Deputy Redmond has spoken three times already.

Captain REDMOND: That is why I want to move the amendment, as I wish to speak again.

Professor O'SULLIVAN: You are speaking for the fourth time.

Captain REDMOND: On a point of order, may I ask whether I am speaking a fourth time when I am raising a point of order and asking you may I move an amendment?

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I would like to put this point, that never previously in the experience of the Dáil when a desire has been expressed to move an amendment in Committee that has not appeared in the Order Paper has the leave of the Dáil been refused.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think there is a Standing Order which gives An Ceann Comhairle the discretion.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: That is quite so. The Deputy is within his right in speaking again if the amendment is in order.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: May I point out that any undertaking I have given must now be taken as cancelled. You cannot have it both ways.

Captain REDMOND: With your permission and the permission 6 o'clock. of the Dáil I desire to move the following amendment:—

Section 91—To delete the Section, and to substitute therefor the following

“The Rule-making Authority shall consist of five District Justices to be nominated by the general body of Justices; two practising barristers to be nominated by the Bar Council; and two qualified solicitors to be nominated by the Council of the Incorporated Law Society, with authority to select its own Chairman.”

I may say these words are taken literally from the Judiciary Report.

Professor O'SULLIVAN: On a point of order, is the Deputy moving the

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes.

Professor O'SULLIVAN: Has he got the permission of the Dáil to do so?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: It is within the discretion of the Ceann Comhairle to allow an amendment to be proposed or to refuse it.

Professor MAGENNIS: On a further point of order, is it not the case that you have that discretion with regard to a Deputy who has not exhausted his privilege of speaking three times? If on the occasion of his speaking in Committee one of his speeches took the form of moving an amendment then he might move that amendment, I submit, without notice, with your permission; but can the limitation of a Deputy's right to speak more than three times in Committee be extended notwithstanding the Standing Orders?

Captain REDMOND: Perhaps I might supplement Deputy Magennis's suggestion, that the limit of speaking three times is a limit of speaking three [Captain Redmond.] times on one particular amendment, or on one particular Section. There is no limit to the number of times either the Deputy himself or any other Deputy may address the Dáil on various amendments or on various subjects.

Professor MAGENNIS: My point of order is this: we have debated a Section of the Bill. In the debating of that it takes any form it pleases, and a Deputy is entitled to make three speeches not exceeding ten minutes each. When he has done that, I submit he has exhausted his right of speech on that Section. After making three speeches he proposes an amendment, which is in effect to speak four times on it, and there will be no end to that, because someone else who has spoken three times could move an amendment to that amendment, and so on ad infinitum.

Captain REDMOND: Might I suggest that if there were twenty amendments to one section each Deputy would have the right to speak three times on each of the twenty amendments, and on the Section afterwards.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I must rule in favour of the view put forward by Deputy Magennis. If the amendment is proposed by another Deputy, it would be open to Deputy Redmond to make three speeches on it.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I beg to move the amendment.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: I beg to second.

Professor O'SULLIVAN: Does the Leas-Cheann Comhairle now accept this amendment from Deputy Cooper?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I accept this amendment.

Mr. A. BYRNE: Before this matter proceeds any further I wish to draw attention to a decision which you have already given. You gave Deputy Redmond permission to move this amendment. Now, a private member stands up and questions your ruling and puts forward a new case. I want to know whether a private member has the right to question your ruling and make you reverse it on a new point raised by another Deputy?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy Byrne has made a mistake; I did not accept the amendment from Deputy Redmond. The matter was under discussion, and there was no ruling given on it.

Captain REDMOND: I presume that at long last I am in order. I do not know really why various Deputies have been so anxious for me not to be in order.

Professor MAGENNIS: For the sake of order.

Captain REDMOND: Deputy Professor Magennis says it is for the sake of order. I am glad he is a custodian of order, and I hope he will always remain so. I have really nothing further to add to what I have already said in regard to this Section. The amendment that has been proposed by my friend, Deputy Cooper, contains wording which is taken directly word for word from the Report of the Judiciary Committee. Now I am glad to see there is a fuller Front Bench than there was during most parts of the discussion of the Section, and perhaps I may once more repeat, in as short a manner as possible, the various questions I have asked and which have been unanswered.

I notice there is now an exodus from the Government Benches, and no wonder, because they have refused to reply to one of my questions. If that is the way that they think they are going to carry on Government, even in this country, they will very shortly find out their mistake. However, the questions are briefly these: Why have they departed from the Judiciary Committee's Report in respect to the Rule-making Authority of District Courts, and not in regard to the Rule-making Authority of the other Courts? Why are the District Justices who are to be on this Rule-making Authority to be nominated by a Government Minister and not elected by the District Justices themselves? Why is it that it is only their assistance that is asked for, and not their concurrence?

Why is it, in effect, that the Minister for Home Affairs is to be made the sole Rule-making Authority for District Courts? I am entitled to ask these questions. Members of the Government may smile, if they like, but one cannot carry on Government in that fashion. The Government have got to answer questions, reasonably-grounded questions, and I say that there is grave reason for these questions.

In the first place, District Justices are Judges under the Constitution, and under the Constitution Judges are to be independent of the Executive of the day, and the Rule-making Authority to set up the rules in the Courts, over which these Justices are to preside, should be equally as independent in authority as the Government have thought fit to make a Rule-making Authority in regard to the High Court and the Circuit Court. What, again, is the reason for the differentiation in regard to the District Courts? That question has been left unanswered, and I ask once more for an answer to it. We are entitled to an explanation. If we think the explanation is a sound one, and if we think it is one that merits the distinction of the change, why, therefore, we are in a position to determine our action in the matter; but is the Dáil to be asked seriously to pass a Section of a Judiciary Bill differentiating in principle from other Sections in regard to the setting up of other Courts, and to the creation of other Judgeships, without being told why that is the case? I think it is asking too much, even of an assembly where the Government have—or think they have—such an enormous preponderance and weight. I think it is only fair that Deputies and the country should know why this distinction is made. That is all I am asking. It is not a very large request. It is not a very unreasonable one. It is not an impossible demand. It is not a trivial demand. It is not a cheap demand. It is a demand pertinent to the matter we are now discussing, and which should and must be cleared up by the Government before they proceed with any further stage of the Bill.

Major COOPER: Perhaps I should explain why I propose the amendment or became its sponsor. I do not think the Government is treating us quite fairly. It is quite possible some of Deputy Redmond's questions are unanswerable, or could not be answered without the careful consideration that the Attorney-General has promised to give to questions which have arisen here. But surely the Government know why they departed from the Report of the Judiciary Committee. Whenever anybody moved an amendment at variance from that Report, the Report has been used to belabour the mover of the amendment. Surely we can ask the Government to give some sort of reason why they have taken this action. I am not anxious to obstruct the Government. I want to see them getting this Bill through to-night. I think they would be treating the Dáil much more fairly by giving an explanation.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I thought I had made the matter very clear. The Minister for Home Affairs, as I explained on a previous occasion, is brought into these Rule-making Authorities in order that the Rule-making Authority may be exposed to the questions of Deputy Redmond and others. If he were not brought in as part of the machinery for making rules, Deputy Redmond and other Deputies could not ask questions.

Mr. JOHNSON: Part of the machinery?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: He is here responsible to the Dáil, and he is the link between the expert technical people who draft these Rules and the Dáil. Having satisfied himself that he can stand over those Rules, he lays them on the Table here, or would lay them on the Table if my offer had been accepted. Then they would be here for the Dáil to criticise, and Deputy Redmond can ask three or more questions if he wishes.

Captain REDMOND: Why the whole authority?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: He is the responsible authority. If Captain Redmond were part of the constitutional machinery elsewhere he must appreciate what the functions of Ministers in relation to these matters are, or the manner in which they become responsible, or assume responsibility for the purpose of criticism in a representative assembly. The departure in other respects I have already explained, so that as regards solicitors, as the District Justices include both Barristers and Solicitors, it was not thought necessary for that reason, as both professions were represented, that additional representation should be given. I had undertaken to consider that matter before this amendment was moved. As regards the method of selection I had already explained, and I think the explanation is a reasonable one, and must appeal to every reasonable person, that the matter in hand is not the control of the District Justices. It is the drafting of technical rules of procedure, and the choosing of persons to draft documents by election from a body of 30 or more persons is an unheard of thing. We choose technical persons for their technical skill and their selection is not to be a tribute of respect to be paid to the father of the body of District Justices, or to any other particular persons amongst them. They were to be chosen only for their capacity to draft rules. The rules, if my offer had been accepted, would be here at the mercy of Deputy Redmond or Deputy Magennis to criticise them. But to choose persons for technical work by election, if that is to be an understanding of democracy, well—

[Attorney-General.]

Mr. JOHNSON: The Attorney-General has surely forgotten Part I. of Section 36 and Part II., of Section 66, 67 and 68. Everything he said in regard to this proposition of Deputy Redmond is contradicted by the practice set out in these other rules regarding the other Courts.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: May I interrupt for a moment? I explained previously in regard to these that we were dealing with Judges who were accessible. Here we are dealing with District Justices scattered all over the country. Regard must be had to their accessibility and the possibility of their giving time and attention to making arrangements perhaps to fill the vacancy while the man is away. In dealing with the High Court you have the Judges here. In dealing with the Circuit Courts you have a small number of Judges easily accessible. But in dealing with 30 District Justices all over the country, to suggest that ballot papers be sent to them to select persons who are capable of drafting rules is certainly a most original proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON: There may be difficulties that the Attorney-General can see on the part of the various District Justices, in selecting somebody to act for them. I think if he will consult with some of those who have been acting as Ministers for a year or two, he will learn that they have found it possible to get over even greater difficulties than that. But that is not the point. The point is not the particular method of selection. The point is that there is to be a difference in status—no, not status, because that is quite understood—but a difference in the relations indicated in respect of District Justices as compared with Circuit Judges and the High Court Judges in their relation to the Ministry. The proposal that I would like to see adopted is that some such machinery—I am not very particular whether it is five Justices or two practising Barristers, or who it may be—but I want to see something approximating to the method of appointment of this Rule-making Authority—approximating to that in operation in respect of the other Courts. I think it is unfortunate that the suggestion should be there, that there is a distinction between this class of Court and that class of Court. We are concerned in this because of the fact that it is the Court which will affect the great majority of the people, more so than the Higher Courts. I think we ought to endeavour to ensure in every way, that the District Justices' position in the State will be as independent of political authority as the High Court or the Circuit Court. As to how that is to be done I am not very much concerned. As to the constitution of that authority, I am not very much concerned, provided that the Rule-making Authority is not to be confined to the Minister for Home Affairs or any other Minister for the time being. I recognise the importance of having the Minister for Home Affairs represented on that authority. But the Bill, as drafted, says that he is the authority and the Rules that may be made to-day may be annulled and altered at some future time. Consequently I feel strongly that some change should be made, and a really radical change should be made in the Bill as presented, so as to make it conform to the plan outlined in respect of the Circuit Courts. Now, in respect to the amendment that has been put forward, I think it is too important a matter to be decided without the amendment having been placed in our hands. It is unfortunate that amendments have not been put forward to this Section. I think it would be very much better that any amendment should be deferred until we come to the Report Stage in this matter, so that the terms of the amendment will be in our hands before we are asked to vote. Otherwise, I do not think it would be wise. I would not be prepared to vote upon the amendment which has been read out, because I would like to consider it much more carefully than one is able to do by merely hearing its phraseology. I think the whole matter can be discussed fully and the amendment can be considered quite effectively, and with much more chance of due consideration been given to it, if it is deferred until the Report Stage. Meanwhile, notwithstanding the threats or withdrawal of his offer, the Attorney-General may possibly submit an amendment of his own, and I think any Deputy interested in the matter can well put forward suggestions on the Report Stage.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: There is one question which has been addressed to the Attorney-General, not three times, but four times, which he has not answered at all. One noticed the Attorney-General stepping rather nimbly among the questions put to him and definitely avoiding some of them, but there was one question put to him and it is important that the Dáil should have an answer to that question, and that is: Why was the recommendation of the Judiciary Committee changed?
Vol. 5.

Why was a change made in the report of the Judiciary Committee in the drafting of this Section of the Bill? That is important. There has been a clear and very definite change, and if the reasons prompting that change were given to the Dáil they might appear to be good and sufficient; but whatever these reasons were the Dáil should be made acquainted with them, and the Dáil could be acquainted with them by no better person than the Attorney-General, because he was a member of that Committee. The Attorney-General is responsible for the wording of the amendment which Deputy Redmond moved. He signed the very words by which that recommendation was made to the Government, and now he comes here and is standing for a form of words that means a change upon the original proposal he himself made. If there be such a change made by him surely the Dáil should be told by him why he has seen reasons to change his own opinion, because the amendment now before the Dáil is one to which he originally put his signature.

Major COOPER: The Attorney-General will be, perhaps, surprised to know that a thing which he says was impossible to be done was actually done. He says it is impossible to ballot District Justices and to get them to appoint their representatives. This thing was done for the purpose of making Rules about five years ago, when there was discontent among the Resident Magistrates and when some felt that they were about to enrol themselves under Deputy Johnson. To avoid this the Government set up a sort of Whitley Council, and the Resident Magistrates elected representatives and sent them here to discuss their conditions of employment. Now if it was possible for Resident Magistrates to do that, why should it not be done by District Justices? I am much impressed by what fell from Deputy Johnson, and if the Attorney-General will give an undertaking that we will have an opportunity of discussing this on Report, I will withdraw my amendment. We would all like to have an opportunity of considering this matter. I am afraid we all spoke on this subject with rather more force than was desirable, and if the Attorney-General gives an undertaking to bring the matter up on the Report Stage, when we shall have a full opportunity for discussing it, I will ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I have offered to bring up on the Report Stage, a new proposal submitting these Rules entirely to the Dáil, and I offered to consider on the Report Stage other propositions in regard to associating other persons with the Rule-making Authority. These offers have been rejected none too graciously. However, I take it this amendment is withdrawn, and if that is so I shall revive my offer, and the matter will then be open for discussion again on Report Stage. In answer to Deputy Figgis, I thought I had explained the reason it was considered more feasible in choosing technical persons to choose them by this method of selection rather than by election. This is a very different thing, choosing people for technical skill in legal matters, from the Whitley Council.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question: That Section 91 stand part of the Bill, put and agreed to.

SECTION 92.

Such Rule-making Authority may at any time and from time to time after the passing and before or after the commencement of this Act make Rules to be styled "District Court Rules" for carrying into effect this Part of this Act (except the hearing by the Circuit Court of appeals from the District Court and the hearing by the High Court of Cases stated by the District Court), and may annul or alter such Rules and make new Rules. In particular Rules may be made for all or any of the following matters, viz., for regulating the Sittings and the Vacations and the Districts of the Justices and the places where proceedings are to be brought and the forms of process, summons, case stated, appeal or otherwise, and the conditions which a party who requires a case stated or an appellant must comply with on the Civil side or the Criminal side or in Licensing cases as the case may be and the Practice and Procedure of the District Court generally including questions of costs and the times for taking any step in the District Court and the use of the National language of Saorstát Eireann therein and the fixing and collection of fees and the officers and offices to be attached to the Court with the adaptation or modification of any statute that may be necessary for any of the purposes aforesaid and all subsidiary matters.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move an amendment. In lines 41 and 42, to delete the words "and the officers and offices to be attached to the Court."

The effect of the amendment is to exclude from the operations of the Rule-making Authority the control of the officers and offices for the reason, that it is felt they should be properly under the control of the Oireachtas rather than the Rule-making Authority.

Question put and agreed to.

Question: "That Section 92, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Amendment 50 (Deputy Hewat) not moved.

Section 93 (Sanction of Rules) was agreed to and added to the Bill.

PART IV.

APPEALS PENDING TO JUDGE OF ASSIZE.

SECTION 94.

"All appeals and other applications to Judges of Assize pending at the commencement of Part II. of this Act shall be heard and determined by such Judge or Judges of the High Court as shall be nominated for the purpose by the President of the High Court, and at such times and places as the Minister for Home Affairs shall, by order, prescribe and direct."

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The following amendment is in the name of Deputy Duggan.

Schedule 1. Before the schedule to insert a new Section as follows:—

PART IV.

MISCELLANEOUS TRANSITORY PROVISIONS.

“ Unless and until otherwise determined by the Oireachtas, all Registrars, clerks and other officers attached to the existing Supreme Court of Judicature or to the Lord Chief Justice in the exercise of the jurisdiction in Lunacy vested in him and to the Courts of existing Recorders, County Court Judges and District Justices shall continue to discharge their duties as heretofore or duties analogous thereto and shall have the same rank and hold their offices by the same tenure and upon the same terms and conditions and receive the same salaries and, if entitled to pensions, be entitled to the same pensions as if this Act had not passed: Provided that the distribution of business among such officers and the duties to be discharged by them severally and any re-arrangement connected therewith shall be regulated, controlled and directed in each case respectively by the Rules of Court, Rules of the Circuit Court, and District Court Rules, to be made under this Act. Nothing in this section shall prejudice the rights of any officer under Section 10 of the Articles of Agreement for a Treaty between Great Britain and Ireland signed at London on the 6th day of December, 1921.”

The amendment is the heading to the schedule, and as a matter of fact it contains a number of misprints. It is to be read before Section 94, and it is to delete the heading Part IV. “ Appeals pending to a Judge of Assize,” and to insert a new heading and a new Section, “ Part IV. Miscellaneous Transitory Provisions,” then Section 94 becomes Section 95, and then comes this new Section, which is intended to transfer to the Courts, pending the re-organisation of the staffs and establishment, the existing staffs of the Courts.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move that amendment.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: With reference to the operation of the Act which is now somewhat extended, as will be observed from the new heading on the Report Stage. it is proposed to bring up a new Section dealing with existing Judges and Magistrates whose age might disqualify them under the Bill from serving so as to enable their services if considered well to be retained.

Question put and agreed to.

Question: “ That the new Section stand part of the Bill,” put and agreed to.

Section 94 put and agreed to.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I beg to move the following amendment to the Schedule: “ To add ‘ Sligo ’ to Section 4.” I think I might also take the following amendment, which is consequential on this one. It is to delete “ Sligo ” in Circuit 5, and to insert in lieu thereof “ Longford.” The object of the two amendments is to take Sligo from one Circuit and put it into another. When I read the Schedule, I discovered that those responsible for it had left out altogether the County Longford. The Attorney-General talked the other day of some people not having read the Bill. Well, I think there must have been someone in his office who neglected to read the last draft of it, otherwise I do not see how the County Longford could have been omitted. The point is that Longford has to be fitted in somewhere now. It must be put into some Circuit, and the object of these two amendments is to make a case for the re-arrangement of Circuits 4 and 5. What I suggest is to take Sligo out of Circuit 5 and put Longford into that Circuit, which, in my opinion, would be the natural one for it. Longford borders on Roscommon and Westmeath and would, I think, fit in suitably with these two counties. Then, what I suggest is that you put Sligo in with Mayo and Galway. Already, even without Longford, No. 5 Circuit is a very large one. It stretches from Sligo to Leix. The President, the other day, remarked that the Circuit Judges would be kept [Major Cooper.] moving about. Certainly the Judge on this Circuit will have a big area to cover, and will have plenty of moving about to do. In the old days there were about twenty-three Petty Sessions Courts in the area comprised in Circuit 5, so that a Circuit Judge spending a fortnight disposing of business in each of these places would be occupied for practically the whole year. The second reason that I have in mind for taking Sligo from Circuit 5 is that Sligo has very little in common with Leix and Offaly, which are inland counties. Leix, as Deputy Davin told us some weeks ago, is a great barley growing county, and its interests are altogether different from Mayo and Galway, which are seaboard counties. I think that Sligo would fit in more suitably with these counties than with Leix or Offaly. If Mayo and Galway were to comprise one Circuit, the Circuit, I am afraid, would be a poor one, and on the whole it would not offer great rewards to the Bar. By putting in Sligo with these counties it would be possible to make the Circuit a fairly prosperous one. I suggest that the arrangement I propose is a very practicable one, because if you take Claremorris as a convenient centre in the Circuit it is quite easy to reach Sligo, Galway, or Mayo from it. A two hours' railway journey from Claremorris would take you to any of these places. I would earnestly urge the Government to accept these amendments which I am now putting forward.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: As regards the omission of Longford, I am afraid the printer must have thought that Longford was still a matter for the Minister for Defence. The Judiciary Committee included Longford in Circuit 5 in the Schedule to their report, and that report was sent to the printer with this draft of the Bill. The population set out in the Schedule includes Longford. As regards the other matter, whether Sligo should be in Circuit 4 or Circuit 5, Mayo and Galway are pretty large propositions in themselves. We have gone more or less on a population basis, but I am quite willing to have the matter examined and to discuss it with Deputy Bryan Cooper, who, I believe, is familiar with that part of the country.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I think it would be a very good idea if the Attorney-General were to discuss the matter with the present County Court Judge for Sligo. He lives in the King's County and knows how far he has to travel.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The matter has already been very carefully considered. We have had maps and plans before the Judiciary Committee in drawing up this scheme.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I accept the Attorney-General's assurance, and I beg to ask for leave to withdraw my two amendments.

Amendments, by leave, withdrawn.

Captain REDMOND: I beg to move the following amendment to the Schedule: "In Circuit 5, to add 'Longford' and re-arrange into ten areas instead of 8."

In moving this amendment, may I say that my intention was to place the Schedule in conformity with an amendment which I had hoped might have been carried to Section 37, Part 2. As that amendment was not carried, and as the Circuit Judges are now limited to 8, contrary to the Judiciary Committee's report, which did not propose a maximum of 8, but which proposed a minimum of 8, but as they are now limited to 8, contrary to the Judiciary Committee's report, I do not see the purpose of proposing 10 Circuits. When proposing an amendment that the Circuit Judges should not be limited to 8, I did get an assurance from the President that should the necessity arise the Government would come to the Dáil and would ask for powers to create new Judgeships, and would not, as I feared might happen, go in for creating posts of emergency men, who would be nothing but the minions of the Government of the day, and who would not be in any respect independent of the Executive as they should, and are supposed to be, by our Constitution. That being so, I would ask for leave to withdraw the amendment.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: You withdraw the amendment in so far as it proposes to create ten Circuits, but not so far as it includes Longford.

Amendment to add Longford to Circuit 5 agreed to.

Amendment to "arrange into ten areas instead of 8" by leave withdrawn.

Question—"That the Schedule, as amended, stand part of the Bill"—put and agreed to.

Mr. GOOD: Some time ago the Minister for Home Affairs promised that he would put before us a financial statement in connection with this Bill, but so far it has not reached us.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. K. O'Higgins): I have not forgotten the promise. The statement will be circulated shortly.

DAIL RESUMES.

Bill reported; Report Stage ordered to be taken on Wednesday, 21st November.

KIDNAPPING IN CO. CLARE.

Major BRÝAN COOPER: I beg to move the adjournment of the Dáil. I believe there is no objection to the motion I am making. I cannot help thinking that we are not now in the right frame of mind to resume the discussion on the resolution of thanks to the Governor-General's Address. Even if we were to resume the debate we would only have a comparatively short time for it, so that I think that it is better we should not take it up now.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: I gave notice earlier that I would raise on the Motion for the Adjournment the question of the presence of armed brigands in the County Clare, and that I would refer to certain cases of kidnapping.

In doing so, I do not in the least wish to censure or indict the Minister for Home Affairs in any way whatever. We all understand the very difficult task he has had, and that he performed it in a very satisfactory manner. At the same time, I think cases like those I have in mind should be brought directly to his notice. It is atrocious that such a state of affairs should exist in any county, and what I ask is—that remedial measures be provided against a repetition of such occurrences in the future. Two distinct cases of kidnapping occurred. The first was that of Mrs. Crowe, of Moyreisk, who was taken forcibly from her home on 23rd September. This was a poor defenceless lady who was blindfolded and forced away from her home. She was taken along the byeways and had to walk a considerable distance, and at last was put in an insanitary hovel, where she was detained for some days. The reason for that, I understand, is that she was held to ransom, and that a sum of something like £400 was demanded for her. It was put up to herself personally, but she refused. A certain individual—I cannot give his name unfortunately, but in any case I had it from the Minister for Home Affairs in reply to a question—approached a solicitor in Ennis on the same subject. Surely this man who approached the solicitor is an accessory to this thing? There was a second case of kidnapping. The subsequent week eleven young men in that area were taken away by upwards of a score of masked and armed men in four motor cars and a lorry, and brought a considerable distance to Fenloe House, where they were subjected to very harsh and brutal treatment. I have placed in the hands of the Minister a statement which one of these men made to me. I did not solicit the statement. He came a considerable distance to ask me to intervene and prevent a recurrence of this sort of thing. The Minister, in reply to a question which I put this afternoon, said there was reason to suppose that they were English friends of Mrs. Crowe.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. O'Higgins): I did not state there was reason to suppose that they were English friends of Mrs. Crowe. I stated that they themselves announced that they were friends of Mrs. Crowe from England, which is a very different thing, the Deputy will agree.

Mr. HOGAN: I accept the correction. The attackers, he said, represented themselves as friends of Mrs. Crowe from England, and spoke with English accents. I ask: Can such a proposition as that be sustained? I do not think so. I do not think it is possible that Mrs. Crowe could procure friends from England. In any case how could they come armed or did they procure arms? How were they able to move round County Clare with immunity and never come in contact with State forces? There is something mysterious surely in their presence there, and they seem to have departed quite as mysteriously. It is true they left a very bad impression on the bodies of the persons they kidnapped. Did they leave no trace, no clue to disclose their identity? I do not want to be taken as standing up for this sort of thing. The sooner this country gets down to a law-abiding state the better. I am urging on the Minister to have exceptional steps taken to end this state of affairs. If there are two sets of criminals everyone must agree that they are native criminals, and that they did not come from abroad. The sooner they are forced to live as law-abiding citizens and that the country cannot be disturbed by their factional disputes, the better.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: There is nothing in the statement that the Deputy has made, nor in the typed statement which he has handed to me, that was not already at my disposal in reports from the Civic Guard Headquarters. I want to stress the fact that when this afternoon, in answer to a Question, I made a statement that these men announced they were friends of Mrs. Crowe from England, I was in no way endorsing or mentally accepting that statement. But it is true that that statement was made by the men, and it was relevant to the Question that was asked this afternoon.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE resumed the Chair at this stage.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Inquiries are proceeding in this case. I admit it is not a proper or normal state of affairs that an outrage of that kind could occur in a county with so little in the nature of evidence forthcoming afterwards, but we are dealing with the real rather than with the ideal. That is the fact. This outrage has occurred, and up to the present it has not been possible to bring definite evidence that would stand test in a court of law against any person or persons in connection with it. Many of these persons who were kidnapped are themselves reluctant to assist in any way in tracing the perpetrators of the outrages. The one statement that has been handed to me, while it is prolific in details as regards the injuries and insults offered to the kidnapped persons, is singularly lacking in helpful evidence. There is one name mentioned in connection with the affair, and in so far as that is helpful it will be followed up, and followed up in a very determined fashion.

Mr. HOGAN: Thank you.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The Deputy ought not to confuse that vague thing called "common knowledge" with legal proof. There is a good deal of common knowledge throughout the country as to who the perpetrators of particular outrages are, or probably are, and yet, we cannot just hail a person before a court and say the whole countryside knows that it was he did such a thing. You have got to have legal proof. It was to meet such a situation that certain powers were asked for under the Public Safety Act. If we come to the conclusion that certain persons committed this outrage, if we are reasonably sure that they did so, then in the absence of evidence that would constitute legal proof, the powers that have been given by the Dáil to the Executive under the Public Safety Act will be used, and used to the full.

The Dáil adjourned at 6.55 p.m.

CEISTEANNA.—QUESTIONS.

[ORAL ANSWERS.]

NEWBRIDGE SOLDIER'S REMUNERATION.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that Private John McCarthy, Army No. 48490, who joined the National Army in Newbridge, and was attested in Trim on the 20th April, 1922, and resigned in Mullingar on the 20th September, 1923, was on re-attestation transferred to the Engineers' Corps on the 2nd October, 1922, working as a blacksmith; whether this soldier, on transfer, was paid at the corps rate of £2 5s. 6d. per week, and, if not, whether the Minister will issue orders to have the arrears due paid as soon as possible.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): The arrears due to Private McCarthy, in respect of his employment as a blacksmith in the Army, have now been paid.

HAULBOWLINE DOCKYARD CANTEEN.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Defence what is the reason for the refusal of the Officer Commanding at Haulbowline to transfer the licence for the wet canteen at the Dockyard to the manager of the canteens, in accordance with previous practice, and whether it is proposed to close the wet canteen or make other arrangements.

General MULCAHY: The renewal of license or other arrangements in connection with the Dockyard canteen at Haulbowline is not a matter for the Army, whose requirements are already met by a canteen run for the purpose by an Army canteen contractor on the island.

POSITION OF LANDLORD AND TENANT UNDER LAND ACT.

Mr. P. J. EGAN (for Mr. Louis J. D'Alton) asked the Minister for Agriculture whether, in the case of a tenant who has been getting an abatement from a landlord for a number of years, reductions under the Land Act, 1923, are to be made under the abated rent or the old rent; whether, in the event of a dispute between landlord and tenant as to the real rent, what is the procedure as to settling the question.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. P. Hogan): Section 22 (3) of the Land Act, 1923, provides that in any case where an abatement of rent has been allowed by the landlord and where an agreement for an abated rent constitutes an agreement for a new rent then the reductions under the Land Act, 1923, are to be made from the abated rent and not from the old rent. The question whether the agreement for the abatement amounts to an agreement for a new rent is a question of fact in each case, which in the event of a dispute between the landlord and tenant can only be decided by the Judicial Commissioner who will hear both sides.

Receivable orders to enable tenants to pay compounded arrears of rent and payment in lieu of rent are issued by the Land Commission in accordance with the particulars of the rent as furnished by the landlord under Section 22 (1). If a tenant questions the accuracy of these particulars as regards the amount of the rent, he can proceed to have the matter determined under Sub-section (3) of Section 22 as explained above.

Rules 3 and 4 of the prescribed rules of the Land Commission, dated 18th August, 1923, prescribe the procedure necessary to obtain the decision of the Judicial Commissioner on this question. The procedure is as follows:—A tenant may lodge an objection in writing with the Land Commission setting forth the grounds of his complaint. A copy of the objection is furnished by the Land Commission to the landlord. If the tenant's contention is not agreed to by the landlord, or the objection is not withdrawn by the tenant, the objection will then be listed for hearing before the Judicial Commissioner. The Rules referred to may be purchased from Messrs. Eason & Son, Dublin.

MULLINAHONE POSTAL DELIVERY.

Mr. LOUIS J. D'ALTON asked the Postmaster-General if he would arrange to have the postal delivery in the district of Mullinahone, which was suspended in June, 1922, resumed.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. J. J. Walsh): Delivery in the case of two posts in the Mullinahone area has been suspended since July, 1922, following the suspension from duty of two auxiliary postmen as a consequence of their connection with Irregular activities. Unfortunately it has not been possible to provide for the deliveries, as no person is willing to perform the duties owing to local intimidation.

The matter is being kept under notice, and every effort is being made to restore the deliveries at the first available opportunity.

The Military Authorities have, so far, been unable to agree to the reinstatement of the suspended postmen.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

DISCHARGED SOLDIERS' UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFIT.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce whether he is aware that Corporal Christopher Mullaly, Army No. 218, and Unemployment Book No. 97634, who joined the National Army on the 12th July, 1922, and was discharged 29th September, 1923, after signing (for fourteen days) the Unemployment Register at Droichead Nua, was informed that he was not entitled to benefit, although he was drawing benefit prior to enlistment, and had one week's benefit to his credit; whether, as this man is unable to find employment, enquiries will be made with a view to payment, and also instructions given to have such cases thoroughly investigated and payment expedited.

MINISTER for INDUSTRY and COMMERCE (Mr. J. McGrath): With reference to your starred question for Friday, the 2nd instant, on the subject of Corporal Christopher Mullaly's claim to unemployment benefit, I have had enquiry made and find that as no contribution under the Unemployment Insurance Acts was ever paid for him before he joined the Army, he is not eligible at all for unemployment benefit under the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1923. He has previously received Uncovenanted Benefit, i.e., benefit not supported by contributions in the years 1921 and 1922, but all schemes of Uncovenanted Benefit have been definitely terminated, and, as you are aware, benefit is now only payable strictly in proportion to unexhausted contributions. No contributions are payable by the Army in respect of Mr. Mullaly's army service, because he was not normally engaged in an insurable occupation before he enlisted.

In the above circumstances it will be appreciated that there is no ground whatever for the suggestion in the last part of your question that any such cases are not thoroughly investigated and promptly paid where payment is due.

BANDON OLD AGE PENSION CLAIM.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Local Government whether he is aware that the old age pension of 6/- per week granted by the Bandon Pension Committee to John Trahy, Watergate Street, Bandon, was, on appeal, disallowed on the grounds that Trahy's wife carries on business in a licensed house; whether he is aware that the proceeds of the business would not suffice to support one person; whether Mrs. Trahy has also to support her daughter, and whether he will have the case further investigated with a view to allowing this claim.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. J. Burke): Mr. John Trahy, Watergate Street, Bandon, claimed an old age pension and was allowed, on the 29th September last, a pension of 6/- a week by the Bandon North Pension Sub-Committee. An appeal was lodged for a higher rate by the claimant, and also one by the Pension Officer against a grant of any pension. The means consist of the profits of a licensed house at Whitegate Street, Bandon, and £13 a year in respect of a son killed in the European War. The question at issue was limited to the estimate of the profits from the licensed house. The Pension Officer, in his report, estimated the profits at £100 a year, and he furnished details of the sales. The claimant did not furnish an alternative estimate, but stated that no allowance had been made for daughter's help in the shop.

£100 a year appeared to be a very moderate estimate of the profit from the sales, even after a reasonable allowance for the daughter's services, and the claim to a pension was accordingly disallowed on the 27th ultimo. A further inquiry does not seem necessary, as the main facts are not in dispute.

PRIVATE QUESTION.

WORKING OF THE LAND ACT.

SEOIRSE MacNIOCAILL asked the Minister for Agriculture for information as to the working of the Land Act, 1923, with such particulars as are available as regards the collection of compounded arrears of rent.

Mr. HOGAN: Immediately on the passing of the Land Act Notices were published in the public Press that the Land Commission was empowered to collect from tenants "compounded arrears of rent" and "payment in lieu of rent," and landlords, agents and receivers were therein notified that they should apply to the Land Commission for forms on which to furnish particulars to enable such arrears and payment in lieu of rent to be collected. A Notice was at the same time published explaining to tenants their position as regards the payment of compounded arrears of rent.

Provisional rules as to the collection of arrears and payment in lieu of rent and as regards the procedure to be followed under the Act have also been published.

Up to the present the Land Commission have been furnished with particulars on the prescribed forms of the arrears of rent due by some 81,000 tenants on 4,400 estates. The amount of compounded arrears payable by each tenant has been calculated, and so far some 54,000 receivable orders have been prepared and issued to the tenants on approximately 3,500 of these estates to enable them to pay the first instalment of their compounded arrears. Receivable orders in the remaining cases are being prepared and issued as rapidly as possible. Up to date the sum of £135,000 has been lodged by the tenants to whom receivable orders have been issued, and arrangements are being made to pay it out to the parties entitled.

As little more than a month has elapsed since the first of the receivable orders for the payment of arrears was issued, the collection to date must be regarded as highly satisfactory, and the Land Commission anticipate that the collection of compounded arrears generally will be equally satisfactory.

The instalments for the payment in lieu of rent are also being calculated and the receivable orders prepared, and already a number of them have been issued to the tenants.

In addition, landlords have been furnished with the prescribed forms to enable them to furnish the particulars required for the ascertainment of the lands to be vested in the Land Commission, and already these particulars have been furnished in several estates and they will be surveyed as soon as possible.

QUESTION ON ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SEAN MILROY: I wish to give notice that on the adjournment I will raise the question of the Boundary Commission to decide the frontiers between the Free State and the North-East of Ulster, with a view to securing a statement from the President on the matter before the adjournment of the Dáil.

APPOINTMENT OF EXTERN MINISTERS.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. Kevin O'Higgins): I have to announce that the Ministers nominated by the Dáil under Article 55 of the Constitution have duly received their appointments—Mr. P. Hogan, as Minister for Agriculture; Mr. Seamus Burke, as Minister for Local Government; Mr. Fionan Lynch, as Minister for Fisheries; and Mr. J. J. Walsh, as Postmaster-General.

STATEMENT BY MINISTER FOR FINANCE.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Before we start in upon the Orders of the Day, may we learn if it is the intention during the proceedings of the day for the Minister for Finance to make the Financial Statement which it was expected he might make yesterday, and which we learn was postponed until today?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It is the intention of the Minister for Finance, I understand, to make a statement a little after one o'clock.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Will that statement be made during the debate on the Governor-General's Address, and will there be an opportunity for discussion afterwards?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The statement will be made by intervention by the Minister for Finance in the debate on the motion for a resolution of thanks in connection with the Governor-General's Address. An opportunity for debate on the statement will be afforded. It is my intention not to preclude Deputies who have spoken on the motion before the Minister for Finance has spoken.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S ADDRESS (MOTION FOR RESOLUTION OF THANKS).

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Major Bryan Cooper moved the adjournment of the debate. Therefore, he has the right to resume the debate.

Major BRYAN COOPER: When I moved the adjournment of the debate, after Deputy Johnson's speech, more than three weeks ago, I did not anticipate that I would have time to go to Copenhagen and come back in order to verify Deputy Johnson's facts, and consequently I did not arrange to do so. I am content to accept Deputy Johnson's facts. In doing so, I might point out that Denmark is a very exceptional country. During the war Denmark and Holland were the back doors of Germany. They were in that respect very exceptional countries. The Germans had to get their stuff in there, and they had to pay any price the Danish people liked to demand from them. The result was that if the Danish quay labourers chose to ask for any increase of wages, the shippers were making such profits, that all they did or had to do was to put the price on to Germany. I am rather surprised to find that that condition has continued to the present day. I have no doubt that in both Denmark and Holland labour is very highly paid. They were neutral during the European war, and naturally they took advantage of that position.

Now, I propose to confine myself, in discussing the Governor-General's speech, entirely to one paragraph, and it is the same paragraph that Deputy Johnson dealt with—that was the paragraph dealing with unemployment and high prices. Those of us, at any rate, who went through the last election on an independent platform, and who were not under the necessity, as the Minister for Home Affairs was, of making the same speech over and over again, in defence of the Government's policy, found that the two things that really interested the electors were the questions of unemployment and the high prices of living.

This latter was sometimes more epigrammatically expressed in the statement: "Will you lower the price of the pint?" My general reply was that it was easier to lower the pint than the price. That is undoubtedly the paramount issue in the minds of the electors to-day. Deputy Johnson spoke on that matter, and I found myself, as I always do, in complete agreement with Deputy Johnson as long as he stuck to general principles; but when he proceeded to reinforce these general principles by arguments and points of detail, I disagreed with him very violently indeed. If Deputy Johnson would only confine himself to general principles, and not bring forward any facts in support of them, I think we would agree. Now, to come to the question of the limitation of profits, I am one of the comparatively few Deputies who belong to a class who have had their profits limited for forty years, ever since the Land Act of 1881. I have no objection in principle to the limitation of profits. I am delighted to see that other people will get the same medicine as we have got.

In regard to the particular point of the limitation of profits, it is very easy to limit the profits of anything that cannot get out of the country. It is easy, for instance, to limit the profits of land, because it is there and cannot be removed. It is easy to limit the profits of a shopkeeper who does business in his own neighbourhood; but when you come to limit the profits of a business that has an export trade, it becomes exceedingly difficult. That is why I quarrel with Deputy Johnson's instances. He gave as one instance the firm of Messrs. Guinness. As I have already mentioned Messrs. Guinness—perhaps I ought to state that I have no direct interest in the firm, and my only interest is as an occasional consumer of their products—Messrs. Guinness do the bulk of their trade outside the thirty-two counties of Ireland. Two-thirds to three-fourths of their business is done across the Channel, and if you limit their profits to such an extent as seriously to interfere with their dividends and their business, they will then say that there are other countries in which profits are not limited, and chemical science has made such advances that they can probably do without the water of the Liffey and they may be tempted to remove their industry elsewhere. They may be tempted to sacrifice their trade in Ireland and remove their industry to a place where profits are not limited.

I do not see how the country is going to benefit by that. The workers of Dublin will not benefit by it. I do not think the barley-growers will benefit, and I am quite certain the Minister for Finance would be exceedingly unhappy. That point has to be taken into account. Limit profits by all means, but it must be done carefully and scientifically. If you limit profits in a fashion merely to obtain popular applause and assert a principle, you will drive some of the few remaining industries out of the country. There was one remark of Deputy Johnson with which I find myself in perfect agreement. He said: "The whole question seems to me to require some kind of an assent to a proposition that human labour must not be treated in the same way and by the same logic and argument as all ordinary marketable commodities." There I agree with the Deputy, but as far as I know nobody proposes to apply the same logic and the same rules of political economy to human labour as to manufactured products. It is a maxim of political economy to buy in the cheapest market, but if anybody was proposing to carry out that in Ireland we would have Zulus working on the quays and Chinamen on the trams.

Mr. JOHNSON: It is working that way.

Major COOPER: It is not suggested that the employer imports cheap labour, but there is one form of logic to which human labour must yield, and that is the logic of facts.

And if it is a fact that work can be done more cheaply outside Ireland and people can live more cheaply outside Ireland, then that work will be sent out of Ireland and people will go and live outside Ireland, and they are doing so. That is one of the most serious factors of the present case, and it is due to the high cost of living, and it is also partly due to the disturbed state of the country. These things are driving people out of Ireland, and a great number of people are going out of Ireland, partly because it is a very expensive country to live in. Things cost more in the City of Dublin and other Irish cities than they do in Manchester, Liverpool or Belfast. Postage is more expensive, for one thing, and people who are not tied to this country, by the conditions of their employment, or their property, will undoubtedly tend to go away where they can live more cheaply. The exodus nowadays is not confined to one class of the community, namely, the boys and girls, who throng the American Consul's office, in the desire to have their passports viséd. Professional men, doctors, barristers, auditors, are going away to England, and the only people who are remaining are solicitors and architects, because of the great amount of work that remains to be done in their particular line—reconstruction work—owing to recent destruction. Most of the class of people who tend to go away are those who have small incomes either from securities or from pensions.

In other days Government servants, bank managers, Local Government officials, and people of that class, when they got their pensions, came up to live in the County Dublin, but now they go away to Wales or France, to escape the heavy taxation and because a shilling goes further in these places than it does in Dublin. But that is not the only loss of expenditure in this country. We are paying compensation for damage to person and property, and except where there is a reconstruction clause attached, a great deal of this compensation money is being spent outside the country, and that has a most serious effect upon every class of the community. It has an injurious effect not only upon trade, but the fact that that money is going out of the country is a great factor in producing unemployment. I had hoped that the gracious speech we heard from the Governor-General might have recognised that very serious factor in our national life. You have only to walk outside this Dáil and pass into Grafton Street and O'Connell Street and you are struck with the number of empty shops in these great thoroughfares, even though quarter of O'Connell Street has been destroyed. Ten or fifteen years ago you could not possibly get an empty shop in Horse Show week in O'Connell Street or Grafton Street, yet when I was looking for Committee rooms at the last election I had a choice of four business premises to select from.

It is not only employment that is disappearing, but the taxation which would arise from monies spent on luxuries and other things is going also. People will not pay the Income Tax in this country when they are only called upon to pay less tax across the water. The people are going to France in very large numbers. I am told that there is a large Irish colony at Dinard in Brittany, and also there is a large Irish population in the Channel Islands. I am not saying these things for the purpose of blaming the Government, but I hope they will bear this factor in mind. In making Ireland a country attractive for people to live in there is one factor that would contribute very greatly to that end, and that is the factor of taxation. One of the things that is driving the people out of the country is the fact that we have the heaviest taxation anywhere in Europe—I am not sure about Germany, but there the currency fluctuates so much that you pay your Income Tax as late as you can in the year, and sometimes you find that you have made a profit. But certainly of any place in this part of the world we have the heaviest Income Tax. As the Minister for Home Affairs asked in regard to the Northern Government joining with the Free State, why should the six counties want to pay sixpence more by ranging themselves with us? Of course, it will be better for the six counties in the long run to come in, as I hope they will, but they very properly ask at the present moment why they should unite with us in order to pay 6d. in the £ more in Income Tax. There is not one word in the Governor-General's speech about the heavy taxation. The country is bearing the heaviest taxation it can, and if the country is really to prosper that taxation must be reduced. I do not blame the Government for making promises they may not be able to fulfil, but I hope they will take this matter into their deepest and most earnest consideration. It is the bedrock of everything. It is at the bottom of the high cost of living. If the merchant in Cork, Limerick or Dublin has to pay sixpence in the £ Income Tax more than his competitors across the water, he is forced to extract that sixpence in the £, until we have a tariff system, out of the consumer, because he is not a philanthropist. Now, I have spoken at greater length than I intended, but I do want to put one or two points before the Government for their consideration.

I agree with Deputy McGarry who said in the Dáil some time ago that there was no use in laying down general propositions on political economy without suggesting some remedy. The remedy of course is bound to be a highly unpopular one in Government Departments. There are two suggestions I want to make, and in doing so I am sorry that the Minister for Finance is not here, but I hope that what I have to say will be conveyed to him. There are two ways, I think, in which he might divert some of the burden that falls on his shoulders. I know of course that he has immense responsibilities to bear, and that he has the most unenviable and unpopular post in the Government. Apparently he is not let go on any of the Government joy-rides, he was not taken to the Imperial Conference, nor did he go to Geneva. I may say that I have the greatest sympathy with the Minister for Finance, but what I am now going to suggest is in the hope of trying to lighten the immense burden he has to carry.

My first suggestion is that he should be assisted by a small Committee on the lines of the Geddes or the Incheape Committee, which should be set up to go into the estimates of every Department of the Government, and which should be asked to indicate where reductions can be made. I know that we have an Estimates Committee under our Standing Orders, but I do not suggest that the small Committee I propose should be composed of Deputies of this Dáil, or that even it should be a joint Committee representative of the Dáil and the Seanad. We are all very human, and we all have our constituents, and we might be slow to make a recommendation, even though we thought it right, which, perhaps, conflicted with the interests of our constituents. What I suggest is, that this small Committee should be composed of the three best men that the Minister for Finance can get, whether they be members of the Dáil or not. In my opinion there should be on the Committee a business man and a pensioned Government servant.

My reason for suggesting the appointment of a pensioned Government servant on the Committee is that we all know the tricks and the camouflage that could be put before an enquiry of this kind if you had not on it some person like a pensioned Government servant who had inside knowledge of Government offices. You might also have one, if not two, business men on the Committee, with this pensioned Government official, which would go slowly and methodically through the estimates of every Government Department. Take one item of expenditure, the cost of travelling expenses. That is an item on which I believe there could be an enormous sum saved. The cost of travelling expenses in connection with the Board of Works, runs, I believe, to a colossal sum, compared with the return given for such expenditure. The Committee, I suggest, should go through the estimates for each Government Department in the same spirit as a business man trying to discover, from an examination of his accounts, why his business was not paying.

I do not suggest that the Minister for Finance should be asked to share all the responsibility for the Government's enormous expenditure, and for that reason I would suggest that he should ration each Government Department and discover how much money he can allow to each. He should be put in a position to tell the Minister for Home Affairs, the Minister for Agriculture, the Minister for Defence, the Minister for Industry and Commerce, and so on, that he was allowing each of them so much and that they would have to do with that particular sum. Such a system might mean that supplementary estimates would have to be introduced, but I believe if such a system were adopted you would be setting each department to carry out reforms inside itself, you would prune off the unessential and leave the essential, and most certainly, I think, the pruning knife is overdue.

SEOIRSE DE BHULBH: Do labhair Teachta Tomás Mac Eoin cupla lá ó shoin agus thug sé a lán figúiri duinn. As Deputy Bryan Cooper remarked, we listened the other evening to an avalanche of statistics from Deputy Johnson. They were most interesting, of course, to all of us, but the impression left on my mind was that there was nothing constructive whatever in the speech. There was no suggestion, as far as I could discover in the speech, which would help in any way to relieve what is present in all our minds, namely, the problem of unemployment. The Governor-General in his speech recognised the importance of the matter, and the pressing need of meeting this problem. The longest paragraph in his Address was devoted to this subject. The Government put forward, in the speech delivered by the Governor-General, two special remedies. These were the construction of a larger number of houses in the country and the improvement of our roads. Both proposals are excellent in their way, especially the building of an increased number of houses. Anyone who goes through Ireland, especially the towns, and indeed through many of the country districts, must be impressed by this fact that there is an urgent need to have the housing conditions in Ireland vastly improved. It must be admitted, of course, that a great deal has been done in that direction during the last forty years, beginning with the Act passed by the Imperial Parliament about the year 1883; but still a vast amount remains to be done. When a start was made with the building of houses in Ireland a great many years ago they were let at a very low rent of about a shilling a week. That rent, of course, would not pay for the building or the cost involved in the erection of a scheme of houses. To do so it would be necessary to charge a rent of about 2s. 8d. per week, but the houses were let at 1s. a week, and the people in the districts in which these houses were erected were perfectly content to make up the balance in the rates, because they saw what an advantage it was to have houses provided for the labourers. That has been the record for practically every scheme of houses erected in Ireland. Public bodies saw that houses were urgently necessary, and they were content to let them at a rent which meant a big tax on the local rates. Up to a certain point the country was quite prepared to pay its share, and rather more than its share, in the erection of houses, but it can no longer do so because of the high cost of materials and the other almost prohibitive costs involved in the carrying out of building schemes. Nevertheless, houses must be provided, and the Government recognise that this is a pressing necessity. The Government also recognise that the improvement of the roads of the country is an urgent necessity. None of these things, of course, will bring grist to the Government mill, but I would suggest that there are other ways of meeting this unemployment problem which, I believe, would bring in money to the Government exchequer. It is well known that there is a vast amount of potential wealth in the undeveloped water-power of Ireland and also in the development of our fisheries. I do not propose to touch on this latter aspect of our national resources, but I desire to say a few words on the development of electrical power, which has not been developed at all in Ireland so far.

There is a vast field of possible enterprise in that direction. I daresay a great many people have been aware that for a long time there has been a great deal written about what is called harnessing the river Liffey. Probably Deputies know something about that matter. I think it was opened first of all by an address given by Sir John Griffith in this very room on that subject a good many years ago. Quickly following upon that address a great many people formed themselves into companies and went down to the place and had interviews with the different riparian owners, of which I am one. They tried to bring those schemes forward. Of course they would not bring them forward if there was not some money in the enterprise. That stands to reason. When I was approached on the matter, I said that if it was to the advantage of the district I should be very glad to help in any way I could.

None of these schemes that have been brought forward seem to me likely to be of the least advantage to the district. They will be of great advantage to, shall I call them, the company-mongers, but to nobody else. The whole desire was to get in front of a scheme which would really be of advantage to the people, and which would cost much more than these schemes which these small companies bring forward on their own account.

Some of these schemes are of the most weird nature. There was one proposal to carry the river Liffey in a tunnel, diverting it from the falls of Poulaphouca, which is one of the beauty spots of the country, and leaving the river bed perfectly dry for a mile. This tunnel was to be carried through my place, partly through the ground and partly in the air. Naturally, I had rather an objection to this. Of course I am not the only person concerned. There are a good many others. I happen to own one side of the river, and on the other side there are a great many different owners. As a matter of fact all the schemes which were brought forward would absolutely ruin the beauty of Poulaphouca, one of the beauty spots of the country that many people visit and which might be developed in that respect much more than it is. All those schemes proposed to draw off the water from the river and leave it dry for about a mile, with a dry arch at Poulaphouca, which would naturally ruin the beauty of the place.

There is one scheme that has been put forward by Sir John Griffith which to my mind is a scheme worthy of attention on behalf of the Government. That scheme proposed to form a lake above Poulaphouca, which would give an even flow of water all the year round for the purpose of making electricity. The idea of these companies is to supply Dublin and the townships and the electric railways, and that beautiful railway called the Dublin and Blessington Steam Tramway, with electricity, which undoubtedly they could do at a very low rate. My position is this. It is rather a peculiar one. I am rather like the lady who was so bothered by her admirers that she was recommended by her medical adviser to go on board ship to get rid of them.

When she got on board ship she found that the captain and the crew gave her so much annoyance that she had to jump overboard to get rid of them. I do not propose to do that, but I thought when I came to Leinster House that at least I should be rid of those people. Only the other day, however, I was called out to meet another company that had been formed to develop electrical power at Poulaphouca.

I want to let the Government see that there is money in this thing, that it would give a vast amount of employment if a proper scheme was taken up and would bring in a good deal of money to the Exchequer, else these people would not be bothering about it. The people of the district are most anxious that the Government should consider this scheme—I do not say take it up. It is a scheme worthy of their consideration, because there is money in it. Another consideration is that the people of the district think that the preservation of the beauties of Poulaphouca would be taken into consideration by the Government more than by any company which would be simply out to exploit the undertaking for its own benefit.

Mr. WILSON: I am very sorry indeed that I am not a riparian proprietor of land, and that I could not also bring forward a scheme of development for my area. I rise to speak on behalf of an industry which occupies the attention of more than 2,000,000 of people in the Free State. I wish to point out to the Government that while the legislation foreshadowed in the Governor-General's speech in connection with agriculture is good in its way, it falls very far short of the requirements of the case and is not at all in keeping with the depression which exists in that industry, on which the prosperity of this State is dependent. I will be criticised if I do not attempt to put forward some constructive proposals by which this industry might be saved. The Agricultural Commission which sat recently has made certain recommendations, and the legislation which is foreshadowed implements those recommendations as far as they go. There are, however, other things which are entirely neglected, which in my opinion are responsible for the depression in the agricultural industry, and which, if not speedily remedied, will sound the death-knell of that industry.

In the first place I would refer to paragraph 11, which says that the reorganisation of our railways has for a considerable time exercised the minds of the Ministers. In this country agricultural products are still being charged freights 400 per cent. above pre-war rates. Prices are on a par with pre-war, so that we are debarred from the markets beside us where most of our products are sold. The products of this country are in the proportion of three to one; that is, two parts must be exported, and the other part kept for internal consumption. While two-thirds of our products must be exported we are asked to pay a railway tariff 400 per cent. above the pre-war rate. The whole idea of railway reorganisation, in the mind of the Ministry, is to put it on a paying basis. Sufficient attention is not given to the rating levied by the railways. There is no body in authority in this country who can say to the railways, "You are charging too much for the carriage of this or that product." Up to 1920 there was such a Board in England, and when a revision of rates was necessary the railways had to go before that Board. As the Board has been abolished in this country the railways are in a position to charge what they like. The result is that we are, three or four years after the European war, paying enormous freights which place us at a great disadvantage with competitors. If you take up a railway classification book you will find that the rates are based on an English classification, and that they are in favour of a manufacturing country, to the detriment of the products of this country. Textiles, hardware and boots are charged the same rate as eggs. There is no comparison whatever between the value of, say, 5 cwt. of drapery and 5 cwt. of eggs. Still we are compelled to pay a rate for eggs equivalent to the rate paid for high priced articles. Eggs in boxes are charged what is known as third-class rates. Hardware, cutlery and boots are also charged third-class rates. A box of boots containing 100 pairs will occupy the same space as 3 or 4 cwt. of eggs, and while the eggs will be worth about £9 the boots will perhaps be worth £100. The railways are collecting one per cent. from the manufacturers and 20 per cent. from the agriculturists. The exporters are paying these charges, although ostensibly it may be thought that they are paid by people on the other side. Prices are fixed in England, and when people there buy cattle or eggs they know what they will get for the goods and what the railway freights will be. They deduct from the price they pay for products the enormous charges that have to be met. That means we have to pay in freights 20 per cent. of the value of the goods purchased from us. That is one cause of the depression in agriculture, and unless it is removed we have no chance of making progress in the industry.

Heretofore it was the custom to book cattle through from any part of Ireland to any part of England. You cannot do that now. Why? The English rates have been reduced to 50 per cent. over pre-war, but the Irish rates are 150 per cent. higher than they were before the war. The Irish railways will not reduce their rates in accordance with the English rates, and accordingly there is only booking to Dublin, and re-booking to England at tremendous expense and annoyance. It is only in parts of Ireland, where a railway company have reduced rates, that through booking is now available. Deputy McKenna will be able to enlighten the Dáil in that respect and explain what it means to agriculture. My remedy for the present state of affairs is to set up a rating authority and to let it differentiate in favour of agricultural products, and see that they are carried at the lowest possible rates. Most of the traffic that is carried in Ireland is from the ports to inland centres, so that there is a continual stream of empty waggons, going from the centre of the country to the ports, to bring back imports. The traffic that comes from the interior of the country could be carried for nothing, as the railway waggons have in any case to go back empty when there is no traffic. We should have the cheapest possible rates on agricultural products. Our competitors in the Dominions get their products carried at a halfpenny per ton per mile. Why are Irish agriculturalists not placed in the same position? These things can only be remedied by setting up a rating authority under the Minister for Industry and Commerce, to which complaints could be sent, so that farmers will be able to put produce on the market at the lowest possible price. The Minister for Industry and Commerce is amused.

If he were in the same position as a man on the land who has to pay annuities, local rates, and income tax, he would not be laughing so heartily. The second thing that operates adversely to agriculture is the incidence of local taxation. At the moment, by reason of the various Land Acts, we are asked to pay an annual charge of £4,000,000 in annuities. £3,133,000 was paid last year, and the Land Bill is operating to extinguish rents in the nature of £1,000,000 so that the overhead expenditure on land which we have to pay is £4,000,000. We cannot reduce that, but in addition we have the local rating, which we can reduce if we work in the proper way. The last local councils were elected on a political basis. They were elected not for the efficiency of the members, not for their capability for conducting business, but rather to uphold certain political doctrines which at the time were necessary to fight other organisations. We have a series of Councils whose whole idea seems to be not to give good service for money but to give pensions here, jobs there, and grant direct labour here and there. Everything is done in a wholesale manner. Money is filched away, and we on the land are suffering and we must see that the Government, who went to the country on the plea of progress and who filched away farmers from their allegiance to the right people, shall, in return, see that the next elections will not be based on a political basis but on questions of economy, efficiency and good dealing. The whole country is being turned into a country of pensions. Home help is the name in one case, and old age pensions is the name in the other, but whether it is home help, old age pensions, the Army, or the Civic Guard, we are being saddled with the expenditure, and I ask the Government to see in the next election that suitable franchise proposals will be put forward so that the people who pay the piper will be enabled to call the tune.

Now, with regard to the next obstacle in the way of progress, I would say that it is the attitude of labour. We have been forced for the last three or four months to sit idly by and watch a conflict with which we were not concerned, but which has inflicted untold damage on our industry. We have had to stand by with a falling market and have had no means of sending our goods there in time. This recurs yearly. Last year the same thing happened in Tipperary where a dispute took place between the creamery owners and labour. Our milk was refused, and if we sent it to the creamery we were not paid for it. These things are happening every day in the week, and until some definite arrangement is made by which labour will see that it is in their own interests not to hold up our products but to take a common sense attitude and meet the claims of the producers we will not be able to make the industry self-supporting. A good deal has been said about unemployment, which is a subject that has been over-dealt with. There are 40,000 unemployed persons registered in this country. All the industrial workers in the Saorstát do not amount to 250,000. The cost to the State in bonuses to these people is half a million pounds. If there is unemployment in the country the farm labourer is not insurable, and we have to support him in home help. Why do not the industrial centres bear this burden by raising the rates on the employers, on the one hand, and the workers on the other hand? Let the 200,000 people keep the forty thousand. Those who are idle should be kept by those who are employed, but do not saddle the community with half a million pounds to bolster up people who number only 250,000. Two million people are on the land, and if there is any unemployment there let the industries in the city support them. As regards general taxation, I had hoped that the Minister's statement would have been before us. It is absolutely essential that the pruning knife should be rigorously employed to cut down expenditure—I do not say this year—to a state in which income will balance expenditure. We must borrow this year, and the farmers have been asked, and I have asked them myself, to contribute their quota to this new loan. Will anybody support a country in which running expenditure exceeds revenue? If you want money and you go to a bank, what will the banker say? He will say: “What is your income and what is your expenditure?” and if he finds that your revenue is not in accordance with your expenditure he will not touch you. The same applies to a country. We must balance our accounts. How is it to be done?

The pruning knife is one way; taking off unemployment relief is another way, and the setting up of the Commission, advocated by Deputy Cooper, so that the internal administration of the Head Office here should be overhauled and so that nobody will be employed for whom there is not suitable work, is another way. If we get our revenue and expenditure to balance then we can talk of joining the people in the North, and then it will be to the benefit of the people in the North to join us. By thus attending to our expenditure we can make this country a wealthy one.

Mr. McBRIDE: The address of the Governor-General was notable to me by the omission of one great 1 o'clock. problem which will add to the responsibilities and troubles of the Government of this State in the coming year. I am no lover of the League of Nations. I think it was a mistake to join it, and this Dáil will realise before many years that it was a mistake too. But I must confess that I am both instructed and amused by the grandiloquent phraseology and cultured form of sunburstry which announces Ireland's entrance into the League. We are told nothing of the responsibilities or expenses which membership of the League will entail. The fact remains that this nation here was always a nation. The Union with Great Britain did not take away the attributes of a nation, and we were ushered into the League of Nations under the patronage of the chief tyrants, and the clamours of the minor ones. The Imperial Conference stands on quite a different footing. This State is a member of the Commonwealth and as such unfettered commercial and social intercourse should be cultivated and encouraged between all the States in the Commonwealth, paying, of course, due attention to one's own special interests.

At the outset I said that the Governor-General's address to me was notable by the omission of one great problem. I fear that His Excellency and the wise men who sit in his council chamber were so lost in contemplation of the delights of Geneva that they failed to see the problem looming big and gaunt which will call imperatively for their attention during the next few months. The harvest has failed absolutely, and in the west there is not half the usual yield of the two great essentials of life, turf and potatoes. On account of the bad weather the turf could not be saved and the potatoes are all rotting. In normal times, with industry going full speed in Ireland and Great Britain, this would be a serious condition of things. To-day, with stagnation all round, it is a thousand times more so, and a comparatively small expenditure upon roads and upon houses affecting small farmers very indirectly will not go very far to relieve the distress. I hope Deputy O'Connell will not think I am forestalling him about the fisheries, but it is only now I saw his resolution about the fisheries. Of course there is no mention made of the sea fisheries in the Governor-General's address. We have heard a lot of rumours. In imagination I have listened to the rhythmic rumblings of the new steam yacht and to the music of General Mulcahy's sharpshooters ranging round the coast seeking the enemies of the fishers. Both are expensive luxuries, and I can well imagine the groans of the Minister for Finance at the cost. We are now told we are to have four warships on the list. I will say nothing about that for a time, but the building up of a strong and prosperous fishing community is as important to the economic development of this nation as the welfare of the farmers. I hope the Government will give serious attention to this question in the near future. It is announced that laws affecting merchant shipping are to be introduced. Those laws will have a very great influence for good or for bad on the merchant shipping trade of the Free State, and I hope sufficient time will be allowed to elapse between the time when the Bill is first introduced, and when it comes up for due consideration.

Mr. HOGAN (Clare): Like Deputy McBride, I cannot say that I was very favourably impressed by the Governor-General's Address. There are very many serious things that the Governor-General studiously ignored, and if his outline of the Government's policy is to be the guiding factor of the Government during the coming year or two, or whatever number of years the Government holds office, I think he should have told us in detail what the Government proposes to do. One thing left out in connection with our entrance into the League of Nations under the patronage of our oppressor of yesterday, is that not one word was said as to the cultivation of the Irish language in a proper manner so that we might assert our distinctive nationality before the world. It is all very well to say that we are a distinct nation, but if some effort is not made to secure that that nationality is felt before the nations of the world, we are but ploughing the sands. There is another matter about which I have not been able to find any reference in the Address, and that is the fact that to-day thousands of men are locked up by the present Government and no indication is given as to whether or not they are to be locked up indefinitely. It is not, I suppose, a pleasant matter to introduce, but it seems to strike at the fundamental principles of freedom in every country, the power of any Government to take a body of men and lock them up indefinitely without making any further observations on the matter. Time and again this question has been raised, and I think it is nearly time that we knew. I am speaking apart altogether from the protest made by these men on hunger strike. I am demanding a statement as to whether the fundamental principles of liberty are not being stretched in order that these men may be kept incarcerated. That is one matter to which the Governor-General has not referred, and also the matter of our national distinctiveness regarding our language, and I desire to draw the Government's attention to these matters.

Mr. SHAW: I intend to deal with a few points in connection with the speeches made by Deputy Cooper and Deputy Wilson. We have heard from them the great grievances from which Ireland is suffering, the excessive taxation, the exodus of the people who had money to spend in the country, the fact that shops and other places are vacant, and the only thing that I did not hear them speak about was the root cause of this. It is perfectly evident that these things have been caused by the political position in which a minority refuses to accept the will of the majority, that the actions of the Republicans have caused chaos all over the country, and that to-day money was never so scarce. There have been 109 men returned to enter the Dáil to endeavour in every possible way to uplift the country, and the cause of the present unemployment, of the scarcity of money, and other troubles, is due to the policy adopted by the party of forty-four—I cannot call them T.D.'s, I call them D.T.'s—because the policy they stand for is unsound. If it goes on as at present the particular Party that would come most to grief will be the Labour Party, because a Loan is about to be floated and if the money is not forthcoming and if the Government are not able to get funds to carry on, it is perfectly apparent that in the near future there will be starvation. If they had addressed their remarks to the Party which has caused the excessive taxation and the exodus I think they would be well advised. I am sorry that Deputy Wilson touched the matter of Home Help, because I happen to be in touch with the distribution of Home Help in the county I come from, and I know that but for the small amounts distributed to these people they would either be in the County Home or in their graves. This is one of the items which I think it would not be possible to reduce. I only make these remarks because it is perfectly clear—to me anyhow—that the cause of our troubles is the fact that the minority have paralysed the trade and commerce of the country. With regard to those who have left the country, if you had peace, or any sign of peace, you would have them all back again, because they cannot live out of it. Although we have not peace a great many of them are already coming back, and I believe that if this party who call themselves the Opposition would preach to the people who are causing the trouble, instead of stating that the Dáil is the cause, it would have a much better effect.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I note the considerable amount of space that the Governor-General has given to the agricultural industry in his Speech. I am glad to see that the Ministry realises the importance of the agricultural industry in the fabric of this country. I note the Governor-General's references to the Land Act, and I would say that I, as one of those who had a good deal to do with the agitation which led up to the introduction and passing of the Land Act, felt a good deal of pleasure in its passing, and to a certain extent approve of a good many of its provisions. We believe that the Government made a brave and a bold attempt to an Act which would finally settle a question which has been bothering this country for generations. But there is one portion of the Act which we never gave our approval to and which we asked our Deputies to use all their persuasive powers to get amended, and these are the Sections which deal with the matter of the arrears of rent. We know that in all the Acts passed in the British House of Commons it was a common thing to wipe out arrears, or the greater portion of them, and if they were not actually wiped out by the wording of the Act, in the actual carrying out of the transaction, the passing of the land from the landlord to the tenant, they usually were by agreement, or were added to the purchase money.

What we find in this Act is that the greater portion of the three years' arrears is payable by the tenants, and I would like to call the attention of the Government to the fact that these arrears accrued during years of turmoil and disturbance, during years of civil strife and strife with a foreign enemy, and this strife was followed by industrial disturbances. It is a fact that farmers, both purchased and unpurchased, can honestly say that they have not made a profit during the past two years. I do not know if there is any farmer in this country who can say his balance sheet will show a balance on the right side during the last two years. Since the passing of the Act the position of the tenant has been worsened. This industrial strife has held up the whole agricultural industry, and has prevented the export of our products. It has forced the farmer to sell at 50s. per cwt. pigs valued at 80s. across the Channel. Our whole cattle trade was held up, but our butter trade was not held up, though the actual cost of shipping it was considerably increased owing to these disturbances. I know for a fact that there are unpurchased tenants all over the country who are finding it a matter of considerable difficulty to meet the first demand made on them by the Government. I have been approached many times in my capacity as a Deputy for the farmers with regard to this matter, and I honestly believe that the great number of people who have come to me have told me what is the absolute truth with regard to their position.

Some of them say they have found considerable difficulty in getting the actual amount necessary to meet the first demand by the Government, that is 75 per cent. of one year's rent. We know that at any time before the appointed day they may get a demand for 75 per cent. of two years' rent, and simultaneously they may get a demand for the ordinary 75 per cent. of the annuity they have to pay in lieu of rent. I ask the Government to take into serious consideration the position of the agricultural community on whom they are making this demand, and I would say to them there are three courses open to them. The first course is to resist the demand, and I am afraid if they do they will find themselves practically up against a stone wall. I do not think they will be able to collect the arrears they are attempting to collect, for the farmers will not be able to pay them, and they will have to evoke the law, and carry it to its utmost extremity. The Government may find themselves in the position of having to seize the cattle in the land, and forcing some of the farmers to sell their land to pay these annuities. I hope the Government will not follow that course. I would suggest that there are constructive courses open to them, and the first is to pass an amending Act which would have the effect of wiping out a certain portion of these arrears. If they do not think that is possible owing to the fact that they have just passed a Land Act, I would suggest some definite measures should be taken by which the tenants would be relieved of the fear that immediate demands would be made on them for the balance of arrears, and that some effort should be made by which the balance of arrears would be extended over a long period and make it easy for these tenants. I say that, not for the purpose of making a debating point, but to aid the Government and advise them on a matter which I think is of great consequence to the peace of the country. I know certain people are going through the country, and the advice they are giving is this: "Do not pay these arrears, pay no rent, and pay no taxes, and pay no shop-bills, and in the course of time you will not have to pay anything as we will have these things wiped out for you." We do not give that advice. I advised these unpurchased tenants not to withhold the first payment, and that we would do all in our power to influence the Government to make the balance of these payments easy for them. Another notable omission from the Governor-General's speech is the matter of agricultural credits. I am sorry that the Governor-General did not see his way to suggest to the Government that they should carry out the suggestion which was put forward by the Agricultural Commission with regard to the provision of agricultural credit for the farmers. We know that the loans from the Board of Works have been cut off, and there is no available means at present by which farmers can get loans on long-term credit for the purpose of doing such work as improving their houses and buildings and carrying out drainage, or any work of that kind which involves borrowing money for a considerable time. Banks are not willing to lend money for this purpose; they want to have their assets readily realisable, and they are accustomed to lending money for short-term dates of three or six months, and it does not suit a man who has to borrow money for the purpose of permanent improvement on his holding to be continually going to the bank and asking them to renew these bills. I suggest it is to the interests of the Government to introduce at an early date legislation to deal with this matter of agricultural credit, and I would suggest to them to follow the advice given to them by the Agricultural Commission which has studied the thing, and must know what they are talking about. It is also essential that the Government should in some shape or form encourage the establishment of co-operative banks for the purpose of making it easier for small farmers to obtain credit than it is at present.

As I stated before in connection with the unpurchased tenants' problem, there are many small farmers at present on the verge of bankruptcy, and if the present bad times continue they will have to appeal to somebody to provide them with funds. The Government should seriously consider the question of encouraging them, either by grants or guarantees, in the formation of Co-operative Bank Societies which will place within the reach of those small farmers an opportunity of obtaining credit on easy terms. Before I finish, there is one matter which, I think, is of urgent importance to the community I represent. I note that the Governor-General refers to the improvement of the change in the system of government. I suggest in connection with this that the Government should give consideration not only to the matter of improving the present system of Local Government administration in the country, but to the changing of the incidence of Local Government taxation. We, represent-

[Mr. Heffernan.] ing the farming community, feel that we have to pay an undue proportion of the taxation which has to be borne. Take the case of a farmer with twenty acres. During the past year or two he made no profit whatever out of his holding, and yet he had to pay a local rate equal to that paid by the owner of a shop in a town whose income would be about £1,000 a year. It is not uncommon for such a thing to happen. We of the farming community have to pay the rates for the maintenance of the main and trunk roads. What use does the average small farmer make of those roads? We know that by far the greatest damage is done by motor traffic. The largest amount of damage is caused by heavy lorries which tear up the road surface. The main and the trunk roads ought to be made a national charge, and the farmers of the country should not be forced to bear the expenses of maintaining them.

Mr. P. J. EGAN: I wish to make a few remarks in reference to Deputy Johnson's speech on the occasion of our last sitting. The reason I do so is that in my judgment the industrial situation, bad as other situations are in the country—situations in respect to farming and so on—at the present moment overshadows everything else. I think there are few things more important than the immediate prospect of industrial peace. For that reason I listened very carefully to Deputy Johnson's speech here on the last day. I was particularly anxious to know if he could give us any definite constructive proposals, and, candidly, I was disappointed. He gave us an exceedingly interesting academic resumé of the whole industrial and economic situation, but with the exception that towards the end of his speech he made a suggestion about the selection of a tribunal to ascertain certain facts, I am afraid I could not find any constructive proposal in his speech. I would like to say that with the general tone of Deputy Johnson's remarks I am in perfect agreement. I think there was really very little fault to be found with the general tone of his speech. He gave us a great many figures, figures which dealt with Denmark and other places, and as far as the figures which he brought from Denmark are concerned I am not in a position to contradict them, and I accept them. He did indulge in some figures relating to matters nearer home. He referred—I am sure it was an oversight—to some of Messrs. Guinness's figures. He stated that the capital was 2½ millions. That was obviously a mistake. The concern was originally bought for 5 millions, and floated for 6 millions. There have been various paper adjustments since then, but if the Deputy considers the real working capital in Guinness's he will find the amount of money invested in stocks and debts and so on runs into very many times 2½ millions.

However, I do not wish to make any particular point out of that. The Deputy referred also at some considerable length to the cost of living. Very often when people speak about the cost of living, I think they might more correctly use the expression "the standard of living." I go further and say it would be more correct to use the expression "standard of luxury." in this matter of Guinness's to which Deputy Johnson refers. He told us the profits for the last three years were approximately 14 million pounds. If we allow for the fact that a considerable proportion of those profits undoubtedly come from across the water and from foreign export trade, there still remains a very appreciable sum which was earned in Ireland. The first question I want to put to Deputy Johnson in that connection is this: where do those profits come from? They come out of the wage earners' pockets and out of the farmers' pockets, and out of the pockets of other classes of wage earners in Ireland, but more particularly out of the workers' pockets. With reference to the standard of living, or what I would call, to a certain extent, the standard of luxury, in which the country is indulging at the present moment, in my judgment the country cannot hope economically to sustain it. Take the city of Dublin as an example. I remember some years ago, when I came to Dublin from the country, there were two or three theatres here. There were a couple of small music halls, and that represented practically the total number of houses of entertainment in the city of Dublin. I do not think that it is an exaggeration to say that at the present moment, within a radius of four miles of where we sit, there are probably three-quarters of a million of money invested in picture houses alone. I want to ask Deputy Johnson seriously to consider where did that money come from.

Mr. JOHNSON: Invested money.

Mr. EGAN: Money invested in picture houses in the city of Dublin. In my judgment practically all that money came out of the pockets of the wage earners.

Mr. JOHNSON: Hear, hear.

Mr. EGAN: Precisely; they were supporting a standard of luxury and not a standard of living. That is the point I want to make. I think it ought to be perfectly clear that this country cannot sustain a standard of luxury of that nature. It is really altogether wrong to talk about the cost of living being too high when hundreds and thousands can be accumulated from the surplus earnings of the various wage earners to put up the capital necessary to supply all these forms of amusement which we have nowadays in the city of Dublin and throughout the country.

Mr. A. BYRNE: What about the entertainment tax?

Mr. EGAN: I will let you deal with that.

Mr. ALFRED BYRNE: You would want to deal with it too.

Mr. EGAN: What is happening in the case of Dublin is, to a great extent, happening down in the country as well. Although we are going through extraordinarily bad times, it is really wonderful the way that the taste for racing has developed in Ireland of late—or rather I will put it this way the taste for betting.

Mr. DAVIN: Coursing.

Mr. EGAN: In most country towns nowadays, certainly in a great number of them, you have a flourishing firm of bookmakers. As an employer of labour I cannot help observing this, that there has been an extraordinary increase in the number of workmen who go in for backing horses.

Mr. DAVIN: And dogs.

Mr. EGAN: I do not know how that is consistent with the cost of living being too high. Mind you, I would be the very last in the world to interfere with or to suggest that the workman should not have reasonable relaxation. But, I am honestly afraid that not only the workers but the wage-earners generally, are endeavouring to support a standard of living, or should I say of luxury, whichever way you wish to put it, which the country is quite unable to afford. Deputy Johnson laid stress on the difference between employers and employees. In dealing with the industrial situation generally, he took up what I consider rather a detached attitude. His idea appeared to be to recite all the industrial and economic grievances, and no one knows how to do that better, and to bundle up all these troubles and throw them at the heads of the Government and to say to the heads of the Government "settle them." In my opinion Deputy Johnson, and the gentlemen who sit on those benches with him, do themselves represent a class which more than any other class can be expected to give help in securing industrial peace. One of the difficulties at the present moment in the matter of securing industrial peace—and I do not wish to say this for the purpose of irritating Deputy Johnson, or the gentlemen who sit with him—is, that the Labour Party have not, at the moment, industrial peace in their own ranks. That is the statement which I make genuinely and with very great regret. There was a time when employers, as a class, looked upon the formation of workmen's unions with very grave suspicion. However, a great deal of water has rolled under the bridge since those days. For my part, as one who is associated with a great many industries, I view personally, even from the businessman's point of view, with very grave regret, those domestic differences within the ranks of the Labour Party, because one of the greatest difficulties which business people have to meet with at present is the fact that it is difficult, in a great many instances, to have a united Labour Party with whom they can negotiate and with whom they can make agreements, agreements that they can have confidence will be respected. Therefore, I think that if Deputy Johnson would use part of his great talents in trying to compose domestic differences in the Labour Party, that to my mind would be one step in the right direction towards securing industrial peace.

Deputy Cooper, in the course of his speech, referred to the formation of a Finance Committee to help the Government to secure economies and to advise them on their policy generally. He mentioned that, in his judgment, it would be a very good thing to have some businessmen on that Committee. I suppose I come under the category, to a great extent, of a businessman. It has been the custom in a great many quarters to regard the businessman as some kind of a superman. He is nothing of the kind. He is just gifted with the same dose of original sin that the Independents or the Cumann na nGaedheal members, or anybody else.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: Or the Farmers.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE took the Chair at this stage.

Mr. EGAN: Oh, yes, they are human, too. The great objection I have, as a businessman—I will be perfectly candid and lay all my cards on the table—to going on these Committees is that having regard to the businessman's training and also to the fact that most of his mental activities are generally associated with a certain amount of commercial benefit to himself, which is really one of the main objects in a great many cases, it would be very difficult for the ordinary businessman to preserve a judicial attitude. After all, they are human, just as well as anybody else, and it is inevitable that the average businessman always has a tendency to view things from his own particular angle. For that reason I do not really think that the suggestion of Deputy Cooper that businessmen should be put on these proposed Committees is a good one.

With regard to the general question of industrial peace, it is a matter on which I feel very strongly. I am not going to here enter into any statement of the employers' case, or any criticism of the labourers' case. I do not think it is to the advantage of the present situation that I should do one or the other, but I cannot help thinking that if there was a little more of the milk of human kindness on both sides, and if there were less of an atmosphere of mutual distrust and suspicion on both sides, we would make a good deal more headway in the matter of bringing about a more prosperous commercial condition in the country. I have been associated with a good many businesses. There are good employers and there are plenty bad ones. For my part, I have always found it very good business in dealing with labourers or with labour organisations to be a little bit human. I do not think it is good business for either side to get their backs to the wall, so to speak. I think there should be always a spirit of compromise and mutual trust and goodwill on both sides. Speaking as an employer, I say definitely that I have always found it good business to do that.

Mr. SHAW: I must apologise for getting up a second time, but I cannot allow some of the——

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: You cannot speak a second time.

Mr. MILROY: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the observations made to-day. I had not an opportunity of listening to the speech of Deputy Johnson which has given rise to so much comment. But the impression I have formed from listening to those speeches is that in the main those who have spoken are viewing the situation on a one-eyed outlook. They only see part of the Constitution. At least one of the very serious aspects in the life of the country and its potentialities has been entirely ignored. But before I come to deal with this, I should like to mark my very emphatic dissent from the allusion made by Deputy McBride to the entry of Ireland into the League of Nations. I think that was a momentous step, and one which marks the manner in which the world was made cognisant of the emergence of Ireland from behind and below the barrier of British aggression into a life of freedom and into the family of free nations. Those other nations may have members of their communities that have the worst of human failings, but I think there are just as great potentialities for good within these States as we pride ourselves on having in Ireland, and I think it will be something to the world's advantage if Ireland's association helps to evoke and make stronger those potentialities for better things. I do not know whether Deputy Egan suggests that we should abolish picture-houses and theatres, and that we should abolish racing and Gaelic athletic meetings.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. Kevin O'Higgins): And sweepstakes.

Mr. MILROY: And, as the Minister for Home Affairs, says, sweepstakes. It is evident that the apprehension of once more being confronted with the Sweepstakes Bill is weighing heavily upon the mind of the Minister. I can assure him he has the greatest ground for his apprehension, for soon, I hope, we will not only confront him, but overwhelm him, in his opposition. I do not know whether the abolition of these places of amusement would be the solution of unemployment or would bring industrial peace to the country. The real solution, or what appears to me to be the real solution of the lack of industry, has not been touched on so far as I heard, in this debate. I do not really think we can come to grips with that until the findings of the Fiscal Commission have been published. Speaker after speaker has emphasised the great, pressing need of this country, and the only way to the financial solvency of the country it would seem is the application of the pruning knife to Departments. One would imagine that there is not, and cannot be, any element of growth of revenue within this country, and that Ireland's financial position must be almost limited to its present source of taxation; that there can be no further increase in those sources, or in the capacity of existing sources to bear increased taxation. If such an assumption were accurate, then it would be conclusive that the future of Ireland was to be no better than that of an economic derelict, and that all our associations with the other nations of the world, at Geneva or elsewhere, would be simply a mockery, because Ireland would be like a whitened sepulchre that concealed a mass of uneconomic rottenness within the country.

There are other sources of taxation, and there are other sources of revenue, besides that of cutting down the stipends of State officials, or cutting down the general expenditure of departments. Other countries had recourse to them, and I think we seem likely soon to appear to the world, if we persist in the existing fiscal system which has come to us as a heritage from our association with Great Britain, in the position of Casabianca who stood alone upon the burning deck. I doubt if there is any country in the world to-day that stands for the Free Trade system under which we exist at the present time. Even England built up her industry and greatness under a system quite different. It was only when she had the markets of the world at her command and was going ahead of every possible competitor that she opened her own markets to free imports. Even amongst those countries which have risen from the position of colonies to that of great self-governing dominions I do not think any of them adopted the principle of Free Trade, but, on the contrary, they reinforced their Exchequer by large taxation put upon foreign manufacturers who sought access to their markets. The Irish market is a valuable market, one of the most valuable that the English manufacturer has access to. Access to that market is a great thing to him, and if this country is in financial distress I say it is worth while considering whether or not we should not make these foreign manufacturers pay for having access to our markets.

The general tone of the discussion, in regard to the relief of unemployment, seems to have been that the State should act in the capacity of providing for that unemployment. It is essential in some direction that that should take place, but I do not think it is good, sound economics. It certainly is not the way industrial enterprise has been built up in other countries. The great vital asset, without which no country can expect to get upon its feet either commercially or industrially, is the initiative of men prepared to start industrial concerns, and the essential thing, to make that enterprise successful, is that they should get a fair chance, and should not be harassed, as if they were so many enemies of the State. There seems to be abroad, in this country, an impression, shared to some extent on the one side by those who sometimes call themselves the proletariat, and shared, to some extent, I fear, by our immature economists within the Government, that the manufacturers are so many parasites who want to prey upon the community.

To my mind, that is a profoundly erroneous idea, and one which, if persisted in, will simply mean a continuation of the industrial distress through which we have passed. A captain of industry in this country is a much more important factor in the nation's future than a dominating politician, and we have got to recognise that the whole economic structure of the country rests, in reality, upon the brains and the enterprise of these men, and on the security that they get to carry out their different operations.

A DEPUTY: The farmers.

Mr. MILROY: In saying that, I am not making any reflection upon the farmers, but I do want the farmers to realise that there are other elements in the country besides the farmer, and that the more prosperous these other industrial enterprises are, the better for the farmer, and vice versa. I do not want to anticipate the discussion upon the findings of the Fiscal Committee which, I assume, will take place when they are published. I am sorry that they have not already been published, so that we might have considered them in conjunction with the remarks of the Governor-General. I believe those who are interested in the work of that Committee are looking forward for some message of economic hope for the country, looking forward for an economic vision which will consider Ireland not as an abstraction, nor the Irish people as so many economic mummies that are simply there to be studied, but that will consider Ireland as a living reality. I trust the Committee's recommendations will be such as to be helpful to bring to this country a policy that will give renewed life to industrial enterprise. If it does that, it will have set Ireland on the right road, not only to industrial rest, but to progressive civilisation, but if it fails to do that, then a great vital issue will have arisen. I cannot anticipate what the decisions of this Committee will be, but whatever its decisions be, they will at least mark a definite stage in the life of Ireland's economic interests. They will be, to my mind, a highly important mark in these matters, and if they do not give us a hope, or if they do not fulfil the hope that a new system, and one more in accordance with Ireland's economic interests, is to be infused into the life of the nation, then I am afraid the Committee's labours will have been wasted. However, we shall wait and see.

That is the main thing I wish to draw attention to, that you may devise schemes by which the national revenue may be allocated to this phase of unemployment or that; you may arraign one section of the community as opposing the real interests of the nation in one direction or another, but now that we have in our own hands that for which we have struggled, not merely political power but economic power, the right to decide our own fiscal future and fiscal policy, the right to weld and to mould Ireland's interests, if we fail to do that we will have, I was going to use a very harsh phrase, I was going to say we will have sold the pass, but at any rate whether that is an accurate description or not, we will have done something to diminish very seriously the hopes with which the Irish people have looked to this Assembly to lift the country from the demoralising and derelict condition in which the last two years have placed it, and put it in a position to become, in the near future, one of the most solvent and progressive States in the world.

NATIONAL FINANCES.

RETRENCHMENT PROPOSALS.

Mr. BLYTHE: Perhaps I may be permitted to intervene and cut across the line of this discussion. As we have reached the stage when the credit of Saorstát Éireann is for the first time to be put to the test of an appeal for funds to be borrowed in the open market, I think it is proper that I should acquaint the House with such particulars of the financial situation as will enable an accurate judgment to be formed of how we actually stand. I do so all the more readily because numerous irresponsible reports and comments on the financial situation of the Saorstát and the supposed intentions of the Government in the matter have been given currency for some time past, and it is desirable that authoritative information should be available to prevent the growth of misleading ideas. I can only ask the House now to judge the position by reference not to reports from irresponsible quarters but to plain facts which I shall endeavour to place before it as lucidly as possible.

The Government of this country, although gravely preoccupied with other difficult problems, has 2 o'clock. now for over a year and a half carried on its financial business successfully without being obliged to look for assistance outside of Ireland. The idea that seems to be entertained in some quarters, that this country as a State is going to be dependant for money on outside capitalists, is a mere delusion, and it has been propagated without encouragement or inspiration from here. It is important to have it understood that the public finance of the country does not need to be conducted, and will not, under the present Government, be conducted in a manner that can render us subservient to any external interests.

I will ask Deputies in the first instance to consider the Statement of Exchequer transactions for the half year ended on the 30th September. This Statement, which has been circulated, is the usual weekly Exchequer Statement as issued in the Iris Oifigiúil of 2nd October.

The important figure on the Receipt side of the Statement is the tax revenue which, taking the several heads together, shows an aggregate of £12,235,000 for the half year, as compared with an Estimate of £20,550,000 for the whole year. I am glad to be able to say that since the original estimate was prepared I have received a revised statement of estimated tax revenue which shows for the whole year an increase of £1,650,000 beyond the original estimate. An increased yield in the non-tax revenue of the Post Office is also expected.

The substantial increase of revenue that we anticipate is attributable largely to abnormal causes, such as the extent of income tax arrears.

The receipts of the half year from non-revenue sources represent borrowings which have been incurred under powers duly conferred on the Minister for Finance by Act of the Oireachtas. The items to which I wish to invite special attention are those under the head of Free State Bills and Free State Savings Certificates. The Bills are short-dated securities which have been taken up by the banks for the purpose of tiding the Government over the interval that must elapse before the proceeds of a funding loan are available. The friendly relations existing between the Government and the banks, and the willingness of the banks to assist the Government in financing the public services in the most effective manner are factors which will be appreciated at their true value by intelligent observers of the present situation. The inherent soundness of the banking position in this country is an important financial asset which the Government have every desire to safeguard and defend.

The Savings Certificates to which I have referred were first introduced in the month of July. In the three months which have since elapsed we have raised from this source almost £300,000. The figure has increased from £220,000 as shown in the sheet to £293,000. I would ask Deputies specially to note this point, as one of the surest indications of the possibility of attracting the genuine savings of the people of this country into an investment which is used for the benefit of this country only, and enjoys a security guaranteed by this country alone. These certificates are of course an excellent investment for any citizen of the Free State from the point of view of yield and of the privilege of exemption from income tax. Organised measures will be taken shortly to bring the advantages of these Certificates directly to the notice of the public, but in the meantime the sale of them has, as is evident, been most encouraging, especially as no special effort has been made to force them into public notice.

Returning to the Exchequer Statement, I will refer briefly to the expenditure side of it. It is necessary to mention that the figures represent money issued out of the Exchequer which is not exactly the same thing as expenditure on public services in the period. But the amounts are sufficiently approximate for practical purposes. The expenditure on general public services amounts, on the basis of the issue shown in the statement, to a total of about 17½ millions for the half year as compared with about 9½ millions for the corresponding half of the preceding year. About one million of this apparent increase of 7½ millions is not a real increase, being only a disbursement occurring this year but not last, in respect of land purchase annuities which is offset by a corresponding receipt of the annuities themselves. The balance of the increase is due in the main to obvious and easily understood causes, namely to the facts that the Army charge and the compensation charge had not begun to make themselves felt fully during the same period last year, whereas they were very serious burdens this year.

In regard to compensation, it is well to have it known that the rate of discharge of awards has advanced rapidly during the past half year. There is, in fact, no room whatever at the present time for the complaints which used to be made six months ago about alleged delay in payment of awards made by the Compensation Commission. That Commission, which deals entirely with pre-truce damage, has made considerable progress with the issue of its awards, and the machinery set up by the Ministry of Finance has, for some time past, been working at a rate which has overtaken arrears, and keeps pace with the making of the awards by the Commission. Altogether over 2½ millions in cash had been paid out up to the end of September, the payments in that month alone reaching £430,000. The Army expenditure of the half-year has been on a heavy scale, the Exchequer issues for that service having amounted to £6,149,500 in the period. The Government have had constantly in mind the serious problem which this expenditure constitutes for the Saorstát, and have been engaged for some time in carrying out, through the Minister for Defence, administrative reforms designed not only to put a stop to the waste, which was largely inevitable under the active service conditions of a year ago, but to establish an orderly and systematic control of the whole spending machinery of the Army, with that efficiency which peace conditions should be expected to render practicable. Financially demobilisation is the problem of most interest, and, as regards this, the Dáil is aware that it has already been found possible to effect a large reduction of strength, by allowing a proportion of soldiers to return to civil life, according as the period for which they attested has been completed. As a consequence the strength of the Army, which was some time ago well over 50,000, has now fallen to nearly 35,000. In the next place, reductions have been effected in the high rates of pay which had been settled hurriedly in the troubled days when quick recruitment of an adequate force had to be the primary consideration. For some time past every soldier who is reattested for a further period is only accepted at a new scale of pay, the rate being for a private 2s. 6d. a day, as compared with the rate of 3s. 6d. heretofore paid. Again, it has been necessary to take steps for doing away with the expensive system of dependants' allowances heretofore applicable. Under the arrangement recently introduced no dependants' allowance will be payable in respect of soldiers reattested, beyond a marriage allowance, which has been fixed on a moderate scale. Previously the allowances were for N.C.O.'s and men:—Wife, 4s. per day; first child, 1s. 6d.;

second child, 1s.; third and each additional child, 9d. Then, there were allowances for other dependants. The marriage allowance under the new arrangement is as follows:—All N.C.O.'s and men entitled to marriage allowance to allot at least 1s. a day towards the upkeep of their homes; the State will grant 1s. 6d. a day as marriage allowance, and additional allowances for children of 1s. a day for each of the first two children, and 6d. a day for each of the next two children. Four children is the largest number provided for, so that 3s. per day will be the maximum allowance on this basis.

The special units of the Army organised for protection work and marine duties have been almost entirely abolished or absorbed. As a result of these and other measures which have been or are being taken, it is proposed to bring the Army Estimate for next year down to about 4 millions, as against the total of nearly £10,700,000 for this year. As is indicated by the fact that Army expenditure for the half year ended on 30th September last was over 6 millions, the steps taken during the last six months to discharge Army liabilities in the country have made satisfactory progress. Current liabilities are being met in an effective manner, and such difficulties as still exist relate in the main to accounts outstanding from the period of turmoil where there is inevitable delay in getting evidence as to facts. A great deal of delay is occasioned by fraudulent and inflated claims which have been sent in and which necessitate a great deal of special investigation.

As regards expenditure generally, an opportunity of analysing past transactions will be afforded when the Appropriation Accounts, now in preparation, are available for the Public Accounts Committee. It will, I think, be of greater advantage at the moment if I explain in some detail the general course of policy that the Government propose to take henceforward.

Careful consideration has been given for some time past to the relation that at present exists between the revenue available from taxation, even on the present scale, on the one hand, and on the other hand the expenditure that is being incurred on the normal operations of Government; that is excluding Compensation Charges and that part of the Army charge which can be regarded as abnormal. As conditions have not yet had time to become definitely settled, and important parts of the administration are still, to some extent, in a state of transition, exact conclusions are difficult to reach. But on the best scrutiny of the facts available, it appears certain that the normal operations of Government at present entail an expenditure which exceeds revenue by at least something more than one million a year.

Now, whatever justification may exist for going outside of revenue to meet the abnormal expenditure on Compensation and the Army—and the justification in those cases is obvious—the Government are quite convinced that the normal public services must be financed out of revenue and not from borrowing. The evils of a contrary policy are familiar to all observers of the plight of those countries that have conducted their finances without regard to the necessity for budget equilibrium. To aim, accordingly, at reaching such equilibrium, is a guiding principle of the policy that the Government in the best interests of the country find it essential to pursue. Not only is it important to refrain from borrowing for the purpose of meeting such normal charges as should be borne by revenue, but it is important also to recognise that where there is borrowing to meet some legitimate capital need the annual charge in respect of the debt must be met out of revenue. It would manifestly be a spendthrift and ruinous procedure to have to borrow to pay interest on one's existing debts. It is the avoidance of this spendthrift procedure that I have in mind when I speak of aiming at budget equilibrium.

Now, we are spending on normal services at the present time at a rate which substantially exceeds the collection of revenue. This is a definite danger sign which the Government are bound not to ignore. It is specially necessary not to ignore it now, as there is the absolute certainty before us, that the position, if not properly handled, meanwhile will be aggravated next year by a heavy addition of new and inevitable debt charge. Between Exchequer borrowings and securities issued for payment of compensation, it is necessary to contemplate a debt charge of perhaps two millions next year. Moreover, recent legislation has put new burdens on the State, such as Army pensions and the completion of land purchase, the effects of which will be appreciable. For relief from this situation it is not permissible to rely upon a higher yield of revenue from existing taxes. A good year is about to be replaced by a bad year in the computation of income tax, and the general depression of agriculture and industry in this country during recent years are adverse factors of great importance. The appreciation of money and lower prices and incomes generally have a similar tendency.

What, then, can the Government do to bridge this gap of several millions next year, between revenue on the present basis and expenditure in respect of normal services? The obvious alternatives are higher taxes or lower public expenditure, or partly one and partly the other.

It is unnecessary for me to dilate upon the evils of high taxation. It discourages thrift, retards industry, and increases unemployment. Three of our taxes, the beer duty, the income tax, and the Corporation Profits tax, are actually higher than the corresponding taxes in Great Britain at the present time. In addition, our postage rates are heavier than the British. These higher imposts have an adverse effect on workers and all other sections of the community. As regards the direct imposts in particular, the Free State producer of any given article who has to reckon with them is handicapped as regards the sale of that article, even in the Free State, as compared with the British producer of the same article, who is not subject to the same imposts.

On general grounds the Government cannot contemplate the imposition on the country of any heavier burden of taxation than it now bears. It is rather the aim of our policy to bring about a lessening of that burden at the earliest possible date, and it is even hoped that by adopting measures of retrenchment, such as I am about to indicate, the possibility of reducing taxation in some slight degree may be considered in relation to the next Budget.

Retrenchment, then, is the only course open to the Government if taxes are to be kept from exceeding even the present high level. Economy is an unpopular policy among those who do not appreciate the true wisdom of it and who will not face facts. Even among those who admit its propriety there are many who admire it in its general aspect but become critical when it is applied in some particular sphere of expenditure in which they take an interest. The Government fully realise all this, but are convinced that in pursuing economy in a practical manner they can count on the support of every Deputy in the Dáil who wishes to keep outside of the Saorstát those easy but improvident methods of public finance that have worked themselves to their logical conclusion in the economic breakdown of certain continental countries.

It is proposed, accordingly, to aim at securing forthwith substantial savings throughout the public services, distributing the inevitable sacrifice as fairly as circumstances permit. As a help towards understanding the position which has to be met I have had prepared for Deputies a special statement, giving in the light of the best information at present available, a revised estimate in summary form of the revenue and expenditure of the current year. This statement shows that after meeting estimated commitments of every kind, normal and abnormal, there would be an excess of expenditure over revenue amounting to about 18½ millions. An analysis of the figures on which the statement is based discloses that even if we exclude every expenditure which can fairly be treated as justifying recourse to borrowing, there still remains a deficit, as I have already stated, of at least over a million a year. This figure, however, does not give us the full measure of the savings that it is necessary to effect in order to reach Budget equilibrium. We must add to it a further amount of over two millions in respect of next year's debt service. Thus savings of between three and four millions should be aimed at in order to effect a balance, and even then further savings would be required before the present level of taxation could be lowered. Savings on such a scale are not possible without retrenchment over the whole field of the public services, wherever there is a discretion for applying it.

A survey is accordingly at present in progress of every head of public expenditure for the purpose of ascertaining where curtailment can be effected with the least detriment to the public interest. In the civil departments generally the fall in bonus is producing in the course of time an appreciable diminution in the cost of staff. It is reckoned that the provision for bonus over the whole of the current year's estimates amounts to a total of about £1,350,000. This is already down to about one-half of the corresponding figure for the time when the cost of living was at the peak. For the purpose of next year's estimates the provision to be inserted for bonus will be calculated on an index figure five points below that adopted in the current year. If the index figure were to fall more than these five points the bonus payable would of course be likewise reduced to such extent as the terms of the scale provide. In regard to the Civil Service generally, there are two fairly distinct spheres in which economy may be sought. The first of these is the sphere dependent on policy, for which the ordinary example is whether a particular service should be retained or not, and as to this I do not propose to say more at present than that we are considering carefully the justification of existing Government services and will not hesitate to seek Parliamentary sanction for the scrapping of any services, the maintenance of which cannot be fully justified. The other sphere is in relation to the cost of administration of such Government services as we have at the moment in existence, and this resolves itself largely into an examination of the staffing of Government Departments so as to ensure that both in numbers of staff and in scales of salaries our staff expenditure is consistent with the strict economy that is necessary at present. In the case of all Government services, and particularly in the case of those services which were administered as purely Irish Departments before the change of Government, I am taking steps to ensure that the administrative cost of the services for the Free State will compare favourably with the administrative cost of the services for the whole of Ireland, and will reflect the loss of work represented by the present exclusion of the Six Counties. In the case of one or two Departments, the Revenue Department and the Post Office, which were administered from London prior to the change of Government, it will of course be appreciated that the creation of a separate administration is an obstacle to reduction in the cost of administration. In the Post Office, however, where a majority in numbers of the entire Civil Service is employed the steps which have been taken are already producing an appreciable result. The effect will not have time to make itself fully felt in the present financial year as some of the steps are of recent date, but it is expected that in next financial year the expenditure of the Post Office will have fallen by perhaps £250,000 a year below its recent level. The net loss on the working of that Department should be reduced not only by that amount but by a further amount representing anticipated increase of revenue due to the resumption of more normal conditions in the country. The staffing generally of the Civil Service is under constant review and I have issued instructions to all Government Departments that no vacancies can be filled and no fresh appointments can be made without my sanction, and to obtain this it will be necessary for Departments to prove their needs. At the moment we have more than one heavy task on hand of a temporary character, for example, payment of compensation, collection of arrears of rent, and for these temporary tasks we have had to engage additional temporary staff so that at the moment our expenditure on staff, apart altogether from fluctuations in the cost of living, is higher than it is likely to be in a normal year.

The instructions which have already been issued from the Ministry of Finance for preparation of Estimates for the next financial year lay particular stress on the necessity for all departments carrying out a strict scrutiny of their existing activities. It is explained that in general the financial position is such as to preclude sanction being given for additional charges on public funds, and that the possibility of sanction being given for any new service will normally depend on a clear demonstration that a compensating reduction is being effected in some essential existing service.

Of our total normal expenditure, about 10 millions, that is nearly one-half, is devoted to education in all forms and pensions, including Old Age Pensions. It is evident that the large saving that must be effected will not be feasible unless a fair contribution is made by these services which account for so large a part of our total charges.

As regards education, the Government feel that the time has come when the salaries of National School Teachers must be reviewed. I should explain that the present scale of salaries for these Teachers was fixed in November, 1920, on a basis which made no provision for variation in respect of changes in the cost of living. At the time when the negotiations leading up to the agreement fixing the salaries were taking place the cost of living was still rising, and the agreement was signed at the time when the cost of living was actually at its highest point, being 176 per cent. above pre-war. As Deputies know, the cost of living figure has steadily fallen since the end of 1920, and with it the salaries of Public Servants generally. A Civil Servant, whose salary at the end of 1920 was between £150 and £500 a year, has suffered a reduction varying 30 per cent. at the lower salary to 25 per cent. at the higher salary. Salaries outside the Civil Service have been affected in a similar manner, and we feel that it is not unreasonable that the very decided fall in the cost of living should be reflected in the emoluments of National School Teachers.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE at this stage resumed the Chair.

Mr. BLYTHE: The salaries fixed in 1920 were anything from three to three and a half times the salaries obtaining before 1914, and even admitting that those salaries were abnormally low we cannot justify continuing to pay salaries so many times the pre-war salaries when the index figure of the cost of living shows an increase over pre-war of 80 per cent. If the ordinary Civil Service bonus were paid on the pre-war salaries the resulting remuneration would be approximately only half of the present salaries.

In view of these general figures, the Government have decided that an immediate cut must be made in the remuneration of the Teachers. They do not want to take drastic action at short notice and to make the full reduction, which the facts appear to justify, at once. They, therefore, propose that a reduction of 10 per cent. should be made with effect from the 1st of November, and that an inquiry should be set on foot immediately for the purpose of exploring the question as to what further adjustment may be proper.

Another definite economy that the Government are obliged to propose is in regard to Old Age Pensions. When these pensions were first introduced in 1908 the rate in the most usual case was 5s. As the result of war legislation it now stands at 10s. It was not intended at any time that the pension should provide the recipient with a complete and independent means of livelihood.

The 10/- rate was adopted when the cost of living had risen to 120 per cent. above pre-war and was still mounting steadily. It remained at 10/- when the cost of living index figure was 176 per cent. above pre-war. Judged in this light alone, it is manifest that a fall in the cost of living index figure to the present level of 80 per cent. above pre-war makes a prima facie case for substantial reduction of the pension.

Apart from the consideration of the pensioners themselves, it is necessary in this matter also to bear in mind particularly the weight of the burden imposed on the State. In 1920-21 the charge for Old Age Pensions in the whole of Ireland was £4,463,500, the total revenue of the whole of Ireland being then £48,845,000. At present the charge for Old Age Pensions in the Free State is £3,277,000, the total revenue (according to the revised statement which has been circulated) being £24,761,405. That is, we are paying three-quarters of the all-Ireland pension charge of 1920-21 with only half the all-Ireland revenue of the same year.

In 1920-21 the charge for Old Age Pensions in Scotland was £2,456,000, the revenue of that country for the same year being £119,753,000. In 1920-21 Scotland spent 2 per cent. of her revenue on Old Age Pensions. At the same time Ireland spent 9.1 per cent. To-day the Free State spends 13.2 per cent. The fact must be recognised that the resources of the country are not equal to the present burden of the Old Age Pension charge. For this the pensioners may attribute a high degree of responsibility to those who have wasted and impoverished the country during the past two years. The Government, in their desire to extend every consideration possible to the old people affected, are confining their proposal in this matter to the most moderate limit permissible, and accordingly will not ask for a reduction of more than one shilling on the present rate of pension. Legislation on this matter will be introduced almost immediately and will deal with some points about means and other details, as well as the actual pension rate.

These economies that I have mentioned represent merely the application in the sphere of Government of measures of the same sort as those which have to be endured by other sections of the community. It cannot be contended that because certain classes of persons receive their money from the State they should, at the cost of the taxpayer, be shielded by the State from the harsh winds that blow upon the taxpayer himself. Civil servants, working men, soldiers, indeed all persons earning salary or wages throughout the country, have been experiencing, for some time, a reduction of at least their nominal receipts, and it would be improper for the State to continue to strain its resources by not aiming at some corresponding reduction of the receipts of teachers and old age pensioners. Reduced public charges will tend to operate towards reducing the cost of living, and thereby compensate at least to some extent for the lowering of emoluments now proposed.

The general course of policy that I have now perhaps sufficiently indicated will, I hope, be taken as evidence of a recognition on the part of the Government that the time has come both for the State itself and all sections of the community to accommodate themselves to the economic and monetary charges that have been operating in our midst for a long time past. The cost of living index figures show conclusively that, whatever particular exceptions may be adduced, the cost of living in general has diminished to a marked extent during the past three years. The purchasing power of money has grown, and therefore a man may be as well off as before even though he may suffer a large reduction in the nominal amount of his salary or wages. If it was only reasonable, as everyone admits, that remuneration should increase in nominal amount during that period of war-time inflation when the pound was steadily losing in purchasing power, it is equally reasonable, and indeed necessary, that remuneration should diminish in nominal amount in consequence of the subsequent recovery by the pound of much of its former loss of purchasing power. The same accommodation to circumstances is required from those dealers in commodities who still fail to appreciate that the progressive inflation and rapidly falling value of money which afforded some excuse for and rendered possible the scale of war profits have ceased to be available in support or justification of any attempt to secure a similar scale of profits now.

For the purpose of facilitating the transition to that nominally though not really lower level of prices and wages which present conditions warrant and require, the Government, without hazarding the general pursuit of economy, are desirous that such resources as they can provide shall be applied in the most beneficial manner. Continuance of State aid to housing, which is also vital on other grounds, offers a prospect of being useful in this direction, and the Government will be prepared to formulate a suitable scheme as soon as there is evidence of a reasonable adjustment of both prices and wages in the building trade. Between this scheme and the requirements of re-instatement for which large sums have now been put at the disposal of compensation claimants, a considerable contribution is made to the problem of affording employment for demobilised soldiers and others. In addition, the Government expect to be in a position to finance to the extent of perhaps a million and a quarter, a generous scheme of works for the improvement and repair of roads over the next eighteen months. The money for this scheme would not involve any addition to present State charges but would consist mainly of the proceeds, as at present, of motor vehicle duties plus the special rate which County Councils are required to pay to the Exchequer under recent legislation as their share of the compensation liability arising from the events of the last two years.

It is an essential feature of these schemes that they cannot be initiated until definite recognition is given to the fact that the Government, in the financial and economic interests of the country, cannot consent to allow them to be conducted in a manner that would raise or keep prices or wages above the nominal level at which they should fairly stand at the present time.

I have now, I trust, said sufficient about expenditure to enable Deputies to follow the general trend of policy. I have sketched the path by which it is hoped to arrive at budget equilibrium. In the meantime, heavy capital issues that are not a proper charge against revenue are required. The finding of money to finance these issues for compensation and the Army is a task that cannot be evaded or deferred. The magnitude of the task is still a matter of some surmise, but it is at least possible to be assured that it is not more than the present resources of the country can bear. The brunt of the abnormal expenditure on the Army has already, we may hope, been borne, and the balance yet to come should not prove too formidable. The sums required for compensation are still, to a great extent, indeterminate at least as regards the period since the Truce, but we know at least that the day of destruction is gone and that no new liabilities are arising on this account.

The Government have heretofore borrowed for these necessary purposes mainly by having recourse to the Irish banks. Our National Debt up to date has reached the total of £5,990,500 of which the banks have provided £3,795,000 by discounting bills. I need not tell the Dáil that it is not good policy for a Government to pursue too far the course of borrowing from the banks. Borrowing in this form, while it can provide a temporary but fallacious show of prosperity, is peculiarly liable to cause instability of monetary conditions and to end by necessitating measures which depress trade and create unemployment. It is, therefore, intended to seek a loan within the Free State at an early date for the purpose of attracting the national savings into our own securities. The country has now had sufficient experience of its new national and international status and of the possibility of maintaining stable conditions of administration to justify a confidence on the part of the Government that the citizens who have money to invest will now be prepared to buy the stock of the Free State with at least as much faith as they have shown in the past in investing their money abroad. The Free State is not a new country like Australia or Canada that must depend largely on the importation of capital from outside. Our people, on the contrary, have heretofore provided capital in large amounts for other countries, and especially by way of investment in the Government and industrial securities of Great Britain. They will henceforth have more abundant opportunity for investing their money at home with greater advantage both to themselves and to this country. The loan that we are about to issue will, in accordance with the recent Appropriation Act, have the absolute security of the Central Fund of Saorstát Eireann, and the charge in favour of the stockholders will, therefore, secure their rights in priority to any of the demands made on the Exchequer for the ordinary public services of the State. In addition to being an entirely gilt-edged security, the loan will possess for subscribers the advantage of giving a yield which, as this is our first venture on the open market, must necessarily be somewhat more favourable than that obtainable in other investments of like standing which, however, are issued by borrowers better known in the outside financial world. Also, the loan will be an investment authorised by law in which Trustees may invest Trust funds.

It is the hope of the Government that a substantial subscription can be secured in the first instance from the actual free savings available in the country, whether in the form of bank deposits or otherwise. Next to this source the realisation of investments at present held in Government and other securities abroad is likely to be of the most service both to the State and to the investor, who will obtain by the exchange a higher income and at least equal security. In this connection I desire to call particular attention at this stage to the fact that the funds belonging to the Free State, which are now invested outside, include large amounts which are the property of various charities. Now, where the money of a Free State charity is invested in the Free State, the law allows it to be exempted from income tax. By a temporary arrangement having reciprocal effect, a similar exemption is at present allowed by the British Government where Free State charitable funds are invested in Great Britain. But this temporary arrangement is due to expire next March, and will not be renewed. Consequently the holders of Free State charitable moneys now invested in British securities, Government or otherwise, should take note of the fact that if they wish to continue to enjoy exemption from income tax they should transfer their investments in good time to securities within the Free State. The loan now about to be issued provides them with an opportunity of which they might be well advised to avail themselves. Approved Societies under the Health Insurance Acts are in a position similar to that of charities and the same considerations apply. I do not propose now to enter further into detail in regard to the loan. I only trust that from such indications as I have been able to give and from general observations of the trend of events in the country, all those who have money to invest will realise how important it is that they should join in making this first issue such an unquestionable success that our credit will rank from the start as highly as it deserves.

Mr. O'CONNELL: The statement to which the Dáil has just listened is an exceedingly important one from many points of view. I think that the Minister is to be congratulated on making the position so plain at such an important juncture. On the whole, I think the position hopeful. It is not in any case such as many people had ventured to predict it would be, that is, those people who were not fully informed of what the position was. In the early portion of his statement the Minister referred to the progress which had been made, and is being made, to deal with the payment of awards. I think there is hardly a Deputy in this Dáil but knows that all over the country there are many complaints of delays in making payments, not only of those awards, but also of Army accounts. I am sure there is no Deputy here but has piles of letters from different parts of his constituency calling attention to accounts which have been repeatedly sent in to the Finance Department and which have not been met. There is no evidence that they are being met in a serious way. That is undoubtedly causing damage to the credit of the Government, because the general doubt that is raised in the minds of those people is, "Are the Government able to pay," rather than that they do not want to pay. I think that is a matter to which the Government ought to give their very serious attention. I do not intend to deal in anything like a general way with the statement of the Minister, except to direct attention to the fact that the only definite proposals which he has put before us this afternoon, apart from the large amount of generalisations as to the necessity for economy, are two definite proposals. Immediately from the 1st of November a cut of 10 per cent. is to be made on the salaries of National Teachers, and a shilling is to be taken off the Old Age

[Mr. O'Connell.]

Pensions. Except in a general way he has not told us what he is going to do to bring down the internal cost of administration. He has not given us any explanation of why it should require some thirteen to fifteen hundred servants or officials who administer the Free State service more than it took in 1914 to administer the whole Irish services. He has told us the Civil Servants generally have suffered decreases in their income on account of cost of living bonus decreases, but no attempt has been made to show how even their existing salaries and bonus compare with the rates of those whose salaries he proposes to reduce immediately.

It might be expected that in a matter of this kind the last services that should be interfered with without the fullest enquiry would be those which are most essential to the nation, and it might also be said that the very last that should suffer a reduction would be the poor old people who have just what is keeping them scarcely above starvation limit. I have considerable doubt, indeed, not only as to the wisdom of this policy of reducing old age pensions from the Government, and the national point of view, but as to whether they can be asked to take on any portion of the sacrifices which everybody must, apparently, take. If the income which the old age pensioner gets from the State is reduced he must get it somewhere else, and we can only have an extension of what the farmers complain of, and rightly complain of. He must go on the rates, and this must mean an extension of Home Help.

I will naturally be expected to say something with regard to the other definite proposition, but I would like to make it clear at the beginning that I am not here as an official, representing the people who will be affected. I am here rather as a public representative, and it is from that point of view that I would like to approach the matter. The Minister laid great stress on the necessity for the people of the Saorstát to have faith in their Government. That is essential, but it is not a good beginning, or a good example to set to the people from whom they expect faith, to be themselves faithless.

Some years ago a certain individual announced that it was his policy to say "To hell with contracts and to hell with agreements," and there was a very great outcry indeed, rightly so, in my opinion, against the adumbration of any such policy. If these agreements and contracts are not observed there can be no stability. The Minister has referred to a certain agreement entered into in 1920. I have it before me as I speak. It was entered into in a very solemn way, and it is signed by representatives of the body to which the Minister is a successor. I hope the Dáil will bear with me for a moment if I tell, as briefly as I can, the history of that agreement. I would like to state, in the first place, that I am sure that national teachers, just as every other body in the Saorstát, are prepared to bear their fair share of any burden which the State as a whole has to bear. I would like to emphasise that. But if they are to be asked to do that they ought to be assured of just and fair treatment. The Minister stated that under the agreement some teachers have salaries three to three and a half times more than they had pre-war. That is true in some instances, but he did not state that in pre-war days over 2,000 teachers had salaries—if you like to call them salaries—of £24 a year, and there are, no doubt, cases of teachers who have three and three and a half times as much as that salary. I think I need not dwell on the fact that teachers were underpaid in 1914, and that it was the policy, the stated and determined policy, of the British Government to keep them underpaid. Everybody here knows that. In 1918 a Commission was set up, presided over by Lord Killanin, and of which Most Rev. Dr. O'Donnell, Canon Maeken, the Protestant Bishop of Meath, and others interested in education were members, and if Deputies would care to interest themselves in the matter sufficiently to turn to that Commission's report they will see the studied decisions of people who went into the whole question, and the effect on education of this continual starvation of those who are engaged on the work of teaching. Repeatedly, during the years 1917, 1918, and 1919, the British Government were putting off the date on which they would have to fix the salaries of teachers on a suitable scale.

A certain body, called the Civil Service Arbitration Board, was set up by the Cabinet, to which, in 1920, the National Teachers' Organisation appealed to settle and deal with the demand for a fixed and permanent scale of salaries. The British Treasury at the time objected to fixing a permanent scale of salaries. They put forward various reasons, but eventually the matter came to be tried before this Board. At that trial, or hearing, were represented the British Treasury, the Commissioners of National Education and the National Teachers' Organisation, and after hearing all of them fully, the Board decided, against the British Treasury representatives, that a permanent scale of salaries should be set up. It was as a consequence of that decision that the agreement referred to by the Minister was entered into. The Minister says that that contained no provision for the Cost of Living Bonus. That is quite correct, and deliberately so, and it is a strange thing to note that in all agreements connected with teachers, whether in this country or not, at the time, the cost of living did not enter materially into the fixing of the rates of salary. There must be some good reason for that. The main consideration was to fix a rate, or a scale, which would attract to the profession the proper class of men and women. It was not thought advisable that fluctuations of the cost of living should enter into the fixing of the scale. I want to draw particular attention to a point mentioned by the Minister. He said that if the Civil Service Bonus were given these teachers would have much less now than they actually have.

I would like to point out that if in 1920, when this agreement was entered into, they had got the 3 o'clock. then Civil Service Bonus they would have got actual money increases at the time, varying from £80 to £120, whereas they actually only got something like £30 or £40. The full rate of salary was payable only from the 1st April, 1922. That is a very important point inasmuch as it shows that while the actual terms of the decision were made in 1920 the full, or peak point of the salary was not reached until two years afterwards. If the cost of living factor materially entered into the fixing of the salaries at that time, naturally the peak point of the salary would be paid immediately in 1920. That was not done, and what is the result? During the war years, when other workers were getting the peak bonus and generally had good salaries, and business people, and farmers even, were doing very well, teachers were doing very badly, and from 1920 to 1921 they were looking forward to the year when they would get their full salary and were living largely on credit in the meantime. That is pretty well known.

I have before me the arguments which were put forward by the Treasury at that time, and the word "permanent," as a description of the scales, is written all over this correspondence. When the settlement was arrived at the Department of Education issued a circular, which I have before me, and it is headed: "New Permanent Scale of Salaries for National Teachers." I do not know what definition or meaning was put on the word "permanent" except the ordinary accepted one, but I have learnt to-day that there is a new meaning to be put on it. "Permanent," if it meant anything in any case did not mean there were to be fluctuations according to the cost of living; it meant the direct opposite. I do not wish to dwell on this matter more than is necessary. There is a great deal I could say that I will take the opportunity of saying perhaps elsewhere, but at the moment I wish to dwell particularly on the way that this matter will be looked at. Here is a bargain, or agreement, or decision, solemnly entered into by three or four parties. One of the parties, without any kind of consultation whatever, simply scraps the agreement. I think that is not good policy on the part of the Government, apart from its other effects, and it will have other effects. If the Minister had come to the Education Department and said: "It is necessary to effect a saving,"—and the extent of this first saving, I may mention, would be something over £300,000—"of £300,000 on this Vote," I feel certain that if the matter were approached in that way, the Department of Education and the teachers themselves would be quite prepared and quite willing to endeavour to see things from the Minister's point of view, and as far as possible to co-operate. We have for the past two years seen a very great effort on the part of the Department of Education to bring back to this country its old civilisation and its old ideals through the instrumentality of the Gaelic language, and teachers who as everybody knows had for years spent most of their energies agitating for better conditions and better salaries, had wiped the slate clean of these things, and had turned their attention to what should properly be their functions, that is, seeing how the system of education could be improved. I think we had an example of that last Easter, when two very distinguished members of the Dáil at the annual meeting of the Teachers' Congress delivered addresses relative to matters, some of which will in the very near future be the subject of discussion in the Dáil. We had examples when the teachers, at very great inconvenience to themselves, undertook what was to them, or the majority of them, absolutely new work in the matter of the teaching of the Irish language, and preparing themselves to give instruction in it. I can only see before me now a renewal of the old years of agitation, because the proposal here is not a 10 per cent. cut, nor a temporary 10 per cent. cut, but an immediate 10 per cent. one, with a promise of revision of the whole basis on which teachers have been paid. I need not point out that if this country is going to make the progress which we all hope it will make, it must depend on the education of its people. Education, in the true and proper sense of the word, lies not so much in reading and writing and arithmetic, for that after all is not education, as in the character of the men and women engaged in the important work of education. You are not going to get men to lay down their minds to this important work if agreements entered into by them are simply scrapped without any proper consideration of the merits of the case, for I do allege that there has not been any proper consideration given to the facts. Most of the statements made by the Minister in reference to that can be controverted. This is not the place to do that, and I do not intend to do it. Deputy Bryan Cooper, speaking earlier in the day, urged the advisability of the appointment of a small committee to go into the estimates of Government expenditure in order to see where the savings could be made. I think that the statement and the action of the Minister proves very conclusively the necessity for such a Committee. If it were appointed it could go over the whole field of educational expenditure and see whether or not economies equal to the amount which could be gained in this way could not be saved in another way. Repeatedly in the Dáil, and elsewhere, I and other Deputies have pointed out that economies could be effected in many ways to get that particular amount of money he is looking for, if that is the intention or desire of the Minister.

He may possibly have other intentions. He has referred to the necessity, as I said, of faith in the Government and for the organising of interest in the Government's proposals for a loan and the sale of Saving Certificates. I made a suggestion on one occasion that there was no method of organising in the country whereby the sale of Saving Certificates could be so well encouraged as through the schools and through the teacher. That is one of the ways that would recommend itself to a Minister who would know exactly the facts of the situation. There is nobody who is more closely in touch with the people in every little village or town than the teachers, and if the teachers were got to interest themselves; if it were put before them in this way: "Here is something that you can do to strengthen the financial position of the country," I have no doubt whatsoever that the teachers approached in that way would do it, and do it to a much larger extent than they can be expected to do it under the present circumstances. I will conclude by quoting what the Minister for Education said on the last occasion, I think it was when he was speaking on the estimates here. What he said was that the bottom of education, as everybody knows, is good teachers, and when you obtain them you have to sustain them. The Minister for Finance is probably of a different frame of mind. There was one important statement made by the Minister in the course of his remarks. He said that "We know that the day of destruction has gone." I think that that statement ought to be emphasised. It is very important. But, in that connection, one will wonder why it is still necessary to spend something like between four and six millions a year on an army. I think that before essential services, such as education, and such things as old age pensions, should definitely come under the axe, the Dáil and the country should be assured that practically and actually steps have been taken to make equal savings in other Departments. It is not fair that old age pensioners should be asked to bear such a heavy share proportionately of this burden while having no evidence that the Minister's economies in other Departments are taking practical shape.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I was going to suggest that it might be fair if we had an opportunity of having the Minister's statement before us. Therefore, I would ask leave to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BLYTHE: I quite agree; I have no objection at all.

Mr. JOHNSON: Before that motion is put, I would like to know if there is a date fixed on which this motion is to be determined—to what date is the adjournment? I heard rumours of a possible adjournment over a number of days, and it seems to me that if this debate is to be adjourned it ought not be adjourned beyond next Tuesday.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I was going to suggest that the debate, in the position in which we are now, must be adjourned to the next day on which the Dáil shall meet. Perhaps the Minister in charge might say when that day will be.

Mr. BLYTHE: It is intended to adjourn to Wednesday fortnight, the 21st of November.

Captain REDMOND: That seems to be a stereotyped phrase—"Wednesday fortnight."

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Well, then, we have another half hour in which the matter can be gone into now. I suggest that the proposal that we adjourn to Wednesday fortnight, which Deputy Redmond is suggesting has become rather a stereotyped phrase in this Dáil, should not be pressed, but that this debate should be adjourned until next Tuesday.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: In any event, the debate must be adjourned at 4 o'clock. To move the adjournment of the debate now merely deprives the Dáil of a further three-quarters of an hour debate to-day. If it is the desire to adjourn the debate that could be agreed to. The question of the date to which the Dáil will be adjourned, which is really the same question, could then be discussed, and Deputies would be in a better position to discuss it if we give this three-quarters of an hour for that purpose, rather than if the adjournment were moved at five minutes to four.

Mr. MILROY: Do we not automatically adjourn at 4 o'clock? I ask the question, as I have given notice that I have an important matter to raise on the adjournment. If this discussion goes on until 4 o'clock, will the Dáil then carry on the discussion on the matter I am raising?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: We adjourn the ordinary business at 4 o'clock, but a Deputy who has given notice of other business will have a half an hour to discuss it.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: As the matter that Deputy Milroy wishes to raise is important, it ought not to be crowded into half an hour. It was partly because of that statement that I was suggesting the adjournment of this question now. I do not think that it would be possible to say much further with regard to the statement of the Minister for Finance without having the speech before us in writing, and I say that especially because of the three-quarters of an hour that is left us.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The

[An Ceann Comhairle.]

Motion is that this debate be now adjourned until the next day on which the Dáil shall meet.

Mr. O'MAHONY: Why not continue it until 4 o'clock?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I shall put the question.

Question: "That the debate be now adjourned until the next day on which the Dáil shall meet," put and agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move that the Dáil do now adjourn.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: A Minister must move that.

Mr. BLYTHE: I beg to move that the Dáil do now adjourn until Wednesday fortnight, 21st of November.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move an Amendment, that the Dáil do adjourn until next Tuesday at 3 o'clock. I do so because the statement which we have just heard is one that will require to be discussed in the Dáil to prevent the possibility of the Ministry doing much more harm to the credit of the country and to its own credit than may have been done by the statement which has been made. I think it is necessary the Dáil should have an opportunity of discussing this statement and expressing its views upon it, and not allow the matter to be held over a fortnight. I, therefore, move that the adjournment be only until 3 o'clock on Tuesday next.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I second that. It is well known that the adjournments of this Dáil since it has met have not redounded entirely to its credit. Whatever excuse there might have been on an earlier occasion, which was that there was certain business to be transacted at Geneva does not now exist. The Dáil was then agreeable to that, because the people who were to go there were people whose presence in the Dáil was judged necessary to the proceedings. The Dáil was adjourned while they were away.

In any case that excuse, justified or unjustified, is now no longer available. Very important matters have been raised here to-day, matters of the very first importance. There is business before the Dáil. The statement made by the Minister provides in itself sufficient business for discussion. There is no reason why we should not meet next Tuesday at 3 o'clock and proceed with the discussion on the Governor-General's speech, following a discussion upon the very important statement that has been made by the Minister for Finance. For that reason I second the proposal to adjourn until Tuesday at 3 o'clock.

Major COOPER: I think it is in the Government's own interest that we should not have so long an adjournment as what is called a fortnight, but what is in reality three weeks all but two days. This immensely important statement of the Finance Minister's is going to be discussed whether we like it or not. It will be discussed in the Press, by the National Teachers, and by people all over the country. Surely, it is better that it should be discussed here, where misconceptions can be corrected, and where the Government can continue to make their case. If it is discussed outside you will see interviews given to the Press correcting misconceptions. The Dáil is the place where the Ministers should make their case, and correct misconceptions, and for that reason I think a shorter adjournment than three weeks is needed.

Mr. GOREY: I desire to suggest that the adjournment should be only until next Wednesday week. I would also suggest that when the Governor-General's address is taken up let it be finished, and not, as in the last Dáil and this Dáil, be under discussion at different intervals. It is a most unsatisfactory way, and it does not reflect credit on the Dáil and our conduct of business. Let us take this matter up and finish it once for all. The method we have been adopting in regard to the Address is most unsatisfactory and undignified. As a compromise I would suggest Wednesday week.

Mr. BLYTHE: I have no objection to Tuesday next or Wednesday week, provided that the Dáil is satisfied to come back for the discussion of the Address alone. There will not be other business of a substantial character before Wednesday fortnight.

Captain REDMOND: I have yet to be convinced in regard to the necessity for an adjournment at all. I think it is due to the Dáil, when an adjournment of this length is proposed, that we should be given some explanation. I think the Minister has given an explanation now to a certain extent, and that means that the legislation which is proposed in the Governor-General's speech is not quite ready.

If this is the rate at which we are going to proceed with the enormous programme laid down in the Governor-General's Address, I think it will take us a good deal longer than the time of the present session to get through anything like that programme. I think that in the interests of the Government and the Dáil, it would be wise in future for the Government, when proposing an adjournment of any length, to give the Dáil some reason for their proposal.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Do I understand the Minister for Finance to agree conditionally to this amendment?

Mr. BLYTHE: Yes, if it is the desire of the Dáil, but I want simply to make it clear that there will be no other business except the Governor-General's Address if we meet before next Wednesday fortnight.

Mr. BAXTER: If the Minister is agreeable that we should come here on Tuesday or Wednesday, might it not be possible to continue the debate on the Address and finish it next week. It ought to be possible to finish it next week, and I think we should do so.

Captain REDMOND: On a point of order, I would like to ask whether the statement made by the Minister for Finance comes within the terms of the Governor-General's Address?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes, the statement has been made on the Governor-General's Address, and I think it is relevant to the terms of the Address, stating that economies would be effected, and since the Address concerns the Government's general policy and the Minister's speech concerns the Government's general policy on finance, it is clearly relevant. I had intended, in view of the importance of the speech, not to insist that Deputies who had previously spoken should be precluded from speaking on this particular matter of finance, merely as a matter of fairness to Deputies. The only other matter on the Motion of Thanks for the Governor-General's Address is the question of fisheries which is raised on an amendment by Deputy O'Connell. Before I put the amendment, I desire to know if there is any agreement as to whether we could meet next week, and if so, shall it be Tuesday or Wednesday.

Mr. GOREY: I suggest that we meet on next Wednesday week. That will give Deputies an opportunity to read the speech of the Minister in the official reports and of studying it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The point is, that there is no other business even on next Wednesday week except the business we are now engaged upon. Therefore, if Deputies have to come specially for that business, they might as well come next week as the week after, and the Minister prefers Wednesday to Tuesday.

Mr. JOHNSON: The importance of having this matter discussed at the earliest possible date is that it is so serious a statement. If we may postpone it until Wednesday, then we might as well postpone it to Wednesday fortnight or even to the Greek Kalends. Unless the Dáil can bring some influence to bear upon the Ministry to save it from what I consider a calamity, we need not discuss it at all. I feel the matter is one that requires the earliest possible discussion, and in view of the practice of the Dáil that we cannot meet satisfactorily on Mondays, I have suggested Tuesday.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I have seconded the motion that we meet on Tuesday, and I adhere to it if the proposer insists upon Tuesday, but there is one consideration that I would like to bring before the Dáil, and it is this: It is now Friday, and pretty late in the day. It is necessary that the Minister's speech be circulated to us, and that we should have an opportunity of studying it, and it is possible that if we met on Wednesday we would have an opportunity of studying the statement better than if we met on Tuesday.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I will now put the amendment. The original motion was that the Dáil at its rising to-day adjourn until Wednesday, the 21st of November, to which an amendment has been moved to leave out the words "Wednesday, 21st November," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "Tuesday next at 3 o'clock." The question now is that the Dáil adjourns until Tuesday next at 3 o'clock.

Amendment put.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Could we now get an agreement for Wednesday?

Mr. GOREY: I proposed an amendment that the Dáil meet next Wednesday to discuss the Governor-General's Address.

that is turning out legislation has been working at a fairly high pressure. Something like 43 Acts were passed, I think, in the last Dáil, and two Acts have already been passed in this Dáil. During the period that has elapsed since the Dáil was elected there have been other occupations for Ministers, apart from the consideration of the ordinary business of the Dáil, which have absorbed a great deal of time. We realise the necessity for an early discussion of the statement of the Minister for Finance, but if we were to come back on Tuesday next there would be no business other than this discussion on the Governor-General's Speech, and I do not think the large expenditure of time and money would be warranted for that, having regard to the fact that in the ordinary business of the Dáil here the discussion on the subject of the Governor-General's Address or the consideration of Estimates forms very useful material for utilising when dealing with a number of Bills. The great number of Bills of which notice has been given in the Governor-General's Speech necessitate First and Second Readings, with intervals between them, which some people might call waste of time, but which are necessary under the Standing Orders, and which it is only fair that members should have in order to enable them to form judgments, propose amendments, or discuss the Bills. I think on Wednesday week we might be in a position to have some other measures in a fair state for presentation, and I propose to accept that if the Dáil will agree.

Mr. GOREY: I accept the President's suggestion.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The motion of the Minister for Finance is therefore altered to read: "Wednesday, 14th." The motion is therefore: "That the Dáil adjourn until Wednesday, 14th November, at 3 o'clock." There can be no further amendment, and we will take that as agreed in order to give Deputy Milroy an opportunity of speaking.

Mr. JOHNSON: Take me as dissenting.

NORTHERN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

Mr. MILROY: I have a substantial reason, I think, for having given notice that I would raise this question on the Adjournment. A very important statement, or at least, a statement which has very important implications, has appeared in the daily papers. I hope the matter of Ulster and the Northern question is of sufficient interest to retain the attention of Deputies in this assembly of the Irish Free State. Announcements have appeared in the Press which, as I said, have important implications. The Dáil is now adjourning for a period, that I had anticipated would be longer, but at any rate it will be of sufficient duration to allow of possibly very mischievous speculations to be indulged in, unless some authoritative statement was made by the responsible head of the Free State Government. It is for that reason, mainly, that I have raised this question to-day. Before I give way to the President to make a statement I should like to make one or two remarks upon this question of North-East Ulster. I am greatly afraid that many people in Ireland, whether in the Free State or in the other section at the moment outside the Free State, have suffered for some time from the illusion that the Free State, and those responsible for it, were going to acquiesce in allowing the Ulster provisions of the Treaty to become a dead letter. If I thought that was possible I would sit in a very different part of the Dáil, if I sat in it at all. It is because I have implicit faith and confidence in the Government to see that Clause 12 is carried out in the letter and in the spirit that I have refrained from raising this matter sooner. Ireland and Britain on the 6th of December, 1921, entered into a solemn International compact. As regards this particular Clause, with which I am dealing, I, myself, had some slight minor responsibility in assenting to it when it was being drafted, and therefore I take more than a superficial interest in it. That compact was entered into on the understanding that every-one of its Clauses would be honoured, that it would not be a question of honouring one and cancelling or ignoring another, but that every one would be carried out in the letter and the spirit that animated the men who brought to an end the conflict between the two countries. I believe that England will carry out her part of the compact with regard to Clause 12. I believe it will be in her interest to carry out Clause 12 of the Treaty, for the Free State has given pledges of its desire to honour the Treaty in every Clause, given pledges in blood and treasure that we cannot yet compute the value or the volume of. We are not going to allow these sacrifices—which we made in men and money, in suffering and in sacrifice—to go for nought.

If England should dare to attempt to violate Clause 12, or escape its implications, then we tell her that there are other Clauses in the Treaty which will go by the board if Clause 12 goes by the board. I think it is time that this sentiment was uttered emphatically and without any equivocation whatever, because there has gone abroad a feeling in England that, after all, we here should not expect that England would take seriously her commitments with regard to Clause 12. We will take her seriously, but the manner in which she has so far adhered to her part of the bargain gives me confidence that it will be rather the sense of honour than the threat of consequences that will keep her to the faith to which she is pledged in this matter. Now, a great delay has taken place with regard to this matter, but I think so far as the Free State is concerned that the time of delay has terminated. The Minister for Home Affairs recently, in a statement reviewing the national position, said in regard to this particular matter, "The case is prepared, the facts are collated, and the relevant statistics are available." That seems to be really equivalent to an announcement of "Seconds out of the ring." So far as we are concerned there is no further reason for delay.

I have seen that the Press has stated that a conference is to be held some date in the future—I hope it will be in the near future—between representatives of the Free State and representatives of the Belfast Parliament. I am glad that our Government has not turned down such a conference. I believe it will be a good thing that representatives of the heads of the Free State Government and of the Northern Parliament should come together and discuss matters which are of common interest to both, because the interests of Ireland as a whole are dear to both, whether they are people from the Free State or people from the North. If we could once break down that damnable barrier which sectarian bigotry and intriguing politicians have made, we would soon put an end to the divisions between the two sections of the country. The more association there is of members of the Free State with those of the North to discuss matters of common interest the sooner will we bring an end to this division that has separated us heretofore. I know, at any rate, that the late President Griffith and the late Michael Collins would certainly have supported the idea of such a conference. After all, even if the Boundary Commission operates, it will not bring that ideal of national unity in the full sense, because it will only deal with certain areas of territory which are in dispute, whether they should come into the Free State or remain under the Northern Parliament. After that is over there will still remain a matter that will require tact, confidence, and understanding between the two sections of the country in order to evolve that ideal unity of territory and civic interest which is the hope and the dream, I think, of every well-disposed citizen in the whole thirty-two counties. This, I do say, that while I commend the idea of this conference, I do not see where it is going to bring us in regard to the real, concrete, practical question which we are up against. Clause 12 must stand. The Boundary Commission must operate, and must operate equitably, or the Treaty has been violated, and who can say what will be the consequences if that transpires? We cannot afford to allow our rights under the Treaty, and established in Clause 12, to be diminished or altered in the slightest degree. We have stood by the Treaty at, as I have said, great cost in blood and treasure and national agony, and the price that has been paid for our honouring the Treaty has been too great to allow it to be violated now with our consent.

I welcome those conferences. I have raised this matter so that the President may put us in possession of some slight indication of what are the facts. The person representing this Government who goes into conference will thereby possibly have an indication of what is the mind of the people behind him in this matter. That will strengthen his attitude there. When he returns I hope he will return not with an accomplished fact to which we have been committed, but with proposals for our consideration, and we will decide upon them in the real interest of Ireland according to our judgment. There must be no prejudicing of Clause 12. There must be nothing done that will give credit to those pessimists who have told the people in the North that we had let them down. There must be nothing now or hereafter that will vindicate those pessimistic falsehoods. We have not let the people in the North down; we have not abandoned them. Clause 12 can be made not only their charter of liberty, but also can be made the instrument by which that artificial division can be broken, and by which ultimately the nation's unity can be restored on even a greater and nobler plane than that on which it existed before it was ever challenged.

Mr. BAXTER: Personally, I am very glad Deputy Milroy has raised this question. I feel sorry that it has not been raised long ago. I come from Deputy Milroy's constituency, and up there we feel and know what it means to be living along a hostile border.

It struck me when this question was raised, and when I saw the exodus of Deputies from this Dáil that many of the Southern, Midland and Western Deputies are not as interested in the North as they might be and should be, and perhaps it would be better if some Deputy from the parts of Ireland I mention should raise this question rather than that a Deputy from the North should be called upon to do it. Deputy Milroy says that there are feelings in the minds of the people in the North that they have been let down. I am afraid that no matter what effort is made to re-arrange the border that some people in the North will be let down. That is a fact we must recognise at the moment. We will be glad for a statement from the President on the question of the boundary re-arrangement. But there is one point in particular that I want to bring under his notice. I have been discussing it along with other Deputies in the constituency with the men engaged in the boundary work. We had occasion to bring under their notice that all along the border of my county for a distance of 42 miles it is not possible to cross into the North of Ireland. I wonder how would any of the Deputies from other constituencies feel here if for a distance of 42 miles along two counties they could not cross over into their neighbour's farm. We have no approved road in West Cavan from Swanlinbar up to the Monaghan border.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This question does not arise on the Boundary Commission. It is a question for the Revenue Commissioners.

Mr. BAXTER: I think it is a very important question for the Boundary Commission. I discussed it yesterday with men engaged in the Boundary Commission, and they pointed out it was work for the Boundary Commission.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy is not in order in raising this under the present motion.

Mr. BAXTER: I am sorry if I have transgressed. I am sorry this matter was not taken earlier. I had hoped to bring it under the notice of the President.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy has done so very successfully.

Mr. BAXTER: I do agree that the whole question of the differences separating North and South are not differences that can be composed by force of arms. We can never successfully agree on any matter if we have to fight to the death to find agreement. I agree with Deputy Milroy when he says that it is possible conferences may do good. I think if people are able to meet and discuss common problems there may be a possibility of an understanding being reached, and it would be good that they could meet in that spirit. But it is absolutely essential that the point of view of the people who stand for a united Ireland should be regarded at all times as the dominant thought in the minds of those who go from here to meet the men who live in the North-East corner. Those who live adjacent to the boundary know the troubles and [Mr. Baxter.] the hardships imposed by its existence. It is making matters very complicated for the traders, businessmen and farmers in that part of Ireland. It is of such serious moment to many of the people in my constituency that business in some of our towns is now not more than 40 per cent. of what it used to be. It is a very urgent matter for people in my county, and I do hope that if nothing can be done in the near future to have an agreement on this matter, an agreement that will be more satisfactory than the present state, that an effort will be made to have that Article of the Treaty complied with. There are many misgivings in the minds of the people up there that it is a dead letter, that the boundary is marked out at present and will remain where it is. Something has to be done to disprove that, and the people down here have to give an earnest of their sincerity, if there is sincerity in this matter. They have to show us that this Article of the Treaty is to be complied with, and I think the sooner they get a move on the better it will be for their reputation.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This matter must be concluded, technically, before 20 minutes past four, but at the very latest at 4.30, and the President must be given an opportunity to reply. That, after all, is the most important portion of this debate, the President's reply to the points raised by Deputy Milroy and Deputy Baxter. We cannot have several Deputies speaking, and we cannot have a debate.

Mr. DOHERTY: May I take it that I have five minutes?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No, two Deputies have risen, and I think the simplest thing would be to have the President's reply.

Mr. DAVIN: May I ask a question? I just want to give a short explanation of the reason why—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If the Deputy can put his question simply we will allow him.

Mr. DAVIN: The question I want the President to deal with in his reply concerns a statement made on the 13th of October by the Managing Director of the Belfast Parliament, as follows:—

“ They had schemes on foot to ease the situation with regard to the railways. The present railway system was not a good one. In the old days the railways worked their traffic from North to South, but in future there would be amalgamation, and they would be worked from West to East—”

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy is not in order. This is a different matter, and it must be raised separately.

Mr. DAVIN: I am asking this question now—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy must sit down, please. We will hear the President.

The PRESIDENT: Press references have been made to communications between the British Government and the Government of Saorstát Eireann. Any information which has been secured has not been furnished directly or indirectly by the Irish Government. There have been letters on this subject, some of which have been already published. There has not been agreement as to the date of further publication. There have been references in the Press to statements alleged to have been made by Sir James Craig, both on behalf of the Northern Government and of Ulster. Sir James has the right to speak on behalf of the Northern Government—as to Ulster he has not the right to speak. There are three Ulster counties out of nine in the area of the jurisdiction of the Irish Free State. Two, others have also unmistakably shown their determination to be included in the area of the jurisdiction of the Free State, that is five counties out of nine. As to the matter of a conference, let me say that there has been no question of a conference on the basis of the agreement of January, 1922, and there will be none. If there be a conference the Oireachtas is the final arbiter in matters dealt with by the Government at the conference. We have not been appointed by the Dáil as Plenipotentiaries in any conference which may be held. The persons appointed by the Dáil as plenipotentiaries to negotiate and conclude a Treaty with Great Britain were in a different position. They negotiated and concluded a Treaty. It has been ratified by both countries. Its terms are binding—it is the law. The Government have not the power, if they had the will, to alter the terms of this Treaty. If any proposal should be made for any further agreement such proposal must be submitted to the Oireachtas.

The Dáil adjourned at 4.15 p.m. until Wednesday, the 14th November.

CEISTEANNA.—QUESTIONS.

ORAL ANSWERS.

DUBLIN UNEMPLOYED.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the President if the Government have any scheme under consideration for the relief of the unemployed in the City of Dublin.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. E. Blythe) replying for The President: As has already been stated in the Dáil, the Government is considering measures for the relief of unemployment by stimulating work on the roads and on housing schemes, if it proves possible to carry out such work at a reasonable cost. The city of Dublin will have its share in any such arrangements as are made, but no special scheme limited to Dublin is in contemplation.

A BURNED WORKHOUSE.

PADRAIG O hOGAIN (An Clár) asked the Minister for Finance whether compensation has been awarded in respect of the burning of Seariff Workhouse, in Co. Clare, and to what amount; whether the rebuilding clause will operate in this award, and to what amount.

Mr. BLYTHE: No award has yet been received, but the case is at present under consideration.

DUTIABLE TRAFFIC AT GREENORE.

TOMAS MAC EOIN asked the Minister for Finance if he is aware that, owing to inadequate and unsatisfactory arrangements for dealing with dutiable traffic at Greenore—involving considerable delay and additional expense to traders—inward traffic is being diverted from Greenore to ports outside the Saorstát, where better Customs facilities are provided; whether the Saorstát Customs Authorities have received repeated representations on the matter from the London, Midland and Scottish Railway Company, and what steps, if any, he intends taking to remedy a state of affairs calculated to detrimentally affect the Port of Greenore, and which reflects unfavourably on the efficiency of Saorstát administration.

Mr. BLYTHE: Enquiries are being made into this matter, and I must ask the Deputy to postpone his question pending their completion.

Mr. JOHNSON: When would the Minister suggest I should put the question again?

Mr. BLYTHE: In about a week's time.

OLD AGE PENSIONS.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Finance if, before reducing the Old Age Pension allowance, he will appoint a Committee to consider the matter; whether the advantages to be gained by the reduction are not outweighed by the great hardship it will inflict on thousands of the deserving pensioners in the Free State.

Mr. BLYTHE: There is no occasion for having a Committee on this subject as the Government already have access to sufficient sources of information. The question involved is one of policy. It is a matter of imperative necessity to effect a substantial economy, but the Government in considering the draft of the Bill that will be required in this matter will have due regard to all proper representations calculated to be of assistance to the pensioners without prejudicing the efforts of the Government to find in this Service a fair contribution to the total saving of about four millions which the Public Services as a whole must provide.

CLEARING FACILITIES AT THE PORTS.

Mr. PATRICK W. SHAW asked the Minister for Finance if he is aware that dutiable goods at present being imported into the Saorstát are held up by the Customs officers at the various ports and railway stations, for periods of at least one month, and in many cases up to six months; whether, owing to the great inconvenience caused to traders and persons requiring such goods, proper clearing facilities will be afforded.

Mr. BLYTHE: I am not aware of any case in which dutiable goods have been held up by the Customs Authorities where accurate documents have been presented, but if the Deputy can supply me with particulars of any specific cases I will have enquiries made. I am not clear as to the facilities to which the Deputy refers in the second part of his question. The Customs Authorities are only responsible for the examination of goods and the collection of the proper duties; they are not responsible for providing facilities for the actual clearance of the goods.

Mr. P. W. SHAW: Arising out of the Minister's answer I would like to know whether the necessary declaration forms will be supplied to the Post Office for the use of the local Custom officers, as at the present time it takes at least a fortnight to obtain the forms, and this is the principal difficulty and delay in obtaining the goods.

Mr. BLYTHE: I will have attention given to that matter.

TAX ON DOMINION DIVIDENDS.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for Finance what rate of income tax is payable on dividends on investments in other Dominions, where income tax in the Dominion of origin has already been paid.

Mr. BLYTHE: Arrangements for relief from double taxation have not been effected except with Great Britain. A Saorstát resident receiving a dividend from an investment in a Dominion would, therefore, pay Saorstát tax at the full rate normally appropriate to his case on the nett amount of the dividend.

Vol. 5.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Arising out of that answer, may I ask whether any steps have been taken to make these arrangements for Canada, Australia and South Africa?

Mr. BLYTHE: The matter has been under consideration, but no definite steps have yet been taken.

INCOME TAX ARREARS.

Mr. PATRICK W. SHAW asked the Minister for Finance if, owing to the present serious financial position of traders and farmers in Ireland, reasonable facilities will be afforded to persons on whom demands for income tax arrears for past three years have been served; whether the amounts claimed may be paid by instalments, so that the present drastic steps of seizing on such person's property may only be exercised where the person is well known to be able but unwilling to pay.

Mr. BLYTHE: The Revenue Commissioners are always prepared to give full consideration to a request for payment by instalments in any case where payment of arrears of Income Tax in one sum would involve hardship. It must be understood, however, that it rests with the taxpayer to obtain this concession in the first instance before the question of enforcement of the tax arises. Where no concession has been obtained and compulsory measures have to be taken, the Revenue Commissioners cannot then consider any question of instalments.

INCOME TAX REFUNDS.

Mr. JOHN J. COLE asked the Minister for Finance if he will state approximately in how many cases to date residents in the Saorstát have had income tax deducted at the rate of 9/6 in the pound; whether immediate steps will be taken to expedite a refund of the amount overcharged, and what steps individuals should take in the matter.

Mr. BLYTHE: There are no official statistics available on this matter, but it may be taken that the number of cases in which income tax of 9s. 6d. in the £ has been deducted from dividends payable to residents in Saorstát Eireann is very small in proportion to the total number of dividends received in this country from outside. Residents in Saorstát Eireann can in nearly all cases avoid the deduction of income tax at a rate exceeding 5s. in the £ by completing certain prescribed forms which are obtainable from bankers or the British Inspector of Foreign Dividends, York House, Kingsway, London, W.C.2. Where owing to the non-completion of forms at the proper time, or otherwise, an excessive deduction of British income tax has been made repayment of such tax may be claimed from the British Chief Inspector of Taxes (Foreign Claims), Cecil Chambers, 86 Strand, London, W.C.2., who, it is understood, will make the necessary repayment with as little delay as possible. On this matter generally I would refer the Deputy to the reply given by me to Deputy Good on 31st ultimo.

REVENUE FROM PATENT MEDICINES.

TOMAS MacEOIN asked the Minister for Finance if he can state what is the annual value of patent medicines sold within Saorstát Eireann; whether any duty is payable thereon, and, if so, what is the amount of revenue derived from such duty; or if no duty is payable, whether an estimate has been made of the revenue that would be obtained if a duty equal to that now payable on patent medicines in Great Britain were imposed.

Mr. BLYTHE: The answer to the first part of the question is in the negative. The Patent Medicines Duty has never been levied in Ireland. The Act (the Medicines Stamp Act, 1802) under which the duty was last imposed was passed before the Irish and British Exchequers and taxing systems were unified following the Act of Union. The Medicines Duty was never extended to Ireland, and at the present moment the position is that patent medicines are dutiable in Great Britain but not in Northern Ireland or here. The answer to the second part of the question is that patent medicines are not liable to duty in the Saorstát. The answer to the third part of the question is that there is no information available at present as to the annual value or quantity of patent medicines sold in the Saorstát, and that in the absence of such information it is not possible to frame an estimate of the revenue that would be obtained from a duty on patent medicines.

WARDERS' SUBSISTENCE ALLOWANCE.

DOMHNALL O MUIRGHEASA (for Sean Buitleir) asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether a special subsistence allowance was sanctioned to prison officers who were compelled to quit Waterford Prison in August of last year, consequent on the prison being taken by the irregular forces; whether he is aware that payment of this allowance to temporary warders has been refused by the Prisons' Board, and, as the allowance is of a purely special and exceptional nature and not governed by any rate of subsistence allowance, and as the occasion was also exceptional, whether he will now see that the allowance is paid to the temporary warders concerned.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. P. Hogan) replying for Minister for Home Affairs: Certain prison officers were compelled to vacate their quarters in Waterford Prison in August, 1922, on the occasion of the occupation of that prison by Irregulars. Authority was given for the payment to the officers concerned of allowances based, for the first 14 days of absence, on the rates paid to officers detailed for temporary duty in other prisons, and based for the subsequent period of absence on the usual rates of lodging allowance appropriate to the various ranks. This authority did not extend to cover the cases of unmarried temporary warders. These officers hold their appointments on a daily tenure, and on the occasion referred to were exceptionally well treated in being retained in the service, instead of being paid off when the prison was evacuated by the Prison Authorities.

DESTRUCTION BY RABBITS.

SEAN O DUINNIN asked the Minister for Agriculture whether he is aware that rabbits, which have increased enormously in numbers during the past few years, have caused immense damage to crops throughout the country, including rape and potatoes, crops not hitherto touched by this prolific pest; whether he is aware that farmers are powerless to cope with this evil; whether he would consider the advisability of using demobilised soldiers during the breeding months next season to shoot down the rabbits, killing thereby the unborn young, which method has proved most effective in Australia; whether he would consider the advisability of appointing Inspectors of the Department to investigate and report on the destruction done by this pest and on the loss to farmers resulting therefrom.

Mr. HOGAN: I understand that during the last two years rabbits have become a serious pest and have done considerable damage to crops in some districts. I am informed that this was because rabbit warrens had not been systematically trapped, professional rabbit trappers being averse to carrying on their work in country districts owing to the disturbed conditions. For the same reason farmers have not been able to use guns, while farmers in many districts have reported that traps set by them have been stolen from their lands. In these circumstances, it can hardly be correctly said that traps, snares, and ferrets have not been effective in clearing away the rabbits. Enquiries have been made as to the methods used in other countries, more particularly in Australia, and those inquiries covered the use of poisons and of an apparatus for the fumigation of burrows, but the information obtained indicated that where the use of poison and fumigation had been successful the conditions were totally dissimilar to those obtaining in this country, and apart altogether from the dangers attending the use of poison, it was considered unlikely that good results would be obtained here from these methods. I have no information as to the value of guns as compared with poison but trapping, snaring, and ferreting are regarded in Ireland as the best means of destroying rabbits. It is not considered necessary to take steps to get cheap ammunition and to employ demobilised soldiers during the spring months of next season, because it is expected that, with the return of normal conditions, the trapping of rabbits on demesnes will be undertaken by owners or let to trappers as heretofore, that trapping by farmers will be again undertaken, and that as permits for the use of guns are being issued, farmers will be able to keep rabbits in check by shooting. It is felt that the putting into operation of all these measures will reduce the number of rabbits down to the point where the damage they will be able to do to crops will not be appreciable.

Where the circumstances warrant it, and the necessary information is given to the Department, the owners or occupiers of demesnes which are situated in proximity to cultivated lands will be approached with a view to making some arrangements for the systematic trapping of the rabbits thereon.

The suggestion in the last part of the question that proceedings for payment in lieu of rent, rates, etc., should not be taken against occupiers of holdings on which rabbits are numerous could not be considered.

DE CLIFFORD ESTATE, MAYO. QUESTION OF DIVISION.

Mr. MARTIN M. NALLY asked the Minister for Agriculture if he is aware that the De Clifford Estate, Mayo, taken over by the Congested Districts Board as far back as 1911, is still undivided, and that acute congestion exists in the townlands of Faecfield, Coolaghbawn, Acres and Derroul, among the tenants whose valuation does not exceed £5, and whether it is intended to provide economic holdings for those tenants out of the untenanted lands on the estate.

Mr. HOGAN: This Estate has not been divided owing to the want of suitable land for enlargements. There was no untenanted land on the Estate, except bog; but there are large areas,

[Mr. Hogan.] including non-residential and other tenanted holdings, within a distance of a few miles which it will be possible to acquire under the powers of the Land Act, 1923, for the relief of local congestion. When the Land Commission come to deal with the district they will consider how far it may be necessary to migrate some of the tenants in the acutely congested townlands named in the question.

WEEDS AND AGRICULTURAL SEEDS ACT IN MEATH.

Mr. DAVID HALL asked the Minister for Agriculture whether he is aware that a very large number of land owners in Meath, particularly in Dunshaughlin Rural District, failed to comply with the provisions of Part I. of the Weeds and Agricultural Seeds (Ireland) Act, 1909; whether any inspections were made of the lands in Meath for the purpose of ensuring the destruction of noxious weeds, and whether it is the intention of the Department of Agriculture to institute prosecutions against offenders.

Mr. HOGAN: Inspections were made of the lands in County Meath for the purpose of ensuring the destruction of noxious weeds, and from reports received I am aware that there were in this county 532 holdings on which noxious weeds were growing. In 273 of these the occupiers satisfied the Department's Inspectors that they would voluntarily destroy the weeds. In 259 cases notices under the Weeds and Agricultural Seeds (Ireland) Act, 1909, requiring the destruction of the weeds within a specified time, were served upon the occupiers, and 39 of these notices were issued in Dunshaughlin Rural District, which is specially referred to in the question. After a final inspection it was found that in only two cases in the county the occupiers had not destroyed the weeds or started on the work of destruction, and in these cases prosecutions are being instituted. One of the farmers to be prosecuted is in the Dunshaughlin Rural District.

BARONIALY GUARANTEED RAILWAYS.

Mr. JOHN J. COLE asked the Minister for Local Government if he will state how many baronially guaranteed railways have paid their dividends during the last two years; whether he will state in how many cases these companies were able to pay a dividend, or in how many instances the Baronial Guarantees have been received by companies who still decline to pay a dividend; whether, in view of the fact that many small holders are seriously affected by loss of dividends, he will impress on these companies the propriety of at once paying all dividends to date.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. Burke): This question should have been addressed to the Minister for Industry and Commerce.

MINISTER for INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE (Mr. J. McGrath): The Baronially Guaranteed Railway Companies, which are in arrear with the dividend on their Guaranteed Stock, are as follows:—

Cavan and Leitrim Railway.—The Guaranteed Dividends for the half-years ended 1st November, 1921, 1st May, 1922, and 1st November, 1922, have not been paid for the reason that the Baronial Contributions from the Leitrim County Council for these three half-years have not yet been received by the Company.

West Clare Railway.—The Guaranteed Dividend for the half-years ended 31st January, 1923, and 31st July, 1923, have not yet been paid. The last payment received by the Company from the guaranteeing areas was for the period ended 30th April, 1921.

South Clare Railway.—The Guaranteed Dividend for the half-years ended 31st January, 1922, 31st July, 1922, 31st January, 1923, and 31st July, 1923, have not yet been paid. The Dividend for the first of these periods will, I am informed, be paid during the course of this month. The last payment received by the Company from the guaranteeing areas was for the period ended 31st October, 1921.

Timoleague and Courtmacsherry Railway.—The Guaranteed Dividend for the half-year ended 30th June, 1923, has not yet been paid, but I am informed the contribution from the guaranteeing area has been passed for payment and the Dividend will be distributed at an early date.

It will be seen, therefore, that the non-payment by the Companies of the Baronially Guaranteed Dividend is attributable to the delay in recovering the contributions from the guaranteeing areas.

Mr. COLE: Is the Minister aware that every such railway in the Northern area has paid a dividend?

POST OFFICE STATISTICS.

MICHAEL O hIFEARNAIN asked the Postmaster-General: (a) What are the gross receipts of the Post Office service up to the last accounting date, from the 1st January, 1923; (b) what is the gross expenditure on the Post Office service from the 1st January, 1923, up to the last accounting date; (c) what is the gain or loss on the conduct of the Postal service up to the last accounting date, from the 1st January, 1923; (d) what are the rates of pay for the (1) Indoor Staff of the Post Office Service, (2) for the Outdoor Staff; (e) what are the duties of Rural Postmen in addition to the delivery of letters; (f) what is the average length of walk of each rural postman; (g) what was average length of walk in 1914.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Questions such as this, which ask for an elaborate return, should really be put down as a motion asking for a return. In this case, and until such arrangements are made, I would ask the Minister to give a copy of the answer to the Deputy and to have it circulated in the Official Report. The proper procedure is to move for a return.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. J. J. Walsh): I will have the reply circulated.

Reply:—1. (a), (b), and (c) It is not possible in the middle of the financial year to give an actual statement of Post Office accounts without much trouble and delay. There are many accounting transactions with other countries and with other departments. I fully reviewed the situation to the Dáil in June last when I indicated that expenditure in the Post Office during the present year would be considerably reduced. So far as I can ascertain from approximate figures, the financial position is working out as I forecasted.

(d) The main classes employed by the Post Office are Sorting Clerks and Telegraphists and Postmen. Their scales of pay vary according to the class of office at which the staff is employed. The highest scale obtains in Dublin, and the weekly rates, including cost of living bonus for Dublin, are:—

Sorting Clerks and Telegraphists (Males), 33s. 4d., rising to 101s.

Sorting Clerks and Telegraphists (Females), 33s. 4d., rising to 71s. 9d.

Postmen, 37s., rising to 71s. 9d.

And the lowest rates obtaining at the smaller provincial towns are:—

Sorting Clerks and Telegraphists (Males), 29s. 8d., rising to 84s. 3d.

Sorting Clerks and Telegraphists (Females), 29s. 8d., rising to 62s. 11d.

Postmen, 33s. 4d., rising to 62s. 11d.

(e) Rural Postmen are employed in the delivery of letters and parcels, in the collection of letters and parcels, and on some incidental duties thereto.

(f) The limits of travelling for rural postmen are fixed, and are, for a walking postman 18 miles a day, and for a cycling postman 26 to 28 miles a day. The duties are revised occasionally to see that these limits are worked up to as closely as possible but not exceeded.

(g) There has been no change in the regulation limits since 1914.

RESTRICTIONS ON USE OF CURRAGH ROADS.

Mr. JOHN CONLON asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that serious inconvenience is being caused to residents of districts adjoining the Curragh of Kildare, by the fact that main roads leading through or across the Camp are only allowed to be used by persons holding passes from the Military; and whether, in view of the peaceful state of the surrounding country and of the friendly relations existing between the people and the troops, the rule restricting the use of the roads in question to pass-holders might be suspended.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (Gen. Mulcahy): Vehicles and persons passing through the Camp by means of the public road do not now require passes. For the last three weeks all such are allowed to pass freely, the only inconvenience being that all such persons are escorted through by the military police, that is, as far as the public road. Only persons who wish to enter the Camp on business or to use Camp roads proper require passes. This procedure is deemed necessary for the present.

ARMY OFFICERS' PAY AND ALLOWANCES.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS asked the Minister for Defence if the scale of pay and allowances for the Army given in his answer of the 23rd of March still prevails, and, if not, what changes have been made. Further, to ask what pay and allowances are being made for all officers of higher rank than that of Major-General, whether such officers are paid by grade or by office; and, if by office, if he will state what pay is attached to each such office, the holders of these offices, and by whom the scale of payment was made.

General MULCAHY: The rates of pay and allowances for officers and men given in my reply to a question asked by the Deputy on the 23rd March last are still in operation, with the addition that extra pay has been allowed to certain officers employed in the technical services and lodging, fuel and light allowance have been fixed for single officers. The rates given in the reply referred to for officers not yet formally commissioned are gradually lapsing as such officers become gazetted or are demobilised.

Revised rates of pay and allowances for N.C.O.'s and men are, however, now about to be applied in cases of all future enlistments and re-attestations. A very large number of men are at present being offered re-attestation on the new terms. These rates and the current rates of pay and allowances for gazetted officers are set out in Defence Order No. 16, of which I am sending the Deputy a copy. I may say that that Order was largely reproduced in the public Press on the 12th October.

The pay of officers of rank higher than that of Major-General is fixed in respect of the offices they hold. These officers and their salaries are:—

General Sean MacMahon, Chief of Staff, £1,300 per annum.

Lieut.-General G. O'Sullivan, Adjt.-General, £1,100 per annum.

Lieut.-General Sean O'Murthuile, Quartermaster-General, £1,100 per annum.

In addition they receive free quarters and messing in barracks. The salaries were sanctioned by the Minister for Finance on my recommendation.

REQUISITIONED MOTOR LORRIES.

Capt. W. A. REDMOND asked the Minister for Defence when the owners of motor lorries are to be compensated for lorries requisitioned by the National Army, as a considerable number of owners have received no payment for the use of same or damage thereto.

General MULCAHY: A Committee appointed for the assessment of claims for compensation in respect of requisitioned motor vehicles is disposing of those claims as fast as possible, but many difficulties, due to the turmoil through which the country has passed and to the inflation of claims are being experienced in the establishment of facts.

Steps are now being taken to strengthen the personnel of the Committee and its staff, so that the very necessary investigations can be carried out on the spot, in the various districts. In that way it is confidently expected that practically all claims in respect of requisitioned vehicles will be disposed of by the end of the financial year.

Captain REDMOND: Might I ask the Minister whether I could have a list of the personnel?

General MULCAHY: Certainly; I will forward it to-day.

DISCHARGE OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS asked the Minister for Defence if any body has been created by him to lay down the lines to govern the discharge of officers from the Army; and if not, on whose recommendations these discharges are being made; and if such discharges are being made in such a manner as to retain only the most efficient and capable officers from a military point of view. Further, if he will state what provision, if any, is being made for officers who are being discharged.

General MULCAHY: The question of the demobilisation of officers surplus to requirements has been for some time under careful review by the Defence Council. This Council itself has laid down the lines governing the discharge of officers, and the case of each individual officer discharged is previously considered by the Council.

In making such discharges due regard is given to the necessity for retaining those officers capable of giving the most efficient and satisfactory service from the military point of view.

The number of officers to be dealt with under the Demobilisation Proposals is approximately 2,000. Apart from resignations they fall into three classes:—

- (1) Officers whose work has not been satisfactory.
- (2) Officers whose service dates from a date subsequent to July, 1921, and whose services, while satisfactory, have been such as not to show special merit or indicate special qualifications.
- (3) Officers whose service dates from a date prior to July, 1921, and who, while having given satisfaction, are surplus to requirements.

All officers' cases are considered on their history sheets and files. Officers of the No. 3 class have been grouped in order of efficiency, and demobilisations from this class are taken from the lower positions in such lists.

The financial provision made for demobilised officers is indicated in Defence Order No. 28 of the 15th of September, a copy of which is forwarded to the Deputy and which states that—

Such officers will be granted demobilisation pay as follows:—

- (a) For the first two months after demobilisation, full pay of rank (without allowances).

- (b) For the second two months after demobilisation, half pay of rank (without allowances).

In addition, a grant of Five Pounds (£5) will be made to each officer on his demobilisation to assist him to provide himself with civilian clothing.

It is thought necessary specially to consider the cases of officers coming into the third class, and it is anticipated that it may be desirable, in the case of some, at any rate, of those officers to make an additional grant based on:—

- (1) The nature of the services rendered in pre-Truce days by such officer.
- (2) The period over which these services extended.
- (3) The extent, resulting in loss, of the consequent upset in his ordinary course of life, and
- (4) Services subsequently rendered by the officer in the National Forces.

A Committee, consisting of three of the Senior General Officers Commanding, has been set up to consider the case of each officer of this class, and to make a recommendation in each case to the Minister.

A re-settlement branch has been set up in the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, for the purpose of re-settling officers and men in civil life. In addition, certain facilities will be granted in the matter of competition for Civil Service Examinations, and, at present, practically all temporary Civil Service male positions are retained for demobilised officers and men.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Will the Minister give any indication as to the facilities that will be accorded to such demobilised officers in the next Civil Service Examination?

General MULCAHY: That question had better be addressed to the Minister for Finance.

OUTSTANDING ARMY BILLS.

PADRAIG O HOGAIN (An Clár)

asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that many large bills are long outstanding by the Military to traders in Ennis, in respect of goods certified on delivery to be correct as to quality, price and quantity; whether deductions, varying from 2½ per cent. to 10 per cent., on payments made have his authority in respect of goods similarly certified, and if he will institute inquiries at once with a view to ensuring full and immediate settlement of these claims.

General MULCAHY: Bills certified correct as to quality, quantity and price have not been and are not being left unpaid in any district. Those received at Headquarters so certified are paid at once. The difficulty in dealing with old accounts is mainly one of certification, but so far as the Ennis district is concerned, most of the claims of this type have been paid off and there are now not many outstanding. If particular cases are brought to my notice, I shall see that attention is given to them at once.

In the case of goods not ordered under contract, it is usual to reduce the amounts claimed to a figure at which the same class of goods could have been bought in the district at the time they were supplied. The deductions vary in accordance with the amounts claimed, but the prices allowed are those at which goods of the same quality could have been purchased at the time in the district.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

BOY'S DEATH IN KILLALOE MILITARY BARRACKS.

PADRAIG O hOGAIN (An Clár) asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that a boy named Pierce Lewis was killed in the Military Barracks at Killaloe, on Sunday, the 16th September, 1923; whether the result of the investigations held on September 25th and on October 5th have yet been received by him; whether it is proposed to compensate the parents of the boy, and, if so, has the amount of compensation been yet determined.

General MULCAHY: I am aware of the occurrence and have received the findings of a court of inquiry. There is no legal liability attached to the military authorities to pay compensation. However, having regard to all the circumstances an ex gratia payment of £12 is being made to the parents of Pierce Lewis.

DETENTION OF MEATH PRISONERS.

Mr. DAVID HALL asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that John Clarke, James Caffrey and Patrick Matthews, Wilkinstown, Navan, Co. Meath, were arrested in Trim on the 25th February, 1923, and are at present detained in Dundalk; whether any charge has been preferred against them, and whether it is intended to have them brought to trial or released.

General MULCAHY: John Clarke, James Caffrey and Patrick Matthews were arrested by the military authorities on 25th February, 1923, on charge of being members of a party which carried out a raid on the business premises of Mr. Tiernan, Wilkinstown, Navan, on 24th December, 1922, and stole money and goods therefrom. The charge was investigated by military tribunal on 11th July, 1923. The prisoners were found guilty and have been sentenced to two years' imprisonment with hard labour. They have not yet, however, been removed to jail for convicted prisoners, but are detained in an ordinary place of internment.

OUTSTANDING ARMY CLAIMS.

Mr. PATRICK J. EGAN asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that Mrs. Annie Flynn, Grogan, Ballycumber, Offaly, has claims outstanding since April, May and June, 1921, to the amounts of £10 17s 5d., £20 18s. 7d. and £8 9s. 6d., respectively, for goods supplied to the Military Authorities, which claims have been certified correct by the Commandant at the time and handed to the Claims Office, Custume Barracks, Athlone; furthermore, that these were forwarded to the Claims Department, M. Block, Portobello Barracks, about last March, and that Mrs. Flynn was informed by that Department, on the 17th April last, that same would be paid her in a fortnight, and, as she has heard nothing about the matter since, whether he can give an undertaking that she will be paid in the near future.

General MULCAHY: The claims in question relate to a period prior to the Truce. The position at that time was that responsibility for discharging any liabilities incurred rested on local Volunteer authorities. Claims of the period cannot be paid out of funds voted by the Dáil for the maintenance of the Army. The general question as to what extent and from what funds any of those claims may be settled has yet to get consideration. Pending a decision Mrs. Flynn's claims cannot be given further consideration.

AMENDMENT OF LAND ACT, 1923.

TOMAS MAC EOIN asked the Minister for Agriculture whether his attention has been called to the statement made by the Minister for Finance respecting the financial position of the State, and whether, in view of his demand for a curtailment of public expenditure, it is proposed to introduce a Bill to amend the Land Act of 1923, in so far as it provides for the payment by the State to the landlords of 10 per cent. of the purchase price of land.

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy is under a misapprehension as to the facts. There is no question of payment of vendors in cash. They are paid in bonds. The purchase money of an average tenancy was fixed at fifteen years' purchase of the rent. In the normal course the purchaser pays the purchase money, and under the terms of the Land Act would pay $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on any money lent to him by the State for this purpose. Under previous Land Acts the tenant's payment was either $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. or $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. on the purchase money. The increase in the rates of interest was due to the European War. In order to relieve the tenant from this increase in the rate of interest, I suggested, and the Dáil agreed, to pay the interest and sinking fund on one-eleventh of the purchase money. Provisions to effect this were inserted in the Land Act of 1923, and I do not propose to introduce a Bill to alter these provisions. The total amount which the State will have to find for this purpose, when land purchase under the 1923 Act is completed, will be about £60,000 per annum.

TELEPHONE FACILITIES AT KILCOCK, CO. KILDARE.

SEOIRSE DE BHULBH asked the Postmaster-General if he will establish a telephone call office at Kilcock, Co. Kildare, as the traders and residents have long felt the want of such a service.

Mr. WALSH: I am having enquiry made as to whether the opening of a telephone call office at Kilcock would be warranted and will communicate the result to the Deputy.

POSTAL FACILITIES IN DUN LAOGHAIRE & DALKEY.

Major BRYAN R. COOPER asked the Postmaster-General whether the Saturday afternoon delivery of letters in Dun Laoghaire has been restored, and whether he is prepared to restore a similar delivery in Dalkey, Co. Dublin.

Mr. WALSH: In response to representations from the local Urban District Council, the Saturday evening delivery of letters was restored at Dun Laoghaire on the 29th September last. As regards Dalkey, the local Council consented some years ago to the discontinuance of the Saturday evening delivery in order that the postmen might have a part holiday. No application for the restoration of this delivery has been received from the local authorities, but if such an application were made, I would be prepared to grant the desired facilities, but this would, of course, involve the cessation of the postmen's part holiday.

INSPECTORS OF TAXES.

Mr. JOHN J. COLE asked the Minister for Finance if he will state what is the number of Inspectors of Taxes employed in Saorstát Éireann on 31st October, 1922 and 1923; whether he will also give the total of staffs employed in this Department on the two dates already stated, with the approximate cost involved.

Mr. BLYTHE: The figures representing the numbers and cost of the staffs of the Taxes Inspectorate on the dates mentioned are:—

	31st Oct., 1922.	31st Oct., 1923.
Inspectors and Assistant Inspectors ...	45	46
Including 10 officers on loan.
Clerical Staff ...	278	297
Including 6 officers on loan.
Approximate total cost of Inspectors and their staffs ...	£80,100	£81,750

The small increase in the cost of the Inspectorate staffs on 31st October, 1923, over the figure for 31st October, 1922, represents the cost of taking over that portion of the work of the Chief Inspector of Taxes, London, which covered taxes administration in the Free State area before 1st April, 1923.

RAILWAY PROTECTION CORPS—DEPENDENTS' CLAIMS.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that £1 10s. (One Pound Ten Shillings) is due to the dependents of the Class I. men of the late Railway Protection, Repair and Maintenance Corps, now serving in the Army Corps of Engineers, and whether he will cause same to be paid.

General MULCAHY: The Class I. men of the late Railway Protection, Repair and Maintenance Corps, now serving in the Army Corps of Engineers, were paid at a flat rate and were not entitled to Dependents' Allowance. An arrangement was, however, made whereby a man would allot the whole or any portion of his weekly pay to his dependents, the Paymaster undertaking to forward the money allotted in accordance with the man's instructions. The payments were arranged so that a man had always one week's money due to him. The re-attestation of the Army Corps of Engineers has now begun, and as each man is re-attested or demobilised his account will be cleared to date.

RAILWAY PROTECTION CORPS—CLAIM FOR SUNDAY PAY.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Defence when the pay for Sunday work performed by Class I. men, non-railway workers, who were, and are still, paid on a six days basis and agreement, of the late Railway, Protection, Repair, and Maintenance Corps, and now in the Army Corps of Engineers, will be paid.

General MULCAHY: When Class I. men (i.e., railwaymen and other personnel coming under this heading) of the late Railway Protection, Repair, and Maintenance Corps were attested it was proposed to deduct 15s. per week from their pay to cover rations. Subsequently the question of Sunday pay and overtime was raised. It was decided after agreement with the men that instead of deducting 15s. per week in respect of rations this amount would be paid by way of set-off to the claim for Sunday pay and overtime. This arrangement still holds good in the cases of men who are still serving and who are being employed in the Corps of Engineers. On their re-attestation in that Corps which is now proceeding they will be paid on a scale based on daily rate for the seven days of the week.

RAILWAY PROTECTION CORPS—QUESTION OF READJUSTMENT OF PAY.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that men of the late Railway Protection, Repair and Maintenance Corps, transferred to the Army Corps of Engineers, as far back as July last, are still being paid on the former Corps rates of pay, and whether he will cause the pay, and proficiency pay, to be adjusted in accordance with the Scale laid down for the remainder of the Army, from date of transfer.

General MULCAHY: The men of the late Railway Protection Repair and Maintenance Corps were transferred to the Army Corps of Engineers on 1st September last. They are still paid at the old rate of pay, in accordance with the terms of their attestation. On re-attestation they will, however, be brought on the rates of pay proper to the Army Corps of Engineers.

DOCTOR'S MOTOR CAR COM- MANDEERED.

Captain W. A. REDMOND asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that a Ford motor car, the property of Cornelius Molan, M.D., District Medical Officer, Ballynoe and Conna Dispensary, Fermoy, was commandeered by the National Army on 20th October, 1922; that he has made several applications for it; that he was told to call to Mícheál Barracks, Cork, and bring a motor engineer to examine car and be prepared to take back same; that he called there and found no trace of his car, and that it has not yet been returned to him, nor has he been compensated for its loss, and what steps, if any, shall be taken in the matter.

General MULCAHY: Dr. Molan was requested, on the 14th August last, to visit Mícheál Barracks, Cork, for the purpose of taking delivery of a car believed to be his. On calling, however, he could not give any particulars which would identify the car, and consequently it was not given to him. On the 31st ultimo his solicitors were requested to furnish the required particulars, but they have not yet replied. The case cannot be properly dealt with until Dr. Molan supplies the particulars referred to.

DEPENDENT'S ALLOWANCE.

Captain W. A. REDMOND asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that Private Timothy Martin (47076), Band, 10th Inf. Bn., Mícheál Barracks, Cork, joined the National Army at Cork on the 15th November, 1922; that he has made repeated enquiries for a dependence allowance for his mother, Mrs. Jane Martin, of 14 Mary Street, Cork; that he filled up forms, and when he went to Portobello Barracks, Dublin, was informed that an allowance of 14/- per week had been authorised to be paid to his mother on the 14th August, 1923; and that, up to the present, Mrs. Martin has not received any allowance; and if he will take immediate steps to secure the payment of this allowance.

General MULCAHY: Private Timothy Martin, who attested on the 15th

November, 1922, made application for dependent's allowance for his mother, Mrs. Jane Martin, 14 Mary Street, Cork. The claim was passed for payment at the rate of 14/- per week. The final instalment of arrears was paid on the 30th ultimo, clearing the account up to the date of Private Martin's discharge from the Army.

PRISONS BOARD AND PAYMENT OF OVERTIME.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether the General Prisons Board is acting in accordance with Circular 7,398, dated the 3rd September, 1920 (Pars. 2 and 3), in refusing to pay for overtime in cash and substituting time off in lieu; if he is aware that overtime, as per pars. referred to, was paid for in cash by the British Government and also by the Free State Government up to March of this year, when it was stopped by order of the Prisons Board; (2) whether the Prisons Board is acting in accordance with the Board's Circular 8088, dated 13th November, 1919, in refusing to pay the sleeping-in allowance to married Principal Warders; if he is aware that this allowance was granted by the British Treasury, as one of the details of a scheme of assimilation with the English Prisons Service, sanctioned by the Treasury, and was paid up to the signing of the Treaty; (3) whether the Prisons Board is refusing to allow superior officers, separated from their families, a free railway warrant every two months; whether this concession was granted on the same ground as No. 2 above.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS

(Mr. K. O'Higgins): (1) The practice of the General Prisons Board in dealing with claims for overtime worked by Prison Warders has not been altered since the transfer of Government. When overtime is worked on escort or other special duty, payment is made in respect thereof unless time off in lieu is allowed. In former years it was more difficult to arrange for the grant of equivalent leave than it is at present, but such equivalent leave was always granted when possible. This practice will continue to be followed.

[Minister for Home Affairs.]

(2) The General Prisons Board have no authority to pay "sleeping-in" allowance to officers other than those of the warder class who were appointed prior to June, 1922, and no extension of this authority will be made. Where prison officers are required to reside in prisons, with free quarters, there is no reasonable ground for the payment of additional remuneration because of their residence in the prisons.

(3) The privilege of a free railway ticket every two months to enable married officers separated from their families to visit their homes has been granted to subordinate officers only. The General Prisons Board have no authority to extend this concession to superior officers, and I am not prepared to recommend to the Minister for Finance that any such extension should be authorised.

MULLINGAR COURTHOUSE.

Mr. P. W. SHAW asked the Minister for Home Affairs if he is aware that considerable public inconvenience is caused by the Courthouse, Mullingar, being utilized as a Gárda Síochána Barracks; that it is most uncomfortable and unsuitable for such purpose, and does not contain sufficient accommodation; whether, under the circumstances, he will have the Police Barracks, Mullingar, which was partially burned down, repaired, and which will provide suitable premises for the Headquarters of this body, and also give very much needed employment in the town.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The occupation of the Courthouse at Mullingar by the Gárda Síochána is merely a temporary arrangement, and the accommodation therein is not satisfactory. The question of reconstructing the old Royal Irish Constabulary Barracks is receiving the consideration of the Commissioners of Public Works, and it is hoped that a decision in the matter may be arrived at shortly.

PRIVATE NOTICE QUESTION. HOUSES FOR IRISH EX-SERVICE MEN.

Captain REDMOND: I desire to ask the President a question of which I have given him private notice: Whether certain sums of money have been provided by the Imperial Parliament for the erection of houses in Ireland; whether a Trust has been set up to consist of a nominee of the Free State Government, a nominee of the Imperial Government and a nominee of the Six County Government, to allocate and administer the same; whether the Free State and Six County Governments have made their respective nominations; whether the Imperial Government has yet done so, and, if not, whether, in view of the fact that schemes are already prepared in various parts of the country, and in view of the delay liable to be caused by the coming General Election in England, he will make immediate representations to the Imperial Government to nominate their Trust representative and thereby avoid any unnecessary delay in providing these houses for Irishmen and work for our unemployed.

The PRESIDENT: Under Section 3 of the Irish Free State (Consequential Provisions) Act, 1922, a sum not exceeding £1,500,000 has been allocated for the purpose of providing in Ireland cottages for the accommodation of ex-Service men. This Fund will be administered by a body to be known as the Irish Sailors' and Soldiers' Land Trust, which will consist of five members, of whom three are to be appointed by the British Government and one each by the Governments of the Free State and Northern Ireland.

Our representative has already been selected and representations have been made to the British Government to have the completion of the Trust expedited. It is understood that steps are at present being taken for the appointment of the remaining representatives, and it is expected that the personnel of the Trust will be completed very shortly.

Captain REDMOND: In view of the pending dissolution of the British Parliament, may I ask if the President would consider the advisability of making further representations now?

The PRESIDENT: I have no reason to anticipate that any delay will be caused by the forthcoming General Election, and we have already made a sufficient number of representations to warrant all the attention that can be given to the subject.

CIRCULATION OF ORDERS.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Before we proceed with the Orders of the day, might I draw the attention of the President to the promise he gave, and which the hurry of the times no doubt caused to slip from his memory, to have circulated to Deputies the orders of the British Government for the transfer of services to the Provisional Government. They were circulated to members of the British Parliament, and the President, on my invitation, promised to circulate them to Deputies in this Dáil. I repeat the question now because one or two matters in them may prove to be pertinent to the Ministers and Secretaries' Bill when we come to that.

The PRESIDENT: As far as I know, there is only the one Order, and I understood that had been circulated, but I will look into the matter and see that it is circulated.

FISHERIES BILL, 1923—(FIRST STAGE).

FIONÁN Ó LOINGSIGH (Aire um Iasgach): Iarraim-se ead ón Dáil an Bhille Iasgaigh seo do thabhairt isteach.

Sé mo thuairim ná beidh aon dul i gceoinnibh na Bhille seo, mar sé an fáth gur thugas isteach é ná gur iarradh orm ó gach áird sa tír é do dheunamh.

I beg to move for leave to introduce "A Bill to amend the law relating to fisheries by prescribing new penalties for certain offences in relation to salmon, trout and other fisheries and for other purposes relating to the preservation of fisheries of Saorstát Éireann."

The purpose of the Bill is to increase the penalty imposed by the existing Fishery Acts for offences committed during the annual close season for salmon, trout and fresh water fish, and also for certain fishery offences, notably the use of explosives, committed at any period during the year. I feel that this will be more or less non-contentious, because I have brought it in at the request of many Deputies from among the different parties in the Dáil.

The Bill is urgent in the sense that the close season is now in, and I am anxious that its provisions should become effective as soon as possible.

Question: "That leave be granted for the introduction of the Fisheries Bill, 1923," put and agreed to.

Second Stage: Ordered for Wednesday, 21st November, 1923.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ELECTORS' REGISTRATION BILL, 1923—(FIRST STAGE).

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. J. Burke): I beg to move for leave to introduce "A Bill to amend the law relating to the preparation of the Register of Local Government Electors, and for other purposes relating to Registration of such Electors."

I believe this will be a non-contentious Bill, and that it is not necessary for me to say anything on it at this stage.

Mr. JOHNSON: Can the Minister tell us something about it or what it purports? We do not know whether it is non-contentious, because we have had no information about it of any kind.

Mr. BURKE: Before the passing of the Electoral Act, 1923, the principal enactment in force relating to all franchise was the Representation of the People Act, 1918. That Act both prescribed franchises and fixed the dates for compiling the electors' lists and registers. Both Parliamentary and Local Government franchises were determined by reference to residence or occupation of premises for a period of six months ending on the 15th day of July. All persons so qualified were to appear on a register which was to come into force on the 15th day of October. During the life of the Provisional Parliament, there was no opportunity for drafting a measure so intricate as the Electoral Act, and that Parliament, by resolution of the 12th September, 1922, directed the preparation of a register according to the law then enforced, but the principle of adult suffrage was applied to the Parliamentary franchise in accordance with the Constitution. The 15th October, 1922, was substituted for the 15th July (the date in the Act of 1918), and the other stages were to be fixed by order of the Minister for Local Government. The Local Government franchise, which is on the basis of occupation, was in no way effective. These resolutions were subsequently confirmed in the Electoral Act which formally enacted the Constitutional Dáil and Seanad franchises, and fixed the 15th November as the qualifying date for those franchises. Nothing in the Act of 1923 dealt with either Local Government franchise or Local Government registers, and all the provisions of the Representation of the People Act, 1918, were expressly left un repealed. According to the letter of the law, a register should, therefore, have been prepared of all persons who were qualified to be Local Government electors on the 15th July last, but on that date the register prepared under the resolution of the Provisional Parliament, above referred to, had not yet been completed. Experience has shown here, and elsewhere, that a register cannot be prepared in the short prescribed period, 15th July-15th October. Six and a half months are allowed by the Electoral Act. Furthermore, the Parliamentary and Local Government electors have always been noted on the same register. The new register, which, under the Electoral Act, will be commenced at once, will show Dáil, Seanad and Local Government electors; a person who is qualified for each franchise will have three distinguishing letters opposite his name in the register, e.g., S.R.O.

S=Seanad Franchise.

R=Residence Qualification
"Dáil."

O=Occupation (Local Government).

If the registers of Dáil, Seanad and Local Government electors are not prepared at the same time, and do not appear in the same document, there would be a heavy needless expenditure of money both in payment to officials for double work and travelling and in double printing. The present Bill, therefore, proposes to adapt the dates and machinery of the Electoral Act to the preparation of a Local Government register, but it does not in any way alter the existing provisions of the Representation of the People Act which prescribes Local Government franchise. The Bill does not deal with franchise in any way. It is merely a question of combining the Local Government register with the ordinary Parliamentary register, and is merely an economy measure.

Question—"That leave be granted for the introduction of the Local Government Electors Registration Bill, 1923"—put and agreed to.

Second Reading ordered for Wednesday, 21st November, 1922.

LOCAL ELECTIONS POSTPONE- MENT (AMENDMENT) BILL, 1923.—FIRST STAGE.

Mr. BURKE: I beg to move for leave to introduce "A Bill to amend the Local Elections Postponement Act, 1922."

This Bill enacts as follows:—"The Local Elections Postponement Act, 1922, shall be and is hereby amended by the substitution of the words and figures '30th day of September' for the words and figures '1st day of January' where the last mentioned words and figures occur in Sub-section (1) of Section 1, and Sub-section (1) of Section 2 of the Act aforesaid. This Act may be referred to as 'the Local Elections Postponement (Amendment) Act, 1923,' and this Act and the Local Elections Postponement Act, 1922, may be cited together as the Local Elections Postponement Acts, 1922 and 1923."

This Bill will amend the original Elections Postponement Act of 1923 in the following way:—"In Sub-section (1) of Section 1, instead of reading thus: 'Every statutory election of councillors of boroughs, councillors of urban districts, and commissioners of towns which, but for this Act, would be held within twelve months after the passing of this Act, shall be postponed until such date not being later than the 1st day of January, 1924, as the Minister shall by Order prescribe,' it shall read as follows: 'Every statutory election of councillors of boroughs, councillors of urban districts, and commissioners of towns, which, but for this Act, would be held within 12 months after the passing of this Act, shall be postponed until such date, not being later than the 30th day of September, 1924."

I do not think I can make it any clearer than that.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Can the Minister make it clearer as to the date when it is proposed to take these elections? They have been postponed repeatedly, and it does not make for efficiency of administration to have Councils working for any period under sentence of death. I do not want to tie the Government to an exact date, but if the Minister could give us an approximate time, and if he could say whether the month would be March or April I think it would be well.

Mr. WILSON: What is the exact reason for postponing the elections in this case? As there is not to be any alteration of the Register, why should they not be held immediately? The franchise to be used is the same, and why not go on now with the elections?

The PRESIDENT: The Minister for Local Government is only a short time in office, and it is rather difficult for him to make up his mind on a matter of great public importance which will affect the internal Government of this country for three or four years. The Minister ought to be allowed some opportunity of surveying the whole field of Local Government to see if any amendment of the law as it at present stands is advisable. If on an examination he finds that the present Register is not a correct Register steps will be taken to see that the next Register is an exact one, and that it will represent what it is intended to represent, namely, people qualified to vote, and consisting only of those qualified to vote. I do not think it is altogether fair to press the Minister for an exact answer to questions of this sort until he has had ample opportunity of examining the question in all its phases, remembering that the internal government of the country is only secondary in its importance to the ordinary administration we are discharging here, and when he has had an opportunity of surveying the whole field, I presume he will bring his proposal for any decision he may wish to take before the whole Dáil, and he will take the Dáil into his confidence with a view to remedying, should it be considered necessary, the existing state of affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON: Will it be possible to get any promise as to when a definite answer may be given as to the date of the elections, and, further, will it be possible to say whether all the local elections are likely to take place at the same time? Councils are not likely to be efficient—and they are blamed for inefficiency—while the threat of dissolution is hanging over their heads.

The PRESIDENT: These Councils have outrun their lives for a period of from six to nine months. Now, it has been put to the Ministry for some years past that it is not desirable to hold elections in the winter, and I believe the Minister for Local Government has that in his mind, and I believe he will be in a position to acquaint the Dáil with the date of the elections when we resume in the New Year. I do not think it would be reasonable to expect an answer in a shorter time.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: There is one question the Minister might reasonably answer and which was not suggested until the President himself had spoken. Do I understand his words correctly to mean that he proposes the local elections will not be held upon the present Register, but that a new Register will have to be completed before further local elections are held? That would mean a long postponement, and if there is to be a postponement quite so distant as that surely we ought to have it in a clearer form, than in the inferential form the President put it before us. Surely we ought to know whether the elections, if postponed, are to be held on the present Register, or if there is to be a new Register or a more complete Register, before the elections are held.

Mr. CORISH: Are we to infer from the President's statement that the ordinary elections that would be held in January next are to be postponed?

The PRESIDENT: Yes.

Mr. BLYTHE: There is one point that I would like to make in connection with this. It is to the effect that it would be, to my mind, very detrimental to the interests of the country to have local elections until the rates situation has been pretty well cleared up. There were counties in which rates were very much outstanding when the last Order was issued postponing the local elections. If any attempt had been made to hold elections while those rates were outstanding it would be utterly impossible to get public bodies elected in those areas that would have done their duty in any sort of decent way. There are places in which County Councils have been replaced by Commissioners, because of failure to do their duty. Until the whole situation is made clear, and the rate collections brought up to date, to hold elections in those places would simply be inviting the return of Councils that would immediately have to be dissolved. In County Leitrim, for instance, there was, before the General Election, a rate collection going on, at the rate of £5,000 or £6,000 a week. When the General Election was announced the rate collection stopped; practically, or it fell to £40 or £50 a week. People stopped paying arrears until they saw they could not escape. When the election was over, these payments were resumed. Any notion that a local election was pending in such areas would stop the collection of rates. They would hope that there would be new Councils elected, which would enable them to escape for some time further. Whatever other considerations are involved, the clearing up of the rate situation is a necessary one before local elections can be held.

[Mr. Blythe.]

Mr. CORISH: Is the Government going to give any help to the local Councils to get in the rates?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is a different question altogether.

Mr. CORISH: I do not think it is. It has an important bearing on what we are discussing.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: When the Minister is surveying the field or area, can he give us any information as to what he proposes to do with the unrepresentative Councils the people are so loudly crying out against? Is it proposed to leave them in office until the election?

Mr. P. HOGAN (Minister for Agriculture): Is this in order?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Surely not.

Mr. GOREY: I would like to ask the Minister for Local Government would he consider the advisability of appointing Commissioners to replace Councils that have shown gross maladministration and gross extravagance in public affairs, as the rate demands show. It is a gross scandal in some parts of the country. I will name some of the counties to make it clear.

Mr. BURKE: I think we have appointed Commissioners in several counties already. This is not a question that should be answered at this stage at all.

Question: "That leave be given to introduce the Local Elections Postponement (Amendment) Bill, 1923," put and agreed to.

Second Stage ordered for Wednesday, the 21st instant.

GAMING BILL, 1923.—FIRST STAGE.

Mr. HOGAN (Minister for Agriculture): I am asking the leave of the Dáil to introduce this Bill. I am doing so on behalf of Deputy O'Higgins. It raises a less serious issue than we have been discussing. The Bill is to repeal Section 2 of the Gaming Act, 1835. The effect of Section 2 of that Act was to enable any person who had paid money in consideration of a gaming transaction to, let us say, a bookmaker, to sue for a refund, or to enable a bookmaker to sue for a refund of any money which he had paid in respect of losses. That is the law in Ireland. It is not the law in any other country. As a matter of practice, both parties got over it by ignoring it, and as a rule no cases came into court. The matter became really serious when either party died, because an executor was compelled to sue. An executor has no discretion. You had cases where executors were suing in consideration of gaming transactions for money that had been paid four or five years previously. I think you also had cases where executors of bookmakers were suing for losses which the bookmaker had paid by cheque or bill. These actions only arise where money is paid by bill, cheque, or mortgage. This is not the law in any other country. The present position is obviously impossible, if we are to allow betting transactions to take place. This Act is merely to amend the law in that respect. In case there should be any misunderstanding, I want to explain that this Bill which we are introducing, does not amend the Gaming Act, so as to enable a bookmaker to sue for a debt. The old law remains, and a man may still plead the Gaming Act.

Question—"That leave be given to introduce the Bill"—put and agreed to.

Mr. GOREY: I object, except the Minister will go the whole hog and legalise bookmaking.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I am afraid the Deputy is late.

Second Stage ordered for Wednesday, 21st instant.

PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE.— REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This report has been circulated to Deputies.

PADRAIG O MAILLE: A Chinn Comhairle, Isé mo thuairim go mb'fearr an tuarasgabháil seo a chur ar ath-ló—go dtí Dia hAoine—i dtreo go m'beidh faill ag na Teachtaí leas-rúin a thabhairt os comhair na Dála, ma tá gádh leo. Ba mhaith liom-sa leas-rún a chur isteach chun go m-beidh sé ceadaigh d'aoinne fógra a thabhairt 'san seisiún seo i mí na Nodlag agus i mí an Eanáir in ionad Deireadh Fómhair agus Samhain mar tá sé ins an tuarasgabháil fa lathair. B'feidir go mbeidh gádh le athrúighthe cile annso agus annsúd acht ba mhaith liom-sa an t-athrú sin a dheanamh ar a laighead.

I think it would be better if the introduction of this report were postponed until Friday next, so that Deputies would have an opportunity of bringing forward amendments. There is one necessary amendment which I would like to propose to the Standing Orders relating to Private Bills—that is, that during the current Session the promoters of any Private Bill may publish the notices of intention required by Standing Orders during the months of December and January, instead of October and November, and that the dates for deposits of plans and documents, notice of the deposit of copies of the Bill, and objections against the Bill shall be correspondingly altered. It is necessary to make those changes in order that promoters of Bills may have an opportunity of having their Bills dealt with in the present Session. It may also be necessary to have the Orders amended, so that Private Bills can be initiated in the Dáil as well as in the Seanad. Therefore, I think it would be well if the introduction of this report were left over until Friday next. I propose that this be done.

Mr. P. HUGHES: I beg to second that.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: There is only one matter of order which I desire to ask you about, a Chinn Comhairle. According to the papers that have been distributed to us, it would appear that a draft identical with this draft of the proposed standing Orders, is before the Seanad, and that certain amendments are to be moved in the Seanad. If the same draft is before the two Houses of the Oireachtas at the same time, and if different amendments are moved, it may lead to a little complexity later on. But what I was going to suggest was that some consultation should take place with a view to arranging that the draft should be initiated in one House and sent up to the other. Otherwise, we will have reached a stage when we perhaps will be submitting amendments to the Seanad at the very moment that we may be considering amendments which the Seanad have passed and sent on to us.

Major COOPER: Is it not the case that the Seanad are taking up these draft Standing Orders this afternoon? I gather that they expect to dispose of them this afternoon, and I suggest that if we adopt the Leas-Cheann Comhairle's suggestion and postpone consideration of this matter until Friday.

[Major Cooper.]

day, we would have the Seanad amendments before us and could accommodate our draft to them.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: That is more or less what I was trying to achieve—that when we do consider this matter on Friday we will have the present draft before us, with the amendments and the full consideration of the Seanad.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That might be a good method but it struck me that, possibly, we would 4 o'clock. send back the Report to the Joint Committee and ask them to reconsider certain orders, in the light of particular amendments desired by the Dáil. If the same procedure were adopted in the Seanad, then the Joint Committee would have before it amendments from both Houses and would be able to submit a joint report which would possibly bring us an agreed set of Standing Orders more readily than if we were to treat this report as a Bill and send it backwards and forward.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I agree.

Consideration of Report ordered for Friday, 16th November.

MINISTERS AND SECRETARIES BILL, 1923.—SECOND STAGE POSTPONED.

The PRESIDENT: I understand that there was a general desire expressed on the last day, when the Governor-General's speech was under discussion, that an early opportunity should be afforded to the Dáil of dealing with the address, with particular reference to the statement made by the Minister for Finance. If the Dáil desires to take up the discussion of the Governor-General's address now, I would agree to postpone this Bill until to-morrow or, if it were so desired, even until Friday—though I would prefer that the Dáil would take it to-morrow. With your permission, A Chinn Chomhairle, I would ask for an expression of opinion from Deputies as to what their view is. There was a general desire evinced last day that an opportunity should be afforded of discussing the statement of the Minister for Finance.

Mr. JOHNSON: I rather gathered that there would be considerable discussion on this Bill, and, so far as I am concerned, I agree that it would be better to postpone it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Until to-morrow or Friday?

Mr. JOHNSON: Until Friday.

Mr. GOREY: We only got this Bill this morning, and we have not had time to consider it. I think to-morrow would be too soon to take it up. We do not like to have Bills flung at us like this. To-morrow or next day would be too soon for discussion of this Bill. A Bill of this importance ought to get some consideration from Deputies, and they should have some opportunity of making up their minds about it. They would not have that opportunity if the Bill were taken to-morrow or next day, or this week at all. I would ask the President to postpone the consideration of this Bill until some day next week.

The PRESIDENT: In that connection, I should point out that the discussion of the Bill would only be on the Second Reading, and would be a general discussion. The real business takes place on the Committee Stage. I would be agreeable to have this Bill taken up on Friday. As the Deputy knows, we have not got many Bills close up to Committee Stage, and it is with a view to providing work for the Dáil that I would like to have this Bill taken this week, if at all possible. The Bills which we introduced to-day will not occupy very much time, and I would like to be able to get a Third Reading of this Bill towards the end of next week. That would be possible if you took up consideration of it on Friday.

Mr. GOREY: In that case, we will be agreeable to Friday.

Order for Second Reading on 14th November discharged, and Second Reading ordered for Friday, the 16th November.

CIVIL SERVICE REGULATION (No. 2) BILL, 1923.—SECOND STAGE.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. Blythe): This is a Bill to make permanent provision for the method to be adopted in making appointments to the Civil Service. It provides that, generally speaking, admission shall be by open, competitive examination. That is the system which will on the whole give us the best service. Alternative methods might be put up and it might be possible to have panels for selection which would give us as good a Civil Service and leave us a choice as well. But that would be subject to suspicion at all times, and it would be very difficult to ensure that at no time was there ground for suspicion. Consequently, the Bill is brought in in the form in which it stands. In certain cases, power is taken to have the examination confined to special classes. That is desirable. For instance, at the present time it is desirable, in view of Army demobilisation, that certain appointments should be confined to men with Army service. We are able, with the machinery that this Bill provides, to have competitive examinations for the various candidates in a class which are eligible, and to get the best possible material from the class to which, for public reasons, we desire to confine the appointments. In certain other cases examination may be dispensed with—that is, in cases where there are professional or other peculiar qualifications. It is quite obvious that, while for the junior posts and the ordinary run of posts, competitive examination is good enough, there are positions for which you could not rely on getting the best or nearly the best candidate by any method of examination. There is a class of post which requires a man of experience, administrative ability, certain force of character, and knowledge of the world, and you might easily have the best candidate for that class of position surpassed in examination by a bookworm or quite a young student, who would be altogether unfit for the post.

It is provided that in cases like that, and in other special cases, it will be possible to admit persons to the Civil Service otherwise than by examination if a certificate is issued by the Civil Service Commission, and they can refuse it when any special name is proposed to them. That certificate must be gazetted, so that Clause 6 does not provide what might be described as a "back door entrance" to the Civil Service. Nobody can be admitted secretly or privately to the Civil Service by the operation of this clause. It simply gives an alternative to the examination system in certain cases where examinations would not be satisfactory. It cannot be used, and will not be used, for ordinary appointments to the Civil Service. We have heard a lot of talk of the Commission which was appointed under the Act, which this Bill is intended to replace, not having held examinations. The present time is not the time to rush into the holding of examinations and to recruit large numbers of people to the permanent Civil Service. We have really to finish our stocktaking and to see what services we are going to retain and whether we require any additional permanent Civil Servants.

We have considerable numbers of temporary Civil Servants, and if services are to be dispensed with these Civil Servants can be dispensed with. If we add unduly to the number of permanent Civil Servants we would be tying up our own hands. It is not possible, as many people would desire us, to rush in and hold examinations, right, left and centre. Certain examinations have been held. For instance, there have been examinations for Customs and Excise, and they were confined to men with Army service. Fifty posts were offered there, and there were four posts offered in the National Health Insurance Department. The staff of the Revenue Department is, of course, a staff that has grown greatly, and it was found necessary and justifiable to make certain permanent appointments in the Revenue Service. An open examination to qualify men for appointments as County Surveyors has been held by the Civil Service Commissioners. There have been examinations in the Civic Guard for men to act as Inspectors of Weights and Measures. Examinations are being held for women Writing Assistants who will largely do certain work thrown on the Land Commission by the passing of the Land Act. Some of the appointments to these positions will be reserved for women who hold temporary posts in the Government Service, and other posts will be open to girls of school age.

There will be examinations also for technical appointments in certain departments of the Ministry of Industry and Commerce. Examinations are also pending, limited to boy messengers in the Post Office, in connection with a number of permanent posts as postmen. For the future, appointments of Shorthand Clerks and Typists will be made, in Dublin, from a list compiled as a result of competitive examination. As far as possible we will keep to the competitive examination system for all appointments. It will be more satisfactory in every respect. We will know where we are, and the examinations will give an equal opportunity to everybody. In the past Typists and Shorthand-Typists have been recruited in a rather casual way, and although the appointments are only from week to week, we feel that the best thing to do is to draw up a list as the result of competitive examinations and take from that list in order of merit.

The Bill has no new features. It was before the Dáil, and I do not think it was much discussed when it was last brought forward. It continues the system with which we are familiar. It has worked well with the British, and has given them an efficient and very capable Civil Service. It has done the work of administration exceedingly well, on the whole. I believe with us the system will also work well, and as time goes on we will be able to get a good Civil Service at as cheap a rate as will be consistent with requirements. The system will give a chance to all who may aspire to enter the Civil Service, and it will give fair play all round.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I am in entire agreement with practically every word the Minister for Finance said as to the desirability of competitive examination. It is not the most perfect test, but, broadly speaking, it is a test that works best over a wide field. I agree with him also that you must settle those things some time ahead, otherwise the candidates and the people training for the examination will not know where they are. There are one or two details, however, to which he did not refer, and which seem to me desirable to comment upon, even on the Second Reading of the Bill. There is no provision whatever for a pension for the Civil Service Commissioners. You pension the Judges and the Civil Servants, but the people who are to be the judges and to select your Civil Servants are not to have any pension at all. I am not anxious to encourage pensions, but it does seem an anomaly. You are conferring responsible functions on officials who receive no pension whatever. Secondly, there is the provision that these Commissioners are to be paid out of moneys to be provided by the Oireachtas. That means that year after year they will come on the estimates, and their salaries will have to be voted here. Everyone of us who has a constituent who has failed to pass an examination will be liable to raise complaints. One aggrieved person may say: "Why did so and so get more marks than my Tommy?" All these matters may be brought before the Dáil. That, I think, is not a wise provision. These Commissioners, who are virtually judges, should be paid from the Central Fund and not from the Estimates every year.

The third provision is a more remarkable one, and it differs entirely from the British method. It is that the Commissioners shall hold office during the pleasure of the Executive Council, and may be removed from their posts at any time the Executive Council may think fit. I believe in England and in Canada they have permanent tenure, and it seems to me most undesirable that men in this position, a position of grave and serious responsibility, should feel they are liable to be removed from their posts and sent away, without any pension, at the pleasure of the Executive Council. I do not mistrust the Executive Council, but I think it means that with every change of Government there will be a tendency to change the Commissioners. These are important and well-paid posts, and it is not unlikely that there will be supporters of the Government then in power looking for these posts. I do not think the Commissioners should be changed at the pleasure of the Executive Council. I do not say that any Government would do it, but it makes it possible for any Government to introduce the American spoils system. If the Commissioners are to be changed with each Government, the American spoils system will be introduced. I do not think anybody will contend that that system has worked well in the United States. I do not propose to oppose this Bill on the Second Reading, but at a later stage I will submit amendments.

Sir JAMES CRAIG: I have no intention either of opposing the Second Reading of this Bill, but I am surprised and disappointed that the Ministry have not taken the opportunity, in introducing the Bill, of extending competitive examinations to a much greater extent than is suggested here. As my friend on the left here has said, competitive examination may not always be the very best test of a man's capacity for the work, but, on the whole, it is the best we have got. The Government have had brought before their notice from time to time recommendations of certain important bodies with regard to the extension of competitive examination to the medical service. It is with regard to these recommendations that I wish, for the moment, to address myself. During the sitting of the Convention in 1917, the Convention, by a very large majority, which included practically all the representatives of the South and West, made a very strong recommendation for the extension of the competitive examination to all classes, and particularly included the medical service. In 1920 the Public Health Council, appointed to draft a Public Health Bill, also made a strong recommendation which was unanimous, and it reads: "The establishment of an Irish Medical Service appointed by competitive examination and paid by the Ministry, from which will be provided the medical and veterinary officers of health, the medical and surgical staffs of the various public hospitals, sanatoria, asylums, etc., as well as the medical officers engaged in the treatment of insured and poor persons."

When the resolution came before the delegates of the Medical Profession, representing the entire profession in the country, it was unanimously adopted by these delegates. Furthermore, a referendum had been taken in 1910 of the Medical Profession in Ireland, and 90 per cent. of a very extensive poll of the profession were in favour of the Medical Service being open to competitive examination. As late as a few months ago the General Council of the County Councils in Ireland made a similar recommendation, namely, that all these State appointments should be gained only by competitive examinations. There is not any question that competitive examinations would do away with one or two things. On the question of corruption in the past, we heard from time to time that it was possible for a man with a cheque book in his pocket to go around the country, and distribute cheques varying from £10 to £20 to secure a vote. Competitive examinations would do away with that class of thing. But far more desirable is it, that we would be able to keep at home in Ireland the very best of our young medical men. If the appointments are open to competitive examinations, and if the men are decently paid, we shall keep here the best of our men instead of having them go over to the other side where they will be better remunerated. I take it for granted that what the Ministry have set before themselves is the word "Efficiency" as the text for all their preachings. I do not think they can get satisfactory efficiency in any other way than by means of competitive examinations. As far as the medical service is concerned, one reason why I am speaking to-day is that we were promised a Public Health Bill. This I hope will be coming before us in the course of the next few months. Under the Public Health Bill there will be certain provisions made for new appointments. I would rather see the Bill torn to shreds if it merely means putting into jobs men who are inefficient; if it does not mean that we are going to get the very best men we can to work in the interests of Public Health, I would rather see the Bill scrapped. Furthermore, in connection with this, I presume that it might be possible on the introduction of a Bill to make provision for the establishment of an examination. As Major

[Sir James Craig.]

Bryan Cooper has said, it is well to look a little beforehand, and I should have thought that if the Ministry intends to have a competitive examination in the future, they would have looked a little bit ahead and given these Commissioners, that they are now appointing, power to arrange for, and conduct examinations on lines that can be easily set forth in consultation with the bodies which are interested. I finish by saying that I hope before the Bill comes before us in Committee the Government will have taken these matters into consideration and perhaps do something to please the Medical Profession, and the other bodies who have suggested competitive examinations.

Mr. JOHNSON: There are just two points that I want to raise. One is regarding the remarks of Major Bryan Cooper, which seemed to me to be directed to a Bill which might have contained provisions for making the Civil Service Commissioners a body, which I for one rather suggest they should be made, to make appointments. So far as I can read the Bill, it is rather a body to set and conduct examinations. In that case I am afraid I am not able to follow him regarding the necessity for pensioning these Commissioners, and paying them out of the Central Fund, as contrasted with the proposal in the Bill. The other point is a matter which the Minister could reassure the Dáil upon, or give us some information upon. That is whether it is the intention to place under the test of competitive examinations the recent appointments to the Civil Service.

It seems to me that it is, perhaps, desirable that some qualifications, which would be found out by examination, should be put forward, and made applicable to those who have entered the Civil Service during the past two or three years. Perhaps the Minister will give us some information on that point.

Mr. BLYTHE: With reference to what Sir James Craig said, the Bill gives power to the Civil Service Commissioners, when requested, to hold examinations for any position under any authority or authorities. It will be a matter for the Local Government Department, in its Bill dealing with Public Health, to make arrangements that the appointments shall be made as the result of competitive examination, if it so desires. This Bill simply sets up the machinery for the holding of those examinations, if it is desired to avail of it. I do not think it will be desirable, in this Bill, to deal with the local administration. It will be out of place to go any further until we come to the Committee Stage. With reference to the permanence of the Civil Service Commissioners, they are no more permanent in Great Britain than it is proposed to have them here. I do not think it is desirable they should be put into the position of Judges. They do carry out a very important function, but I think it is entirely wrong to assume that we are going to have corrupt Governments in the future. If we are going to have corrupt government no safeguard you will put in the Bill will save you from that. You must believe that the Government will carry out the law in the spirit and in the letter. This law does away with the question of the patronage of Ministers, and you must assume that the Ministers who will be appointed by the Sovereign Assembly of the Irish Nation in the future, will not attempt to get behind any decision come to; that they will not strive to do things they are forbidden to do and not expected to do. There is really no use in talking about paper safeguards. There used to be a lot of talk about paper safeguards in the past, but when there were no paper safeguards it was found that we were just as well off without them. The idea of setting up a Civil Service Commission in a very high position and making them Commissioners, equivalent to Judges of the High Court, and all that sort of thing, arises from a desire for paper safeguards which would be no good. Now, in regard to salary and pension, if a Civil Service Commissioner is paid a salary, I agree that he should be paid a pension, and I think the Bill enables a pension to be paid. In fact, the present Civil Service Commissioners are not paid any salary. Two of them are Civil Servants and the other is An Ceann Comhairle. The matter of pensions is not pressing and it arises in no special way. With regard to recent appointments, nobody can come into the permanent Civil Service except by way of open competitive examination, or Clause 6. In regard to recent appointments, if they were professional appointments they will come before the Civil Service Commissioners in the usual way. If they are appointments that do not come under Sub-Section (a), Clause 6, then there might be some that would come under Sub-Section (b), but the Civil Service Commissioners will have to be satisfied that it is in the public interest that they should be appointed without examination. There have been no appointments to the permanent Civil Service in recent years. Anybody who has been taken on is only temporary. He can only become permanent in one or two ways. So there is nothing to fear in that respect. In normal times it would be probably quite sufficient to have two or three of the higher Civil Servants acting as a Commission, but as times are not normal, and as we have not all got used to carrying on the business of Government as a normal matter, we asked An Ceann Comhairle if he would kindly act on this Commission, so that we would have some person who was independent and outside the influence of the Government on it.

There can, as I say, be no admission to the Civil Service otherwise than by competitive examination, unless the Civil Service Commissioners are prepared, after consideration, to grant their certificate and to have that certificate published in the "Gazette."

Question—"That the Bill be now read a second time"—put and agreed to.

Order for Committee Stage, Thursday, 22nd November.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S ADDRESS (MOTION FOR RESOLUTION OF THANKS).

Debate resumed on the resolution: "That the Dáil returns thanks to the Governor-General for his Address, and approves of the Legislative programme of the Government, as outlined therein." (Mr. James Burke.)

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Perhaps I may be allowed at the outset of my speech to quote, for the sake of simplicity, certain words which I used in this Dáil last April when speaking on the Budget as the basis of certain comments I desired to make upon the important financial statement made by the Minister for Finance. Speaking on the Estimates when they were before us at that time, I said: "I think that when the Estimates are reduced to Budget form, the Minister for Finance might, with advantage, remember the difference between expenditure strictly stated as non-recurrent, and expenditure that is recurrent, and classify the entire expenditure of the nation under these two separate categories strictly recognisable in finance, viz., recurrent and non-recurrent expenditure. That expenditure which is recurrent and which is due to each year, and is more or less in the nature of establishment charges should be liquidated completely within the financial year in which it occurs." I went on later to suggest that the two chief matters that might be treated as non-recurrent were expenditure in connection with the Army and in connection with compensation. I mention that now because the Minister for Finance, at that time the President of the Executive Council, was a little derisive at that classification. Nevertheless, that is the classification that has been adopted by the present Minister for Finance, and is the basis of the statement he made. He adopts different words, but the principle is the same, and I naturally think that the principle is a sound one. He states in his speech that careful consideration has been given for some time past to the relation that at present exists between revenue available from taxation on the present scale at one end, and on the other hand the expenditure that is being incurred on the normal operations of the Government. That is excluding compensation charges and that part of the Army charges which are now regarded as abnormal. I think it might have been to his advantage and to the advantage of the clarity of the [Mr. Darrell Figgis.] national accounts if the principle had been still further extended, because buildings have been purchased and buildings have been set in order and buildings have been re-built and re-constructed into permanent dwellings which have been taken over, and surely if it is right to regard any expenditure as being in the nature of foundation charges it is expenditure of that kind where you can levy the renewal charges and the dilapidation charges. I suggest that if the principle which the Minister has already accepted be rightfully extended he will find a considerable asset come to him when he comes in the future to amplify the matters he has dealt with in his present speech in laying the estimates of expenditure before us at the termination of the current financial year. At the present moment I desire to do no more than just mention that such is the principle that has been accepted, and upon the basis of that principle it is stated that so much of the expenditure that this Nation must incur will be charged to taxation. Certain other matters which the Minister describes as abnormal expenditure, but which I believe could be more accurately described as non-recurrent expenditure, will be taken over and funded in a National Loan. I propose quite briefly to touch upon the first of these two before coming to the other.

The Minister, I think wisely, at this stage avoided any attempt to go into details of the figures with which he was dealing, in order to show exactly how he arrived at his deficit. But he did say that at the end of the financial year he expected a deficit of £1,000,000, that is to say, that the normal expenditure, after abstracting the abnormal expenditure for allocation to date, would leave a balance of £1,000,000 that he was not able to meet out of current taxation. To that he adds a further two million pounds for debt services in the next financial year. Now, that figure of two millions I would like to touch upon briefly, because the Minister has, in effect, said to us exactly what the amount of the Loan is going to be, because unless he is going to take a much higher rate of interest than the circumstances would warrant, a debt service of two millions a year means a national loan of £40,000,000. The Minister for Agriculture, being an expert mathematician, agrees entirely.

Mr. HOGAN (Minister for Agriculture). After the Deputy has laboured the point at great length, I have got it successfully.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Well, that will practically be in effect the National Debt that will be incurred. I would like the Minister, if he can, at a later stage in this debate, to deal with one matter of some importance not touched upon in the course of his speech. I refer to Article 5 of the Treaty.

Now, there may be certain liabilities that other people are expecting in the course of Article 5 which it is the confident belief in this country will not be forthcoming; but while Article 5 remains open, while there is no decision taken on that Article, then a certain element of doubt has been introduced which it is wise and desirable that we should get rid of at the earliest possible moment. Outside the provisions of that Article, outside whatever may happen under that Article, it would appear then that when we have got that loan floated, it will constitute practically the entire National Debt. The Minister addressed the greater part of his remarks to the three million deficit which has got to be met, and he stated that that deficit cannot be met out of taxation or by any increase of taxation, leading to the conclusion that since it has to be cut off, it can only be cut off by a very vigorous process of retrenchment. The Minister indicated that this country would have to take a share all round in that retrenchment, a share in which everybody must bear their burden from the highest to the lowest. I think it will be agreed that that is perfectly sound, and that whatever retrenchment is required, it is a retrenchment that every person will have to take a part in, and that it is a retrenchment that should be participated in by everybody from the highest to the lowest. But I do not say, although the Minister seemed to indicate that he has got his preferences, that this is a share that should be participated in not from the highest to the lowest, but from the lowest to the highest, which is quite a different matter altogether. He has indicated only two sources in respect of which savings are to be effected, one pensions and the other the teachers. A 10 per cent. cut is to be applied in each case. In the case of pensions, the cut will mean a reduction of £320,000, and in the case of the teachers the reduction will amount to £330,000, giving a total of £650,000.

My attitude towards these cuts is this: These cuts may be necessary, but they have not yet been proved to be necessary, and they will not have been proved to be necessary until every other source has been examined, and every other source has not yet been examined. The proposals may be necessary, but at the present moment they would appear as being put in the vanguard of retrenchment, and they would appear to be extremely unjust. I think it will be admitted that, unjust or just, they are at least politically very unwise. In regard to the pensions, I ask why it is decided to levy a cut of 10 per cent. all round. The Minister knows, and everybody in this country knows, that if the pensions were kept at their present level and were to be administered better than they are, that very considerable savings could be effected in respect of the persons receiving pensions who are, nevertheless, not entitled to receive pensions.

I know that economies are being effected in that direction, and I venture to say that probably one entire half—and I throw this forward as a suggestion—that one entire half of all that he hopes to save by taking a shilling off the old-age pensioners could be achieved, and will this year be achieved, by a careful examination of all those persons who ought to be in receipt of such pensions. In regard to the teachers, I desire to say one or two words, because I think that this proposal of the Minister has raised a very far-reaching principle. I am not going to touch at all upon an aspect of the case that a deal has been made or that a contract or agreement has been made, and that this proposal is going back upon pledged word. There are those in this Dáil who are in touch with the actual facts who will argue that case, and I leave that aspect of it to them. But there is one aspect that ought to be touched upon and it seems to me to be of outstanding importance. It is that the teachers in a country are probably the most important persons in that country, seeing that it is they will be instructing the future generation who will have the continuance of the State for which legislation is proceeding in this Dáil.

I remember a long time ago hearing a man in the city of London make a comment to a friend. I was only a young man at the time and overheard it. The phrases he used clung in my memory since, and they were these:—That in the conduct of his industry, in the interests of efficiency and capability, he discovered certain positions that were regarded by him as being pivotal positions, and any salary he attached to these positions were attached definitely to the worth of the position, irrespective of the person who was to fill it, and then he proceeded to get the best person for that salary and wherever else he cut, these positions were kept up by him because they were regarded by him as being pivotal positions in his enterprise. I suggest that the teacher occupies one of these pivotal positions in the enterprise of the State, and should be so regarded. I have said that whatever the future is to be it is the teacher who will decide that matter. I know that in this Dáil it has been urged in the past by the Farmers' Party that retrenchment might be effected in the teaching profession, but I would urge upon them, and the Minister, that the very future of farming is concerned in this matter; that it is the efficiency of the future farmer that is concerned in the efficiency of the school of to-day, and it is the efficiency and the worth of the future State that is being decided to-day by the teachers. For these reasons I think it very deplorable, not that this saving should be effected, which might be ultimately proved to be necessary, but I do urge that it is unwise that this should be the very first that should be attacked instead of being among the last to be touched.

There are other sources. There is the Army at the present moment. The Minister used certain words in regard to the Army that were heard with peculiar attention in this House and should be underscored. He said that the day of destruction has gone. Now, it is perfectly clear to everybody that the day of destruction has gone. And yet, consider the Army that is being maintained at the present moment. Consider the savings that might be effected in the Army. I elicited from the Minister for Defence to-day the salaries that were being paid to the Army Council. The Chief-of-Staff was getting £1,300 a year, the Adjutant-General £1,100 a year, the Quartermaster-General £1,100, plus free quarters and messing in barracks. He might further have added plus orderlies and free motor cars. We would all consider that a very princely income indeed, even on parity of exchange it is a salary equal to what is being received, at this moment, by Marshal Foch. Considering the difference in the exchange, it is about three times as much as Marshal Foch is getting. I consider, whatever the military worth of these gentlemen is, it is not three times the value of that great soldier. I have heard the suggestion that the Quartermaster-General is worth the salary, because he is three times the size, but these are not matters that enter into estimates.

[Mr. Darrell Figgis.]

There are other matters. There are three military gentlemen as aides-de-camp to the Governor-General. I understand that the salary of one of the three is £1,100 a year; the salary of another is £900. These are very considerable salaries. Considerable economies could be effected in one of the most wasteful of the Army establishments; that is at Gormanstown, which is costing this country £150,000 per annum. I suggest to the Minister that here is a very fruitful subject of enquiry, if savings are to be effected, and I urge upon him that it would be a very popular thing to do, and a very instructive thing to do to order a public audit of the Army accounts, an audit that should be published by him. I consider that, at least, such a course should be adopted by him long before the Old Age Pensions should be touched. What is the cost to-day of the Canadian Army? In the monies current in the Free State the Canadian Army costs 1½ millions. The Minister states he will be able to reduce the Army from ten and a half to something in the vicinity of four million pounds. If an army were to be run in Ireland on the militia system, same as it is run in Canada, an army could be maintained of equal efficiency, though without the same extended personnel, on a sum that need not, at any moment, exceed two million pounds a year. I am not making any guess at that figure. I have worked it out in some considerable detail, together with persons who are quite competent to assess the figures. Consider what that, in its turn, would imply. If we had in Ireland an army established on the militia system we would be able to save two millions a year. In other words, we would, out of that one economy alone, be able to pay the entire debt service that the Minister spoke of, as being necessary to estimate for in the coming financial year. There is also the Civil Service, concerning entrance to which we have just passed the Second Reading of a Bill. The Minister has already indicated that something is going to be done in that matter. But it is notorious that appointments have been made during the past two years to the Civil Service that were not justified by the attainments of the persons appointed, and certainly were not justified in respect of the salaries those persons are receiving. The salaries were on a much higher scale than the salaries that prevailed up to that time. It is true that a large number of the persons who have been appointed would not be able to retain their positions to-day if they were called upon to pass an examination. I think a considerable economy might be effected in that regard if the Minister were to make the coming examinations for the Civil Service retrospective, so that persons who have been appointed within the past two years shall be called upon to pass such an examination, and if they fail to qualify their positions shall automatically fall vacant. It would be rather surprising to discover exactly the economy that might be affected out of that one single measure.

There are other matters pending, not immediately before the Dáil. There are matters of which we have already received notice. There is the Ministers and Secretaries Bill. We will deal with that when we come to it. I will only make this comment upon it now, seeing that it is in the possession of the House, that £8,400 a year is going to be spent under it on Parliamentary Secretaries. The Dáil will be able to work out a very interesting arithmetical calculation to discover how many old age pensioners will be called upon to do without their shilling a week in order to contribute towards these new offices that are about to be created.

When all economies have been effected we come then to a matter which we can, at least, regard as a matter of common agreement; that is, a loan is necessary that will be the common concern of every citizen in the Free State. The Minister, in his speech, stated that it is important to have it understood that the public finance of the country does not need to be conducted and will not, under the present Government, be conducted in a manner that can render us subservient to any external interests. This is a very admirable principle to set out as a headline. Unfortunately, it is not altogether true. It is true that the raising of this loan will make us subservient to external interests, because the loan will be raised in terms of British currency. It is perfectly true that Irish citizens are to be asked to contribute, and no definite overture will be made to British citizens as such. Much less, I gather, will overtures be made to the British Government as such. But the Irish citizens who contribute will be contributing in currency notes of the British Government, currency notes that will be dependent upon British financial policies, currency notes that will have to be purchased by Irishmen across the Customs frontier of their own creation—a necessary frontier, a frontier that follows upon the provisions of the Treaty, but a frontier, nevertheless, that will make those loans more expensive here than they would be made for ordinary British citizens in Great Britain. I raise that matter now, because I do think that the Minister ought to take very early into his consideration the very important matter of currency.

Directly we touch the question of a loan, we touch a matter closely dependent upon the currency upon which any State relies. We already have the conditions under which that currency can be created. I urge that it should be created. I was speaking the other day to a business man of some weight in another country and put before him the figures of exports and imports in respect of the Free State, by which it appears that we are exporting every year one-third in value more than we are importing. When any country can show a position like that, it is a country of which the credit other country can show. In any case that is the position to-day. A loan somewhat of the order of forty millions pounds is to be issued. It may not all come at once, but if that debt service is to be as assessed by the Minister, such naturally must be the order of the debt.

Here we come to a question involving a grave public duty for every citizen of the Free State. It is incumbent upon this country that that loan should be made a resounding success. I do not deceive myself that any words of mine would reach even people outside calling themselves Republicans, who have said that they would not recognise any such loan, if created, and that they would afterwards repudiate it. Words like those can be disregarded. They are having a certain measure of weight with certain persons, but they can be disregarded, because no matter what the Government of this country may be, that Government could not continue for five minutes if there were not to be a recognition of the National liability incurred in the name of the people. It is a liability in which every individual is concerned. Business men in Ireland to-day would find that their own personal credits in other countries would be affected injuriously if the National credit were to be impaired by any failure to raise what this country needs in the way of money for the continuance of the normal processes of its business. I urge the Minister to recognise that this is a matter that cannot be treated and will not be

[Mr. Darrell Figgis.] treated by anybody in a merely party spirit. I urge him to put the people of this country in possession of the full facts at the earliest possible moment, to organise a drive and to put every Deputy in his district to the task of assisting in the collection of the loan that is required by the Free State. Let the Government itself give the headline in the recognition of the principle that this is a matter—whatever differences we may have on other questions—that is not a Party question, that it is a matter in which every citizen is concerned and in which every citizen is called upon to give his assistance. In that way we may be able to prove that in this ship of State every person will have his or her duty. I believe that if the matter be regarded in that way, and a proper publicity campaign instituted in which every person who can help will be called upon to help, there will be no difficulty in raising within this country what this country wants for the administration of its services and for putting this State into a condition of solvency.

Mr. JOHNSON: I do not know whether it is the desire of the Dáil to enter upon discussion of the amendment of which I have given notice. Assuming that it is in order, I think I am right in saying, on behalf of Deputy O'Connell, that he is prepared to postpone amendment No. 1 in favour of amendment No. 2.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If Deputy O'Connell waives priority in respect of amendment No. 1, we can take amendment No. 2 now. That is inclusive of amendment No. 3. It contains the two matters—Education and Old Age Pensions. I would suggest to Deputies that when the amendment is moved, the discussion would permit of the raising of any matters dealing with economy and retrenchment and with the statement made by the Minister for Finance generally. When that amendment has been disposed of, amendment No. 1, dealing with the Fishing Industry, can be taken up and disposed of. Then, the main question would be again before the Dáil, and Deputies who desire to raise other matters, not relevant to the question of economy and retrenchment, would be in order in doing so. I think that arrangement would suit all those who desire to speak.

General MULCAHY: In case there is an amendment coming on just now, perhaps I would be in order in dealing with one or two small matters arising out of the last Deputy's speech.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Perhaps the Minister for Defence would be better advised to wait, as other similar questions may be raised. I would allow his reply to these questions on the discussion on the amendment, if he is willing to wait until then.

Mr. HOGAN (Minister for Agriculture): It is clear, then, that the general question can be debated after these two amendments have been disposed of.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes. But it cannot be debated by way of repetition. When the amendment has been disposed of, we cannot have a speech delivered on the main question that is really relevant to amendment 1, 2 or 3. With regard to amendment 3, we could deal with it in several ways. What I would suggest would be that when amendment 2 has been discussed, if there is any desire expressed, we could, at the end of the discussion, put the amendment in two parts. Perhaps that would meet Deputy Byrne's desire.

Captain REDMOND: Do I understand from your ruling that you do not seem disposed to permit Deputies to indulge in a general discussion of the Governor-General's speech upon these two amendments, but you suggest that the general debate may be afterwards resumed. If that is so, I would suggest—speaking, as I do, only for myself—that it would be better for us to proceed with the general discussion first and take these amendments subsequently. If Deputies speak on these two amendments, they will be limited to the matters you have referred to, namely, the question of economy and also the questions raised in the amendment.

These matters undoubtedly come up in regard to the whole outline, form and proposals contained in the Governor-General's speech, and if Deputies are not to be allowed to refer to them again, when they desire to take part in a general discussion, I think, for the benefit of the Dáil generally, it would be better to proceed with the general discussion now, and have a limited discussion later on the amendments according to their terms.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I have not made any ruling; I merely made a suggestion.

Mr. HOGAN: I suggest that if we branch off now to the motion on the Governor-General's speech, we will be getting into matters relating to Agriculture, Industry and Commerce and Local Government, matters absolutely foreign to the subject we have been discussing. From that point of view it would, perhaps, be better to deal with the amendments specifically, and afterwards deal with the general question. My only point is that we will be taking up something absolutely new and entirely foreign—or at least foreign to a great extent. We will be discussing Industry, Local Government and other matters if we adopt Deputy Redmond's suggestion.

Mr. GOREY: I do not think it wise that the discussion on the Address should be continued in general terms. The financial statement made by the Minister has introduced new matters. The principal part of the two amendments deals with the financial statement. It would be better to dispose of the amendments first, and I suggest we do so. Let us not be mixing up matters. The question raised on the financial statement is altogether foreign to the Address, and it should be dealt with separately. I quite agree that anybody speaking to the financial statement and the amendments ought not be allowed to introduce those matters afterwards.

Captain REDMOND: I would like to say that that is exactly my point. When we proceed to discuss these amendments, we will not be discussing the Governor-General's Address, because neither of these matters were mentioned in the Address. My point is, that we are not now discussing the Governor-General's Address, but the Address as amended by the financial statement, and as amended also by another statement which I intended to refer to. I think the method adopted of dealing with the Governor-General's Address in this fashion of dribs and drabs is bad for the Government and bad for the Dáil. The Address should be disposed of in an allotted time. These matters were not brought up on the Address. That is my complaint in regard to the Address. They were overlooked and now we are going to discuss, as Deputy Gorey has said, two questions which were not mentioned in the Address, and then we are going to go back to the Address again. I bow to the will of the Dáil, but I think it would be more logical and reasonable to dispose of the Address first and then proceed to deal with the amendments.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I have not given any ruling on this matter. I have merely made a suggestion as to the most convenient way for Deputies to discuss the matters which they themselves are very anxious to discuss. Deputy Gorey has told us that the statement made by the Minister for Finance had nothing to do with the Address.

Mr. GOREY: It is a distinct matter.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I dissent from that view because the words actually quoted in amendment No. 2 from the Address are "The decision of the Ministers to avoid waste and extract the utmost value from all public expenditure." Upon that it is surely relevant for a Minister to state how he proposes to avoid waste and effect economy. Proceeding further, it is surely relevant for Deputies to state that they do not agree with the Minister's method of avoiding waste and effecting economy. The method we have been following is that the address is a statement of Government policy. The Government, having made its statement through the Governor-General, seeks the approbation of the Dáil for their policy as outlined in the Address by means of a motion such as is on the paper. The Minister for

[An Ceann Comhairle.]

Finance took the opportunity of making an important financial statement, and Deputies desire to propose an amendment and get a vote on a specific matter indicated in it. That has very distinct relevance to the Governor-General's Address and to the question of whether the Dáil does or does not approve of the Government's programme as outlined therein. It seems to me that if we continue the general discussion on the Motion of Thanks it would be impossible to avoid the matters mentioned in Deputy Johnson's amendment. Deputy Figgis mentioned matters quite relevant to this particular amendment. Seeing the position we are in, my suggestion is that we should discuss the amendment, and considerable liberty should be allowed in the discussion of the amendment in dealing with matters of finance. Having disposed of that, we could then take the other question of Fisheries. I make the suggestion after a consultation with some Deputies and with knowledge of what certain Deputies will want to discuss. There is one Deputy, not present at the moment, who will appear sometime in the discussion and will want to speak about Railways. That is a certainty. He will not be in order in regard to the amendment, but he is entitled to discuss the matter somewhere. Similarly, Deputy Gorey and others who sit with him will desire to make some statement on Government policy which will give food for thought to the Minister for Agriculture. These may not be quite relevant to Deputy Johnson's amendment, but I wish to make an arrangement which would allow these matters to be brought up. It is entirely for the Dáil as to what is decided, but if we discussed the question of finance on this amendment and then went on to the general question and took up other matters, I think it would be convenient, and the Chair would deal with the matter in a very lenient way from the point of view of irrelevancy with a view to not interfering with the rights of Deputies to discuss the important matters arising out of the Government's statement of policy. While offering that leniency, we could not possibly have a speech made on the amendment and repeated in substance on the main question. That would be completely wrong. Before Deputy Johnson moves, I would like to have the view of the Dáil. I would like it made clear so that the question may not arise later on. I think Deputy Redmond's statement will be quite in order when we come to the general question. May I take it that is agreed to?

The Dáil agreed.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: With regard to the difference between Deputy Johnson's statement and Deputy Byrne's amendment, I would like some agreement on that matter.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would suggest that the two amendments might be discussed together, but may be voted upon separately if there are votes taken. If amendment No. 2 is defeated, a vote might be taken on amendment No. 3 without any extra discussion.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There are some objections to that, but I would agree to the proposal if the two things are discussed together, that in the event of No. 2 being defeated, No. 3 will be proposed and put without discussion. Does Deputy Byrne accept that?

Mr. A. BYRNE: I am quite agreeable.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendment No. 1 is postponed. We will now deal with No. 2.

Mr. JOHNSON: Paragraph 23 in the Address of the Governor-General to the members of the two Houses reads in the latter part "Your Ministers feel bound to urge not only on every Department of State but on every citizen the compelling necessity of husbanding our resources, and of avoiding waste and extracting the utmost value from every public and private expenditure."

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE took the chair at this stage.

Mr. JOHNSON: Now I subscribe to that, and I ask the Dáil to subscribe to that wholeheartedly. I think it is a very good definition of the term

"economy" that we should extract the utmost value from every public and private expenditure. My amendment seeks to put into this warning the proviso "That while approving of that decision, the Dáil cannot agree to methods of retrenchment which would be detrimental to education, or which would cause suffering to the aged poor." I submit that any attempt at retrenchment on the lines indicated by the Minister in regard to education and in regard to old age pensions would not be economy, but would be added waste—additional waste to the waste in administration, of which mention had been made. The Dáil listened to the statement of the Minister for Finance with a good deal of interest. With respect to some parts of it, as far as some Deputies of the Dáil are concerned, they listened to it with great astonishment and surprise. The majority of the Dáil no doubt were well aware of what was coming. But those Deputies who are dependent for particulars of policy from the Government upon statements of policy which are made to this assembly, which ought to be the first to hear them, were, I think, taken with surprise by some of the statements made by the Minister. I was personally inclined to whisper "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread," but I know the Minister is not a fool, and I had to think of some other explanation of the extraordinary announcement made in the manner in which it was made. I rather suggested to myself that there was some lingo tempting him to take advantage of his newness to the office, tempting him to do harm to the State under the plea of financial policy and the plea of national economy. The Minister has got a reputation, I think well deserved, of being intellectually honest, of being very candid, even if I may say so, without disrespect, brutally candid, in his statements to the Dáil. Again, without disrespect, I would suggest that his statement was not candid, not wholly candid, as I will try to show, but brutal in respect to his reference, both to the teachers and to the old age pensioners. The suggestion of the Minister regarding old age pensioners, which I will deal with first, took the Dáil by surprise. The arguments that were adduced in favour of his proposal rather show me that he had not the time or had not taken the trouble to examine his case with that intellectual honesty which I credit him with, or he would not have stated the case in the manner he did. He told us that when this pension was first introduced in 1908 the rate in the most usual case was 5/-. It was not intended at any time that the pension should provide the recipient with an independent and complete means of livelihood. I do not know whether he intended to infer that 10/- a week was a sufficient sum to provide the recipient with an independent and complete means of livelihood. That is the inference which nine out of ten people would take from the statement. He pointed out that the 10/- was fixed when the cost of living had risen to 120 per cent., and it was now 80 per cent. Therefore, as he suggested a reduction was valid and justifiable. That proposition is not valid and is not justified. And if he had examined the case, as normally he would have done, he would not have made that statement. The 10/- rate was adopted when the cost of living had risen to 120 per cent. above pre-war. It remained at 10/- when the cost of living figure was 176 per cent. above pre-war. I quote that from the Minister's statement. If the cost of living figures are to be the index which is to denote the rate for old age pensions, then there ought to have been a rise considerably above the 10/- when the big figure was arrived at. But that is not so. The Minister will not admit that there is something due to the old age pensioners in consequence of the failure to add to the rate of pension when the cost of living rose above 120 per cent. I want the Dáil to realise that 5/-, which is the basic figure for the majority of pensions was fixed not in 1914 but in 1908. It remained at 5/- up to a time considerably after the war began, and considerably after prices began to rise.

Prices rose nine points between 1908 and 1914, and if the Minister wants to argue for his shilling per week reduction on a basis of cost-of-living prices, and he examines the position honestly and candidly, he will see that on that basis there is nothing due to be deducted. All these prices, according to the figures quoted by him, as compared with 1908, will show an advance from 100 to 195. Now if he likes to take one-fortieth of a £ off the 10/-, and justifies it on the basis of the decline in the cost of living, these figures will entitle him to do that, but that is all they will entitle him to do. I submit if there is going to be any argument for a reduction of 1/- per week from old age pensions on the basis of the decline in prices you must take the prices at the time the pensions were fixed, and compare all these prices with present prices. But I want to ask the Dáil to believe and recognise this consideration that this index figure referred to is a figure based upon family expenditure. Everyone who knows anything about children knows that the family will consume a very much larger proportion of those articles which have not risen as greatly as other articles which are consumed by old age pensioners. The old age pensioner does not eat so much bread as the youngster—the growing boy or girl—and in the family expenditure there are three or four children taken into account in arriving at this index figure. So that you are trying to mulct the old age pensioner on a basis of declining prices when you take into account these things which are not normally consumed by men and women over 70 years of age. The largest proportion expended is on tea, sugar, and tobacco, all of which are taxed to a very much greater extent than the normal commodities consumed by the average family, and the Old Age Pensioners by virtue of their consumption of these taxable articles have paid back very much of the increase through the extraordinary increase in taxation upon these articles, such as I have named. So that on the basis of these figures you have no case to put before the Old Age Pensioners of the country in favour of a reduction in the amount of the pensions. Now the Minister relies to a greater extent perhaps upon another argument. He speaks of the resources of the country not affording those pensions at the present rate, and he quotes the cost to the Revenue of pensions in the Free State as compared with the cost of pensions in Scotland. He shows to-day that the cost of pensions in the Free State amounts to 13.2 per cent. of the Revenue, while in Scotland it is only 2 per cent. of the Revenue. I suppose that fact was known to the members of the Dáil and to the Ministry before they sought to be severed from the British Financial System. We have all a right to assume they took that into account because if they failed to take that into account they are asking the Old Age Pensioners to bear the burden of their failure. Are you asking them to be responsible, and to bear a loss consequent upon the history of the last 100 years. Because Ireland has an extraordinary and abnormal number of men and women over 70 years of age, we are being asked to make these people responsible and to bear that burden. I say that is not worthy of the Dáil, if the Dáil agrees to that proposition. We had our eyes open when we were seeking to be severed from the British Government system, and we know this was one of the charges that would be imposed upon the country.

I have never heard, nor read, of any Ministerial statement, or of any statement by any member of the Dáil, which told the people they were going to cut Old Age Pensions as soon as they got control of the finances of the country. The Minister for Home Affairs, the Minister for Agriculture and members of the Dáil in all parts have emphasised the position of agriculture, and the position of the small farmers and we know that there is a very large proportion of these in receipt of Old Age Pensions, that is, that there is a very large class of small farmers in receipt of these pensions.

In the main, I believe they are entitled to have pensions. I believe, having done their work for the State as they have done, they are entitled to be considered in their old age, but I think I have heard it said in this House, as I have heard it said elsewhere, that agriculture in Ireland has been notoriously a sweated industry, sweated by the community and, I put it to the farmers' representatives here, this is one way of paying back some of the debt due by the community to the small farming community. I do not think we should agree for a minute to make old men and women the first portion of the community to be called upon to bear the charges which we now think the State cannot afford.

The cut in the teachers' salaries, and the proposed additional cut in their salaries is, I submit, distinctly and inevitably a means of hurting the educational system in this country, which we had hoped, and indeed felt confident, was going to be immensely improved under the new condition of affairs. I say we hoped it was going to be immensely improved under the new condition of affairs, and, perhaps, members of the Ministry interested will recognise the value of a full page advertisement, which appeared in the newspapers on August the 20th, addressed to the people of Ireland and signed Liam T. MacCosgair. August the 20th is not very long since, and the memories of Deputies can easily go back so far as that date. The programme of the Government party, signed by the President of the Executive Council, contained this clause:—"Education has long cried out for reconstruction, and we seized the earliest opportunity of making the first and most urgent reform. We have changed this whole character and outlook by placing the National language and all that concerns the Nation's life in their rightful place, and the next generation will enjoy the fruits of our policy in a citizenry reared in the atmosphere of love and respect of their Motherland, her language, her history, her tradition, her lore. But the reform of public education cannot rest here. It must be truly modern and progressive, and made a real and a living thing by close relation to the life and the social, agricultural, and industrial conditions and life of the country. It must have no artificial barrier of class or grade, and it must attract to its service teachers enabled to be efficient and enthusiastic by adequate remuneration. The record of what we have already done shows that we have set our course in the direction of National efficiency and progress in education, and we will introduce early legislation to give effect to a well-considered scheme."

Now, I ask Deputies on the other side of the House is there a single one of them who, three months ago, believed that that proposition was going to be followed by an immediate cut of 10 per cent. in teachers' salaries, with the prospect of an indefinite cut to follow.

I challenge any member of the Dáil to say that he told his constituents there was going to be a cut in teachers' salaries. That proposition, which appeared in the programme of the Government Party, signed by the President of the Executive Council, suggested that you were going to enlist the enthusiastic support of the teachers; that you were going to give them adequate remuneration, and that you were going to utilise their enthusiastic support in building up "a citizenry reared in the atmosphere of love and respect of their Motherland, her language, her history, her tradition, and her lore." The Minister for Education, having subscribed to that proposition, consents to this action of the Minister for Finance in cutting the teachers' salaries, and destroying their enthusiasm, in making them discontented and quite unfit to do the work which was in that programme set out by the President of the Executive Council.

Now, Deputy O'Connell has already touched upon the financial proposal, and I have no doubt other Deputies will have more to say on that. I am not going to enlarge upon the actual financial facts, or the justification, or non-justification, of any action which the Minister has outlined, but I say that the evil genius who first prompted the Minister to take this action seems to have shown an utter disregard of the Government's policy as stated on frequent occasions in regard to the relations between the servants of the State, employees in industry, and their governors or their employers. A very respected Deputy who was elected to the Dáil, but unfortunately who does not appear here to enable us to add to our admiration of him—Deputy Alfred O'Rahilly—used these words when speaking to the Teachers' Congress at Easter time:—"Just as after the French Revolution the pseudo-democratic educators sought to abolish all corporate life and combination, so, in a small way, after our little revolution, there is a distinct tendency to abolish all Councils and Boards and consultan1.

tive bodies in Education, Agricultural and other Departments. One of the first fruits of liberty is apparently to be Ministerial bureaucracy." Perhaps he might have added Treasury autocracy. I think I can see signs of assent from certain Ministers to the suggestion of Treasury autocracy.

Some little time ago there was raised in the Dáil the question of the action of Treasury officials in ordering that wages should be reduced in certain Departments, without notice and without consideration, cutting them below the ruling rates in the district, and thereby over-riding all questions of fair wages clauses or the usual conditions of employment. Here, again, we find at work the same influence, presumably, which says that the Education Minister may whistle; the salaries of teachers must be cut on the first of November, and no questions asked. There is a clause in our Constitution which deals with Vocational Councils, and I think the Minister for Finance has indicated a certain assent to that general idea. This method of simply decreeing that certain public servants shall have their salaries reduced on a certain date, without consultation with anybody, is very far removed, indeed, from the idea of Vocational Councils—is very far removed, indeed, from modern practice in regard to employment, whether in State offices or in private offices. But mind, it is only these two indefensible elements that are being attacked, notwithstanding all the Minister vaguely hinted at about retrenchments in other Departments. He did not say in any single case there were going to be reductions. There was a statement that there had been reductions in respect to the Army, but there had not been any reduction in the rates of Army pay to existing soldiers. The only reductions are in new attestations. The Minister for Defence was not told by the Minister for Finance that, on and after a certain date, every soldier would have to be cut 10 per cent. in his pay. He dare not. The Minister for Home Affairs, through one of his Departments, has given assurances that there will be no reduction in the pay of the Civic Guard without consultation. But they can strike back, and I suppose that is the reason. The Old Age Pensioners have no redress. The teachers can only refuse to teach the children. What does the Treasury care about that? The late Minister for Education in England very recently said "The Treasury notoriously know nothing about education, except that it costs money." That, apparently, is the position of the Ministry of Finance in the new Saorstát. I submit that it is bad politics; it is bad economy; it is waste of political knowledge, to attempt to introduce new scales of pay in this autocratic manner without notice, without consultation, without intimation to the Dáil even, that such reductions were going to take place, apart from any question about violation of agreements. I leave that for discussion in another manner. Even assuming there was perfect justification, apart from agreements altogether, the method of doing this thing is a bad one, impolitic, and ought not to be sanctioned by the Dáil.

The Minister said that the Old Age Pensioners may attribute a high degree of responsibility for this reduction in the amount of tea or tobacco or sugar they would have been able to enjoy, to those who have wasted and impoverished the country during the past two years. It is very easy to blame everything upon the events of the last two years. It is very easy to say that the Irregulars and the Irregular campaign were responsible, but I think that is another exhibition of lack of candour, at least a failure to examine with that honesty which I say is his general characteristic, this proposition. The proposition to reduce Old Age Pensions and to reduce teachers' salaries, is to meet normal—or, as Deputy Figgis calls it—recurrent expenditure. It is not touching the abnormal cost of the Army. It is not touching compensation, and while the Minister may retort that the ability to pay has been reduced, I am going to ask Ministers if there is in existence, and if they will produce to the Dáil, any financial estimates which were before them when they were discussing the Treaty in London? You had the cost of administration before you. We have the estimates based upon the expenditure of the past few years, and know what the cost of the administration of this country is, and has been. We had no right—any of us—to anticipate that there was going to be any big reduction in the national charges for quite a long time.

The Treaty was made with certain financial obligations. It was accepted by the Dáil and the country and confirmed in the Constitution. That Treaty contemplated the possibility of even larger expenditure than is contained in the estimate that has been placed before us. We knew that within the bounds of that Treaty every Civil Servant might have resigned and claimed a pension, and that we would be bound to meet those pensions. We knew that within that Treaty—it has been mentioned here this afternoon—we undertook to bear a share of the British National Debt. I suggest that there are very few members of the Dáil, if any, who have examined the proposition but expected that we would have to pay interest charges upon a portion of the British National Debt. In these estimates that are placed before us there is no charge for that share of the National Debt, and we have no right, therefore, to think that, even if the history of the last two years had not been gone through, the annual charges would have been any less. Certainly we had no right to count upon that. We had a right to assume that every item that we were making ourselves possibly liable for, we would have been called upon to pay. I do not believe any member of the Dáil, or any candidate, elected or not elected, ever put to the people that there were going to be cuts in the cost of education and cuts in the charge for Old Age Pensions. Do not let us hide our responsibilities for present and future taxation behind the Irregular movement. We went into this Treaty with our eyes open. We knew it was going to be an expensive matter for a few years. Let us bear it, and not try to cut the humanitarian services and those services for education, which are the best investment that the country's money can be put into.

It seems to me that running through the Minister's statement and through much of the discussion that we are being treated to in the newspapers, such expenditure is being accepted as the same thing as National income. Of course it is not. It might well be that the National income was high and State expenditure low. We ought, if we want to look at this problem seriously and earnestly, distinguish between National monies paid out for education, National monies paid out for these humanitarian social services, such as Old Age Pensions, hospitals, and Poor Law, and the ordinary National expenditure on administration of the army, police, and the like. Supposing the charge for Old Age Pensions was taken off the National Exchequer and thrown upon the rates, the country would still have to bear it. The totality of expenditure would be just as high, and perhaps higher. If the Dáil refused to pay any more money for education, it would not necessarily mean that education was going to be any cheaper, or that the country would have any less money to raise. It would be simply paying through a different channel, but it would have to be paid or the country would go to ruin. It seems to me that the Minister is proceeding in quite a wrong direction. Economy in expenditure by all means, full value for all expenditure, private or public, by all means. But do not take steps which will reduce the value you are getting for the money you are paying. I would say, without any doubt whatever, that to create discontent and unsettlement amongst the teaching profession is going to reduce considerably the value you are getting for the money you are paying. That is not economy, and that is not retrenchment in any true sense. I think, instead of moving towards mere cutting of prices, mere cutting of wages, and mere cutting of salaries, the policy of the Minister should be, rather, to stimulate production and encourage that better return for labour expended. I would be with the Minister heartily if he would say, "We are paying four millions for education. That four millions is being raised out of the taxpayer's pocket. We want to see that a larger proportion of that four million is expended upon articles produced in this country, thereby employing other people through the expenditure of the salary that the State is paying." You will need to raise more money. I have not the slightest hope that the Minister will be able to carry out his policy of reducing taxation. I have not the slightest hope that it will be possible to carry on on the present rate of taxation. You may have to change the incidence of taxation, but you will have to raise the present amount, and perhaps more. I suggest that the true line of policy should be, not to cut on those services and reduce their value, but to look round for other means of raising money to pay for this necessary and useful public service.

The Minister says he cannot consider increased taxation. I hope he will be able to carry on the Government of the country in the manner which was outlined in the programme of the Government Party at the elections, without increased taxation. I believe it is impossible, and I believe, before the winter is through, that he will find a very heavy demand upon the public Exchequer, if he wants to save trouble from the rising numbers of unemployed. In the spring-time we warned the Ministers that the new system of paying Insurance might be all right, provided that employment were to become general before October. The Minister, through the Assistant Minister for Industry and Commerce, told us that the plans outlined in that Unemployment Insurance Amendment Bill contemplated and hoped for a general revival of industry before the end of October. That has not taken place. The number of unemployed is increasing, and their ability to sustain themselves while unemployed is steadily decreasing. The prospect is not hopeful for the promise of the Minister that he will carry on without increased taxation. He may find, as he will find, that he will have to put taxes upon imported manufactured goods.

He will have to find revenue by some means and probably he will find it by that means. It would be of some interest to the country and to many anxious employers of labour to know what the Government's policy in that respect is, or if they have any policy yet. Perhaps, before I sit down I may ask the Minister if he would, before the debate closes, enlarge a little more upon his references to expenditure on roads and expenditure on houses. He is not prepared, he says, to involve the State in any additional charge for an expenditure on roads, but he hopes that perhaps there will be a million and a quarter spent during the next eighteen months on improvement and repairs. That one and a quarter millions partly is to come out of motor vehicle duties apparently, plus the special rate which the County Councils are required to pay to the Exchequer under recent legislation. I would like some enlightenment on that because the best figures I can find do not show me any sum beyond £800,000, at the maximum, for that 18 months, and it would be a pity to deceive the country into thinking that there will be an expenditure of one and a half millions on roads.

Mr. BLYTHE: One and a quarter million.

Mr. JOHNSON: Yes, one and a quarter millions on roads, and there is not much sign of it as far as the figures that have been presented in different quarters up to now, would show. Further, I would like a little more enlightenment on what is meant by the Minister when he says it is an essential feature of these schemes that they cannot be initiated until definite recognition is given to that fact that the Government and the financial and economic interests of the country cannot consent to allow them to be conducted in a manner that would keep prices or wages above the nominal level at which they stand at the present time. That to me rather suggests that, while promising that there will be expenditure, he is taking good care to show that there will be none. I may be wrong in my interpretation, but it seems to me to suggest that there must first of all be a campaign of wage-cutting before there will be any expenditure on public works. By allowing a loud clamour of unemployed men to be heard, and keeping them clamouring, you will be able to cut down the level of wages, and then all things will be beautiful. I hope the Minister is not building upon that. I am afraid if he is it will be calamitous. I do not want to say anything in that matter that would make things more difficult. But, if there is any intention to use the unemployed as a lever to bring down the general rates of wages and to allow that to happen by virtue of that clamour and that contest and competition for jobs, well, that way madness lies.

I have asked the Dáil in this amendment to declare that it will not agree to any curtailment in expenditure which will be detrimental to the interests of education or will cause suffering to the aged poor. I hope the Dáil will tell the country by its vote on this question that it is not prepared to put burdens which we all foresaw upon these two elements in the community, and make them bear the first charge. I am one of those, and I have said it here before, who believes there will be need of a very general simplification of life in this country so far as the better-off sections are concerned. If we try to emulate in expenditure Great Britain, or even the habits of the past, when we were identified with and bound up with the British economic and financial system, we shall perish. I believe it will be good for the country to reduce expenditure on luxuries. I am with Deputy Egan on that. But when I see forms of luxury, when I see lavish expenditure on motor cars, and other forms of luxury, I wonder whether the Minister is looking in the right direction for his economy, for his retrenchment and for his additional finance. I think not. I think certainly he has been tempted down the wrong road when he was tempted to have a slap at the old age pensioners and the school teachers.

Mr. T. MURPHY: I second the amendment.

Mr. P. HOGAN (Minister for Agriculture): I have read this amendment, and I think I will vote for it.

Mr. JOHNSON: Hear, hear; I knew you would.

Mr. HOGAN: I hope the Dáil will give full and complete support to the Minister for Finance in the two cuts he proposes to make, amongst the many other cuts which he will find it necessary to make, if we are to run this country successfully, namely, to balance the Budget. I will try to meet, as far as I can, the numberless points which Deputy Johnson made, but I hope I will not emulate his heroic language. I will attempt to meet his points. First of all, he complains about the methods. He objects to the methods adopted by the Minister for Finance in this regard. He talks about autoeracy. He asks us do we hear of Vocational Councils now. He complains that there is a tendency to abolish all Consultative Bodies. I do not know what that has got to do with this case. The Minister for Finance comes forward here with two proposals. They are only the first steps. He tells the Dáil that he proposes to make these cuts. There is a full and free and frank opportunity for criticism. No member of the Dáil will be gagged. No member of the Dáil will be forced to vote for the Government.

We are here in the hands of the Parliament of the country, and the Parliament can, if it wishes, turn this down. That is not autoeracy; it is democracy. We defend these proposals on their merits. We put them to you on their merits, and it is you who have the last word. If that is autoeracy, then the word has taken up a new meaning. Deputy Johnson's speech was like the sting of an adder. I think it is the adder that has the sting in its tail—or is it? The speech, however, is like whatever animal has the sting in its tail. After a speech of an hour, he made just one suggestion to meet this deficit, namely, a cut in the salaries of certain officers in the Army; that was his only specific suggestion in the way of cuts.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the Minister is mistaken. While I might agree with the proposition, I did not make the suggestion.

Mr. HOGAN: That is, perhaps, a little too subtle for me. When he referred to Army salaries, I took it that what he really meant was that we might look for retrenchment in that direction.

Mr. JOHNSON: I said that the cut had not been made in existing Army salaries, but on new attestations, and men would attest on new terms; that is the point I was making, and it is very different from the method of treating the teachers.

Mr. HOGAN: If I am to take it that Deputy Johnson did not mean to suggest that some retrenchment could be made on Army salaries, then he made no suggestion except one, and that was increased taxation. After one hour's speech, the one constructive proposal of the Deputy is increased taxation. In an impassioned moment he turns to the farmers and asks them are they going to stand this—are they going to stand for a one shilling reduction from what Deputy Byrne calls the poor old age pensioners, and what Deputy Johnson himself properly calls the aged poor.

Mr. A. BYRNE: My poor old age pensioners are people in the slums of Dublin, not people with farms or people who signed away farms.

Mr. HOGAN: Deputy Johnson asks the farmers are they going to stand for this, and he suggested to them that a way to meet the case is to increase taxation and to put a tax on imported manufactured goods. I deal with this at length because it was his one constructive proposal. I think we all agree on one thing, and that is, it is absolutely necessary for the Minister to balance his Budget. The one constructive proposal of Deputy Johnson was increased taxation, and the putting of a tax on imported manufactured goods. I hope that commends itself to the farmers. I hope they like the prospect of increased taxation, and I hope the country will like it, as the Labour solution of the present problem. I hope the farmers in particular will like the proposal to put a tax on imported manufactured goods. At the present moment the increased figure for farmers' prices is between 36 and 40 per cent. above pre-war level, and the index figure for what they have to buy but do not produce is about 100 per cent. What will be the case if a tax be put on imported manufactured goods? Deputy Johnson is good at mathematics, as he has shown in his speech.

I would like him to tell us what the index figure would be for what the farmers must buy, and what effect it will have on the index figure of what the farmer sells. I do not think it would improve it, and I would be surprised if the farmers thought so.

When all the heroics are set aside, and when we have to come down to hard facts, then we find ourselves in the same position as the Minister for Finance found himself when he came down to hard facts. The one proposal of the Deputy is increased taxation and a duty on imported manufactured goods. I am perfectly certain that Deputy Johnson examined the field pretty carefully. He always does his work thoroughly, and I am sure if he could have pointed out alternative methods of finding money instead of increasing taxation and putting a duty on imported manufactured goods, he would have done it. I will say that for him.

Mr. JOHNSON: The responsibility is not mine.

Mr. HOGAN: I know the responsibility is not yours. The responsibility, unfortunately, is on the Minister for Finance. He must do it. The Deputy has been criticising him, and has been showing how wrong he is. The Deputy pointed out: "This way madness lies." The responsibility is on the Minister for Finance, but the irresponsibility seems to be Deputy Johnson's.

I put it to the Dáil that if Deputy Johnson, on behalf of the Labour Party, could have made a single constructive suggestion except these two he would do it. Now, we have got to get this money by means of these cuts. We have got to get more money, and there will be many more cuts, and these will have to be made, too. The Minister for Finance will balance his Budget, if it can be done, and this is only a beginning. These two cuts should be looked upon in that light. Deputy Johnson dealt with old age pensions first. He went into figures, and announced that we were not justified in proceeding on the cost of living figure in making this cut. These pensions were increased in the year, I think, 1920. I am not sure about the year.

Mr. JOHNSON: The point I made was, and I think the Minister will agree when I remind him of it, that if the cost of living figure is to be made the basis of the cut, then I say it is not justified.

Mr. HOGAN: That was the point. The pensions were increased when the cost of living figure was 120. I do not remember at the moment the year in which the increases were given, but I know that the cost of living figure at the time was 120. Why, I ask, were the pensions increased? They were increased because of the increase in the cost of living, and as a concession to the fact that the cost of living had increased. Therefore, I say the Minister for Finance is perfectly justified, unless somebody goes into the merits of the case and shows him that he is wrong, in taking the pensions in that year, the year in which the pensions were increased because of the fact that the cost of living had increased, and in saying that "the cost of living figure in that year was 120, but it has decreased by 33 per cent. since; therefore, I propose to decrease the pensions only by 10 per cent." On the face of it, I say that is a reasonable proposition.

Deputy Johnson wondered why the Minister for Finance should have said that the pensions were never meant to take the place, let us say, of wages, and that they were never intended to be the sole means of livelihood of a particular recipient. The Deputy wondered why the Minister said that. He said it for the simple reason that arguments were being advanced here which would have no validity, except that the people using these arguments had suggested that these pensions were fixed on that basis. They were not fixed on that basis. I do not think it was ever suggested by anyone that they were fixed on that basis. There has been a decrease of 33 per cent. in the cost of living figure since they were fixed, and I think the Minister for Finance has made a perfectly reasonable proposal. He proposes to put the pensioners in a far better position than they were in at the time when the pensions were fixed originally, having regard to the cost of living figure. There is no doubt about that. He proposes to put the old-age pensioners in a better position than they were in immediately after the pensions were fixed on the last occasion. There is no denying that. Deputy Johnson, I must say, worked out his own suggestion to its logical conclusion. It was that we should not take the year 1914, which has been invariably taken up to this, but that we should take previous years. Will he, I ask, admit that principle in regard to other questions that may arise. I would be interested to know that.

Mr. JOHNSON: On wages questions, yes.

Mr. HOGAN: What Deputy Johnson asks us to do at this stage is to pay the old-age pensioners what they should have been paid in respect of losses between 1908 and 1914. That is what his suggestion comes to, and that is what you have to consider in the present state of our finances. You have also to keep before you the fact that the Minister for Finance proposes to leave the old-age pensioners in a much better position than they were in at the time the pensions were fixed on the last occasion, having regard to the cost of living figure, then and now. But, if we were to follow Deputy Johnson's suggestion to its logical conclusion, what we should do is to pay the old-age pensioner what he should have got between the years 1908 and 1914. I say that the Deputy's suggestion is merely juggling with figures, and leads us nowhere, and that life is too short for that sort of argument.

We have heard a lot of heroics about the poor old-age pensioners, but we here on these benches may have just as much sympathy with the old-age pensioners as the people who employ all the adjectives. I will tell Deputy Johnson and Deputy Alfred Byrne how they can put the old-age pensioner in a far better position than he would be in, even if we were to leave him this shilling a week. If they are really interested in the old-age pensioners and in the teachers, if they do fear that this cut of 10 per cent. on the teachers and of 1/- in 10/- on the pensioners is going to have very serious results, so far as education is concerned on the one hand and the poor laws on the other, they can at least help to remedy it if they would only tackle the problem with half the enthusiasm that they are tackling us at present.

Mr. A. BYRNE: Tell us how we are to help.

Mr. HOGAN: Help to reduce the cost of living figure—and Deputy Johnson can help more than any man in that direction—to 72. That is a proposition that labour can help in just as it is a proposition that capital can help in. I just want to say this, that having been in fairly close touch with the industrial situation during the last month, my experience is this, and it is the truth: Labour does not care whether the cost of living figure goes up or down provided the present wages are maintained, and capital, the employers in Dublin as a body—there are exceptions of course on both sides—does not care whether the cost of living figure goes up or down provided present profits are maintained. That is undoubtedly the moral to be drawn from what has happened during the last month. Labour and capital between them can solve these questions which have many reactions, far more reactions than these reactions on the teachers and old-age pensioners, but that is a matter which I will take another opportunity to deal with. I repeat that if Deputy Johnson and Deputy Alfred Byrne are really in earnest, and if they really feel the sympathy with the poor that they say they feel—Deputy Johnson certainly and Deputy Alfred Byrne almost equally certainly—and if they tackle this question with the same enthusiasm and conviction that they have shown as regards these two cuts, they could help the poor five times as effectively by bringing down the cost of living figure and, in addition, they would be doing a good turn to everybody in the country as well.

These heroics that we have listened to are absolutely unreal. All this talk about the old-age pensioners and about the teachers sounds very hollow to anyone who knows the real facts of the case. I would want a lot of persuasion to believe that there is any real sympathy with the old-age pensioners or with the teachers or with any of the other down-trodden classes in the country amongst any persons or parties who have examined the industrial, and the general, situation in the country. If you want to help the people who are poor in this country, and if you want to help national economy, the thing to do is to concentrate in bringing down the cost of living figure, and that must be done from both sides. Unfortunately, the farmers, who are being appealed to, are in the position that they must wait while both sides here in Dublin, which is the key to the position, say, "Who will begin?"

As regards the teachers, Deputy Johnson did not take exactly the same line as Deputy O'Connell who suggested that we had broken an agreement, and that this cut was a violation of a contract. That argument does not hold water. Would anyone suggest that if the cost of living went up by, say, 500 or 1,000 per cent., as it might easily do—a very small thing would bring about such a situation as you may realise if you look at Germany and other countries—that the teachers would not come and ask for an increase in their salaries. Equally, is it suggested that if the cost of living suddenly fell to par that the State should look on and say "We made an agreement with the teachers in 1920, when the cost of living figure was 180, and we cannot touch their salaries now." These are two extreme cases. Surely, no reasonable man will say that the teachers would not be entitled to an increase if the cost of living figure went up enormously, or that, on the other hand, the State would not be entitled to make a reduction if the cost of living figure fell to par.

If that is so, the one question to consider here is, whether the 10 per cent. cut is justified on the facts, figures, and merits of the case. We had three speeches on this question, one from the Minister for Finance, one from Deputy O'Connell, and one from Deputy Johnson. The only figures quoted in these speeches were the figures given by the Minister for Finance. He said that the teachers' salaries had been increased three and a half times. Deputy O'Connell called attention, and rightly called attention, to the fact that the basic salaries paid to the teachers were very low. I will agree that you could conceive such a state of affairs that would justify an increase of three and a half times if the basic salaries were extremely low. It may be that at the present moment, in the interests of the teachers and of fair play, that their salaries should be increased three or three and a half times. But, I ask, let us have the figures. The Minister for Finance makes a plain suggestion. He says that the salaries were fixed in 1920, at a time when the cost of living figure was 180, and he proposes to take 10 per cent. off their salaries at a time when the cost of living figure has fallen by more than 100. That, I think, is a reasonable proposition. Let Deputy O'Connell produce his figures here if he has a good case. Deputy Johnson did not attempt to do it, but let Deputy O'Connell produce his figures and give the salaries that the teachers are paid if he says we are doing wrong. Let him show what 10 per cent. would amount to; let him show it to us and to the country, and we are willing to be judged on the merits of the case; but, as I have said, there has been no attempt made to do that. We have to carry all the blows and do the unpopular thing, but there has been no attempt made up to the present to show the Minister for Finance how he is to get about one million pounds to balance his Budget this year, the recurrent Budget of this year. The Minister stated that he has to meet a deficit of something over a million on his Budget this year.

We were asked some time ago not to approach this question in a party spirit. We were advised, and I think it was good advice, to take the country and the Dáil into our confidence, and to put all our cards on the table, and we were promised co-operation and told we could not get on without co-operation. We realised that. This is a big job, and we want the help of every man of good will and of every man who means business. But, it is not exactly in that spirit that these sort of speeches have been made. People are not entitled to get up and attack us, on what they consider a politically vulnerable issue, in extravagant language, without at least making reasonable suggestions. We heard a lot about salaries, and that the Dáil is entitled to know if people are being paid too much. I say that the Dáil is entitled to know that the salaries we pay are what we can afford to pay. We hear a lot of loose talk about salaries. Letters appear in the newspapers which save other people from troubling to think about them. They say they know what salaries are being paid. There may have been extravagances; it would be impossible if there were not, but they have been extremely few in the circumstances. We do not pretend to be perfect, but every sensible man here knows that no possible retrenchment of salaries in the case of the men who have been appointed since the Treaty, could get us £50,000. Let us have some measured language in our criticism. We will not fill up this big gap of over a million pounds simply by saying "salaries." It is hardly fair to suggest either, as Deputy Figgis suggested, that we are now proposing to appoint seven Parliamentary Secretaries at £8,400. That is not a fact. The Ministers' Bill is to construct the framework of the various Government services for the future. It is proposed, under the provisions in that Bill, to co-ordinate services like agriculture, education, and industries which were previously scattered under this, that, and the other head. That will do more for economy, in my opinion, in a year or two years than any other measure that could be brought forward with the same object.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

It would be better for the Minister not to go into this question, which will be debated here on Friday, when the whole matter will be raised on the Ministers' Bill.

Mr. HOGAN: I bow to your ruling. In the end, in addition to the two constructive suggestions which Deputy Johnson made to meet this deficit, namely, increased taxation, and putting taxes on imported goods, he suggested additional expenditure. After balancing the Budget by increased taxation, we are to borrow, I presume, for the [Mr. Hogan.] additional expenditure we will have. I agree, we have to spend money on useful reconstructive work, but it is to put himself in a position in which he can go with his head up and ask for money that the Minister for Finance proposes these cuts, and he will find it necessary to make more cuts. We cannot be going round in a circle. There must be no decrease in wages, no decrease in profits, and old age pensions must remain the same. There are going to be a good many increases in taxation and other things, but there must be no decrease in expenditure and yet we are to find money to balance our Budget. It is not business. I invite the other Deputy who has put down this amendment about the aged poor to tell the Minister for Finance where he is going to get this million. We have, I think, exhausted salaries. In addition to these cuts we want others, and I invite Deputy Alfred Byrne to show the Minister where he can get the necessary money.

Mr. WILSON: Civic Guard.

Mr. J. WHITE: Local Government Board.

A DEPUTY: The Governor-General.

Mr. HOGAN: You cannot do it by smart interruption. It is a business problem. We want something like one million. Show us where we can get it before you say that we should abandon these two cuts which we say are, on their merits, justified.

Captain REDMOND: If I had been framing this amendment perhaps I would not have used the exact words which we find on the Order Paper, but with the general intention of the amendment I am in complete accord. Now the Minister for Agriculture has sought to reply to Deputy Johnson's various arguments, but I approach this question from a somewhat different angle, though perhaps arriving at the same conclusion as Deputy Johnson himself. The real question I want to put to the Government is, why have they—and presumably they must have a reason for doing so—hit upon these two specific cases for immediate reduction and retrenchment? I want to know whether they have exhausted every channel of inquiry into every other means whereby they could secure this million which will be required to make up the unfortunate deficit and if they have not made these necessary inquiries, I say that it was, and is, their bounden duty to do so. These two items—old age pensions and teachers' salaries—are, to my mind, the very last sources from which the Minister for Finance should seek to make up his million deficit. Therefore, I seriously would urge upon the Government the sensibility of the proposal put forward the other day by Deputy Bryan Cooper, namely, that if they had not yet had inquiries made into every other means of securing this supply they should now, and it is not yet too late, set up a small Committee to make inquiries into every possible, available, financial source, including, especially, Government staffs and Government departments whereby they may be enabled to raise the sum by methods of retrenchment. It would not possibly take very great time, and it would put the Government in a particularly strong position if they would be enabled to come to the Dáil and to tell the country that after making these exhaustive inquiries they find that these two sources are the only two whereby for the moment they shall be able to secure this sum. I do say this, that if it were at all possible, any other source would be better than to deprive the aged poor of their wretched and miserable pittance, because it is nothing else, and also the teachers of the salary which was agreed upon by the late Government.

The Minister for Agriculture has taunted Deputy Johnson with making no alternative suggestion, but the increase of taxation and the diminishing of salaries. This is the first occasion I have had the opportunity of making any suggestion, and most tentatively I immediately accept his challenge and venture to make some upon my own.

In the first place, I welcome most heartily the Minister for Finance's statement with regard to the 7 o'clock. general policy of retrenchment, but he was exceptionally vague as to how that policy was to be applied, except in regard to these two particular instances. It is true he did say it might be possible to scrap some Ministries in the future. I will make one suggestion here at once: that is, that the Ministry for Fisheries should be scrapped here and now. I am as interested in fisheries as any Deputy in this Dáil, but to have for us, a population of little over three and a quarters millions in the Free State, a separate Ministry of Fisheries, when Great Britain, with a population of thirty-three and a quarter millions, has no separate Ministry of Fisheries, but whose Ministry of Fisheries is incorporated with the Ministry of Agriculture—I think is utter extravagance upon our part. I think that no better or more capable Minister could be found to deal with the necessary and, perhaps, complicated problems in regard to our Fisheries in the future, than the Minister for Agriculture who has spoken. There is one definite proposal I make now, that that Ministry be instantly scrapped. That may not amount to a million pounds, but it goes some way towards it. I will make further suggestions. It is not only in the question of particular individual salaries that economies can be made. Enquiry is necessary in order to avoid that snake-like system of redundancy which, unfortunately, has crept into our administration to-day. It is common knowledge that there are walking about the streets of Dublin efficient Civil Servants who have not only nothing to do, but are not allowed to do anything, but who are paid huge pensions, and in whose place others have been put who have to be paid salaries. I say that after examination by a Committee such as I suggest, the Minister for Finance would be able to make extraordinarily large economies by cutting down existing staffs of the various Departments. I would make further suggestions.

Is it proposed still to indulge in the policy of "sack the lot"? Are all the existing Judges to be dispensed with? I do not think that is the present intention of the Government, but it may have been their intention some time ago. At the commencement of the sitting of this Dáil I asked a question of the President whether it would be an immediate saving to the Irish Exchequer to retain as many of the present Judges as possible. He admitted that was so. Is it the present intention of the Government to do so, or do they intend paying two-thirds of the salaries of those Judges out of the Free State Exchequer and appointing additional ones? I think that is a very pertinent question. This does not only apply to judges. It applies equally to Civil Servants generally. It applies to Clerks of the Crown and Peace. Is it the intention of the Government to scrap them and appoint new ones? I would like to know what was the cost of doing away with the late Crown Solicitors. We have had to appoint other solicitors in their place, and we have paid for dispensing with the existing ones. The Minister for Agriculture also seemed to suggest that it was up to both employers and employees, typified, as he made them out to be, by the persons of Deputies Johnson and Hewat, to bring down the cost of living and thereby place the old age pensioners in as good a position as they were previously. That is a very good idea, and one to which I thoroughly subscribe. But why apply it solely to old age pensioners? Why not fix upon some other group of citizens in the country? Reduce the expenditure upon them, and the same argument applies both in regard to Deputy Johnson's and Deputy Hewat's efforts in the future. I think we have yet to be told by the Government, not so much on what grounds they justify this actual cut of 10 per cent, but why they propose the cut at all in regard to these two classes and not in regard to the others. The Minister for Agriculture has said, in regard to teachers, that if the cost of living went up would it not be suggested that their salaries should be increased? He knows as well as I do, and as well as the rest of the members here, that the salaries of the teachers were not increased on the basis of the cost of living, but that their salaries were increased because they were endeavouring to exist upon a starvation wage.

It was never an adequate wage. That was the finding of the Committee of Inquiry, the result of which was the agreement, stated to be a permanent one, the breaking of which is complained of by Deputy O'Connell. Therefore, as regards the teachers it is not a question of the cost of living, and I may say here, for my own part, if there is one branch of all others where I would be generous, where I would be lavish, even to the point of extravagance, it would be in regard to the proper remuneration of Irish teachers. (Goodness knows, I had enough experience in another place of endeavouring to extract some recognition of the value and the worth of teachers. The Government of that time had their lesson in their treatment of them, and I hope that the Government of to-day will not find the same result. I do not propose to go into the question of the merits of these reductions. I am in favour of a policy of retrenchment; I want retrenchment, because it is a living necessity. If we are to exist, we must cut our cloth according to our measure. But, what I do object to is that these two classes, without adequate explanation, should be specially singled out and fixed upon as the two who are to be made the victims of immediate reductions. The statement of the Minister for Finance—which I think was rather overdue, because it was really the first financial statement of any importance, for the last year at any rate—contains some items which I certainly would like to have cleared up. We know that there are debt charges for loans from banks. We have not been told either the amount of the loans or the amount of the debt charges, and I think that that is a very important consideration. Neither did the Minister for Finance refer to what we might term our Great War Debt. We all hope that under the Clause in the Treaty the set-off of over-taxation in the past will more than counterbalance the amount of War Debt due from us to the Imperial Exchequer. I think we are owed more than that, because, judging from newspaper reports, and from Ministerial statements, the Six County Parliament has already been allowed a considerable amount of abatement in regard to the War Debt which they so eagerly and so willingly adopted. I think, therefore, that it would be well, specially in view of the coming Loan, if matters like this could be cleared up. In regard to the question of currency, there I must part from Deputy Figgis—

Mr. GOREY: On a point of order, may I ask if this discussion is not going outside the terms of the amendment?

Captain REDMOND: Before you answer that, I might be allowed to remind you that the Ceann Comhairle expressly stated that he would allow latitude in regard to the question of the statement made by the Minister for Finance, and that we should discuss it on this amendment. *

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I think the Deputy is in order. The Ceann Comhairle gave a ruling that Deputies were to be allowed a certain amount of latitude in discussing this motion.

Captain REDMOND: I am afraid that I am not altogether in agreement with Deputy Figgis in regard to the question of currency. I think, as we have to float a Loan, the least we say about currency the better, except perhaps to make that Loan a success. Now that the matter has been raised, I think it would be most advisable for the Minister for Finance to assure the country that he has no intention of tampering with the existing currency. I think that that would distinctly reassure the people who would have doubts about the matter.

As to the amount of the Loan, the rate of interest and its character, we are in complete darkness. I think it would be well also if the Minister for Finance could clear the air on that point. Before he comes to any definite conclusion, at least, before he makes any public statement binding himself and his Government to any particular form or amount of Loan, perhaps I might be allowed to make this suggestion. Taking for granted that we want to raise this Loan in Ireland, our problem is how best to achieve that object. I would divide the investing community into two classes, the one, the larger investor, the man who has large sums of money at his disposal, or companies, or charities, for that matter, and the other the small individual investor, and I would provide one form of Loan for each. I would suggest that there should be, as there was in Great Britain during the war, a Loan at, if necessary, a lower rate of interest, but free of Income Tax, for the large investor, similar to the 4 per cent. Loan which was such a success in Great Britain, and I would go so far as to say that for the small class of Irish investor nothing would secure the money and fill the coffers for the Minister for Finance better than an issue of premium bonds. To the ordinary Irishman it does not matter very much, when he invests £5 or £10, whether he is to get 5 per cent. or 3½ per cent., but it does matter if, when investing £5 or £10, and getting only 3½ per cent. interest, he may have a chance one fine day of finding himself in the possession of thousands of pounds. I throw out these suggestions on this occasion because, according to the ruling, I am afraid that this is the last opportunity that I will have for doing so on the Governor-General's address. That is why I have taken advantage of this opportunity to ask the Minister for Finance to consider these various aspects and, if he possibly can, to clear the public mind of any doubts that exist in regard to these various questions in order to ensure the success of the Loan which he is about to issue. I do say in regard to these proposed cuts that there are, in my opinion, other means at the disposal of the Government for obtaining this £1,000,000, and even if they cannot see to it, even if they are able to come here and say, "We know of no other means," I say it is still their duty to take advantage of the suggestion put forward by Deputy Bryan Cooper, to have a Committee appointed to exhaust every possible channel of inquiry before they proceed to cut down the salary, in the one case, and the pension in the other, of the two classes who should be the last resource of any Finance Minister.

Mr. SHAW: I do not intend to take up much of the time of the Dáil in connection with this discussion, as I understand the matter will be taken up again on Friday, but I would like, if possible, that the Minister for Finance would put before the Dáil the cuts he intends to make as regards the various other persons in receipt of salaries. Undoubtedly there does appear to be a difficulty from the point of view of the selection of National teachers and Old Age Pensioners, because the first question put to the person is "Why are these selected?" and if the Minister for Finance would outline his other suggested cuts it would leave the Dáil in a very much better position, and we would know better how to record our votes. It is perfectly evident to the Dáil and the public that cuts and retrenchments must be made in the various positions, and it would be well if the Minister for Finance would state what he intends to do in this respect, so that teachers and Old Age Pensions will not appear to be victims.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I entirely endorse what Deputy Redmond has said on the subject of the Loan. I do not endorse everything he said, but on the subject of the Loan he has expressed my views better than I could. I do not know if the Minister for Finance expected his proposals to be agreed to with joy. If so, he will have been disappointed. I regret that he finds it necessary to make a cut in the Old Age Pensions, and the reason I regret it is because I am extremely anxious to see Income Tax brought down to the British level. I realise that in a democratic state it would be very difficult for a Minister for Finance to bring down the Income Tax, having reduced the Old Age Pensions. I do not ask him not to make the cut, but I suggest while making the cut he should look into the Income Tax Acts, and into their administration carefully, because he made a strong case, a case that has never been answered outside the Dáil, and which Deputy Johnson has not attempted to answer, when he said that 13 per cent. of the National Income went to pay Old Age Pensions as against 2 per cent. in Scotland. I think Deputy Johnson's answer to that was that Ireland had an abnormal number of people over 70 years of age. That abnormal number of people are old friends of mine. I have been meeting them for the last 15 years. From 1908, when the Old Age Pensions were introduced, we were told that Ireland had an abnormal number of people over 70 years of age. That was true in 1908, but if true now there must be an abnormal number of people now over 100 years. There were special circumstances in these days, owing to the effect of the famine and the exodus caused by the famine, but I believe now that the balance has been redressed, but that there is an abnormal number of people prepared to transfer their property to other people to get the pension. We should take into consideration not only the pensioner's own means, but the means of his children, who ought to support their parents in their old age, if they have the means to do it. An amendment should be introduced on these lines, and the Minister should not shrink from the consequences of making it legal liability for children to support their parents where they have the means to do it. A man is legally obliged to support his wife, and why should not children who have farms be compelled to support their parents? I have heard of one case, in Co. Carlow, where a man has the old age pension, and he has a son who is receiving £1,000 a year in the Police Force in Singapore. There are, as we all know, cases of that kind.

Mr. JOHNSON: Jurisdiction does not extend to Singapore.

Major BRYAN COOPER: The jurisdiction does not extend to Singapore. Deputy Johnson has made a point against that on legal grounds, but that is not a thing on which I would make a suggestion on. I leave it to the Attorney-General. I wish to turn from the old age pensioners with that suggestion—to the question of National Teachers. It is very remarkable we have heard so little from the Labour Party, that Deputy Johnson's has been the only speech on this amendment, and it is still more remarkable that Deputy Johnson, with his usual wisdom, will not go into Deputy O'Connell's point regarding broken contracts.

It has been made a great deal of. I think it is germane to the debate because Deputy O'Connell used it in argument on this question. It has been made an enormous amount of outside the Dáil, both by the National Teachers at their meetings and in correspondence in the Press. It was stated that a contract was made in 1920, and it is now being broken by the Minister. Was there never a contract made before 1920? Did not every Teacher who entered the employment of the State, enter into a contract to serve for a certain salary? Did the Teacher ever hesitate to have that salary increased? Never. You cannot have a contract binding on the employer and not on the employee. I took that view when I heard Deputy O'Connell speaking, and I am confirmed by this publication which is issued by the Irish National Teachers' Organisation.

Mr. GOREY: Hear, hear.

Major BRYAN COOPER: This publication says that in October, 1918, the teachers applied to have their claim for a temporary war bonus considered by the Arbitration Board. It was considered and adjudicated on, and it was far from satisfactory; but one of the conditions under which it was decided was that all the parties should pledge themselves beforehand to accept and abide by any decision arrived at by the Arbitration Board. The Teachers accepted the 1918 award, much as they were dissatisfied with its terms. The Teachers renewed their application for increased salaries and in June, 1919, they put forward a claim for a permanent scale. They abided by the award for nine months. They never hesitated to agitate to have their wages increased whenever they got an agreement they did not like, and is the Minister for Finance then to be debarred from taking steps to have their wages decreased when a new situation arises? Are the Teachers to be at liberty at any time to agitate against an agreement they have made, and pledged themselves to abide by? No wonder this publication is called "Broken Pledges"; the title is very appropriate indeed. Surely the common sense of the whole matter is that every contract is subject to variation. Take a case in which Deputy Good is to build me a house and a contract is entered into. Circumstances arise which make it onerous or impossible, and we can go into court. If we establish a case we can have that contract set aside.

Mr. JOHNSON: Hear, hear.

Major COOPER: This is the court, and the Deputy, by moving his amendment, has put the matter before the court, which is the Assembly of the nation.

Mr. JOHNSON: Will the Minister tell if he will accept the decision of the Court or appeal to the Court?

Mr. BLYTHE: I must accept the decision of the Court.

Major COOPER: It is obvious he must.

Mr. JOHNSON: Are we to take it, then, that the Minister acted in defiance of the Court and before the Court had decided?

Mr. BLYTHE: I acted within my power. I am appointed to an Executive office by this Assembly. I acted in pursuance of that office, and my action is subject to review by the Assembly that appointed me.

Major COOPER: Deputy Johnson has appealed to Cacsar in this amendment. If the amendment is carried, the Government go out of office and the Deputy has made his point. Surely it is not illegitimate on the part of the Minister to bring this forward? If he made the cut and refused us an opportunity of discussing it, I think it would be unfair; but, in the circumstances, I do not understand Deputy Johnson's point. I understand it almost as little as the suggestion that the National Teachers are peculiarly helpless, and not like the Army or the Gárda Síochána; they cannot strike back. I have been reading the reports of meetings of National Teachers, and I am bound to say that they have a pretty shrewd idea of how to hit back. I read the report of a meeting in Dublin. I do not know if Deputy Johnson was there, but Deputy O'Connell was, and he made a very judicious speech. A gentleman called Quinn at that meeting remarked that it would be the duty of all Teachers to advise the parents of the children not to invest in the Government's loan. That is a somewhat new idea of patriotism. He finally wound up by saying that if the Minister for Finance gave them all they wanted they would do their duty, but if not he might look out for trouble. These are the gentlemen who cannot strike back. It seems to me they can strike pretty effectively. I think that gentleman is a constituent of mine. As a teacher of citizenship and patriotism, I should say he was very highly paid, indeed, whatever salary he got, even if it were only a penny. Deputy Johnson's remedy is increased taxation. He made a great point of the Government's election manifesto. Unfortunately, during the elections he was laid up, and I do not think he can have brought home to those responsible for his campaign that his idea for removing the evils of the State was to increase taxation. I do not remember seeing anywhere in print: "Vote for Johnson and Increased Taxation." I sometimes wonder what would be the result if he had issued that? Secondly, his remedy was that the well-to-do classes would have to be content with simpler mode of living. They would have to do away with their motor cars, for instance. My withers are unwrung. I sold my car fourteen months ago and I could not get another one, because I have to meet double the taxation I was liable for in 1914.

I have to pay double taxation now on a smaller income. I wonder has it escaped Deputy Johnson's notice that there is an island three hours' journey away where that scale of living does not apply. Deputy Johnson must have a most extraordinary idea of the patriotism of the well-to-do classes in this country. I never realised it before, but I did not gather it from his speeches. He thinks that this class who have money in investments—investments that can be transferred—are tied to Ireland. They are not. What is left of their property they can easily dispose of, or they are probably prepared to sacrifice, and yet Deputy Johnson expects them to stay here and pay heavy taxation, when it is perfectly easy for them to transfer themselves and their investments to Great Britain, the Channel Islands, France, or anywhere else on the globe, and enjoy those amenities of existence that Deputy Johnson would not allow them here. His one remedy and solution for the evils of the State is increased taxation. Surely that way madness lies. No, sir, nobody likes economy. All economies are unpleasant, but taking it in this scale between Deputy Johnson and the Government I shall vote for the Minister for Finance's proposal and against the amendment.

Mr. GOREY: I suppose it is more or less expected from me and from the Party that I represent, that we should define our attitude on this question. I believe before the Minister for Finance ever came in for hard knocks over this question of the teachers' salaries that I had been having my share of it. I, too, have occupied columns after columns in the Press for the part I took here seven or eight months ago over the very same question. At that time, I simply gave a bald statement of what the salaries were. I made very little comment, and the statements that I made then have been borne out by several others. The statements that I made then, I am prepared to repeat now. The income, I said, of First Class Principals might be taken at £370 for men and £300 for women, with a Capitation Grant added. The Minister for Education is my authority; I am quoting his figures. These are the figures he gave. The facts are that 85 per cent. of the married teachers in my county are married to each other. The fact is that the male National teacher and the lady teacher are, in a large number of cases, husband and wife, and they run the schools between them.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Do farmers ever marry farmers?

Mr. GOREY: I will come to that later. The facts are that an income not less than £700, and probably not more than £800, is very often coming into one house in the country. Deputy O'Connell has interrupted about farmers. A good many of these teachers are also farmers. I can quote him dozens of them who are also farmers. I had one with me on Sunday evening who is also a farmer. He was canvassing me. Now, a 10 per cent. cut off a £700 or £800 income would mean £70 or £80 of a cut. That is a big thing coming out of any home. But I think these people who complain of their cut in income might easily console themselves with the fact that they have an income to cut. There are very few people in this nation at the moment, who have any income that can be reduced, and there are many people who have no income at all. There are very few people in the Saorstát at this moment with any income, and the man or woman with £700 or £800 of an income coming into the home is in a very happy position. They are the favoured few of the community. A good many people down in my part of the country, I am very glad to say, are able to indulge in some of the luxuries of life. It is no uncommon thing in my town. Last Saturday the teachers had a meeting, and anyone could see ten or twelve private motor-cars, belonging to the teachers, passing through the town. Well, the reduced cost of petrol will more than balance the proposed cut. They will be in a better position, considering the reduction in the price of petrol, than before. Lower grades will be quoted by the teachers. They have been quoted, in some arguments, as being in receipt of a salary of £120 a year or something like that. Now, these people in receipt of this salary are young men and young women living in the country and living very largely in their own homes. We know what living in your own home means in comparison to living in the City of Dublin, or in places other than your own home. I will not go into their educational qualifications at all, or into the cost which their educational qualifications entail. But I will try to contrast it with the case of the average citizen of Dublin. Thousands of young men and thousands of young women come up from the provinces to earn a living here. Then there are the cases of those who are born in the suburbs of Dublin. Some of these have to find a home far from their own, and have to live in what are called "digs." I understand the least figure at which they can live in decency in the City of Dublin would be 35s. a week. That is quite different from the tariff in the country. How many in the Government Departments here are in receipt of £3 a week? How many of the thousands of the typists in the City of Dublin are in receipt of £3 a week—people whose education cost them something and whose years of study were not a few. Take the case of stenographers and the other hosts of people who come up here from the country to make their living. Their education has cost them a lot.

They are not in receipt of any thing like the amount of even these low grade salaries and they have to live in Dublin, and to be respectable and to dress themselves well. These are the people—the average citizens—and these are the people asked to deny themselves the means of subsistence in order that the favoured few may be put in a position that they themselves can never attain to; for the citizen in Dublin with £3 a week, and the citizen in the country with £3 a week, are two different cases altogether. None of the speakers here, in dealing with this question, has made any contrast whatsoever with the position and salaries of teachers in other countries. I made a statement over half a year ago with regard to this question. The figures I quoted were not my figures; they were the figures of one of the leading journals in England—the “Daily Mail.” Its columns were opened to anybody who wanted to contradict their figures. Were they contradicted in the columns of the “Daily Mail” or in any newspaper in Ireland with any circulation? They were contradicted just on the eve of the late election in provincial newspapers where the men who wrote them knew they would never be seen. Mr. Mansfield and the rest of them wrote in the columns of the “Kilkenny People” to contradict these figures, and they tried to throw dust in the eyes of the electors. Column after column, week after week, were published in little country journals, where it was known they would never be seen, except by the local electors. Why were not these figures questioned—the figures for Belgium, France and America? If we were able to spend more on education than any of these countries and were able to pay our teachers more than any of these countries, then by all means let us do it, but are we able to pay more? Are the resources of this country greater than the resources of any other country? We stand higher on the list than any other country with regard to primary education. We pay more to our teachers, with the exception of England, than any other country. The only argument to justify this would be that we were in a better financial position if we were able to get money easily; but can we? Deputy Redmond very wisely said we have to cut our cloth according to our measure. We had better do it, and if we have to cut it on every other section of the community not only with people in receipt of salaries and wages, then we had better do it in regard to the teaching profession. It is asked why anything else has not been touched except these two services. The Minister for Agriculture has said that this is only the first instalment of the cuts in the different services. I welcome that statement, and I accept that as the Government's intention. It is time that not alone these services but every other service, including the Government service, should be recast, and seriously recast, and recast not from the bottom, but from top to bottom. Agreements have been entered into, and Deputy Cooper has dealt with these. We have all been reading these leaflets sent out by the Teachers' Organisation, and I see there have been several agreements. I think there were at least four. If these different agreements were broken, why not the last one be broken?

Mr. O'CONNELL: Did the teachers ever break their agreement?

Mr. GOREY: All these arguments against this cut are put forward from the Labour Benches ostensibly in the interest of the rank and file of Labour. I do not think for a moment we are deceiving Labour at all upon this question; we are not deceiving the rank and file. Labour will look for money where it thinks it is; it will look for income or a share of income where it is. It would be very foolish if they did not look for it where it is, and if we want money for reconstruction and for employment and for development we will have to retrench and look for it where it is, and the rank and file of Labour

[Mr. Gorey.] will find it on the Labour Benches represented by Deputy O'Connell; they will find there an income running into something like seven or eight hundred pounds a year. That is the place to look for it and not where it is not.

I have been talking to several men in the rank and file of the Labour movement on this question, and I know there are no cobwebs on their eyes at all. Deputy Johnson advised us to look around for other means to make a saving. I have heard that phrase from the Deputy before, but he has never yet pointed his finger as to where we are to look. He must have some idea himself, because otherwise he would not have given us the advice, but he has never yet told us where to look. Deputy Redmond also spoke, particularly with regard to the old age pensions. I want to make our position perfectly clear with regard to the old age pensions. We accept the proposal of the Minister for Finance only because of the fact that 9/- now represent a good deal more than 10/- did two years ago. As a matter of fact, from the figures put before us, 7/- now are worth as much as 10/- two years ago. We would not accept the reduction in the old age pensions were it not for the fact that 9/- to-day leaves the old age pensioner in a much better position than he was in two years ago. Deputy Redmond talks about the miserable pittance of 10/-. If it was a miserable pittance when it was fixed in 1920, what was it before that year? I believe it was only 5/- at first. If that is so, it must have been a still more miserable pittance then. What, I ask, was Deputy Redmond doing during all these years when the old age pensioners were receiving that still more miserable pittance of 5/-? He was a member of the British Parliament, which passed the Act dealing with the old age pensioners, and that was where he should have made his voice heard. He was in a position to make a protest, but did he do it?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE resumed the Chair at this stage.

A DEPUTY: He advocated 10/-, but his suggestion was not adopted.

Mr. GOREY: Then why did he not bring in a Private Bill and get the amount increased?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy is under a misapprehension. A private Member could not introduce a Bill to increase a public charge.

Mr. GOREY: I am sorry. We welcome these proposals as a step in the right direction. We accept the proposal with regard to the old age pensioners because the money value proposed in the cut represents, for the pensioners, a better position than they were in two years ago. Only for that we would oppose it. We recognise the fact that money must be found and that more millions must be found. We know that this year's revenue is not a normal revenue. I would like to know from the Minister for Finance how much of the income tax he received was normal for the current year, and how much of it was arrears that had been accruing for years. It has also to be remembered that we have to face reconstruction and development problems, and that we have to find employment for the unemployed. We will have to find money to do all these things, and in my opinion if we are to tackle all these problems we will have to find more than the million that has been referred to.

Someone made the suggestion to scrap the Ministry of Fisheries, and so spare us the £1,700 a year that is paid to the Minister in charge of that Department. I do not care what title you give to the Ministry of Fisheries, whether it is put under the Department of Agriculture or some other Department, it is going to cost the amount that it is now costing, and you will want some Department to deal with it. I say that if the Minister for Fisheries is to do justice to the position, and succeeds in developing the industry as it should be developed, he will have earned his £1,700 a year, and the money will have been well spent. No matter what heading you put the Ministry of Fisheries under it will cost just as much money as it does now under the title of Ministry of Fisheries. You will have to employ the same staff and there can be no saving in that respect. There has been some reference to this in the newspapers, but I say, with all due respect to these people, that they do not know what they are talking about. We heard another suggestion that money could be spared on the Governor-General's establishment, that a few thousand pounds could be spared. It would be well for people to remember that we want millions saved, and that millions and not thousands must be saved if we are to make this country solvent. If economies are to be made everyone in the nation will have to bear his share. The people in the country have not incomes of £700 or £800 a year. The average man in the class that I represent has no income at all. His income has disappeared. He had a bit of an income during the war, but he has none at all now, and he has to pay his way out of capital or pay out of the bank or not pay at all. If all the industries and all the professions of this country are going to be saddled on the agricultural industry, you will have this position: that every man engaged in agriculture will combine into one party and scrap every other section in the Saorstát.

General MULCAHY: In the discussion which we are having, and which is supposed to be on recurrent expenditure, Deputy Figgis dealt with certain points regarding the army to the prejudice, I think, of a clear discussion as to what is recurrent expenditure. The remarks that he made with regard to the army and its position were, from the point of view of non-recurrent expenditure pure and simple, and I think it well to deal with some of those points in order to remove certain impressions that may be created to the prejudice of what we are discussing here.

I might mention, with regard to Gormanstown, which is said to be a place in which vast retrenchment 8 o'clock. can be brought about, that there has been already within the last few days marked down for immediate demobilisation 211 men. As we use it at present, we do not anticipate that the life of Gormanstown as an institution will be longer than the present financial year—will outlast the present Army Vote. At the same time, it is absolutely essential that it should be thoroughly realised that we could never have got on up to the present without Gormanstown. It was absolutely essential in the circumstances in which we found ourselves that we should have an institution such as Gormanstown capable of doing all repairs to our motors without letting them outside army hands.

It is not fair also to say that the Government has not applied itself to cutting down expenditure in the Army in the same way as it proposes to cut down expenditure on salaries to teachers and payments made to old age pensioners. At the present moment you have upwards of 15,000 men in the army who are time-expired. In the next two or three weeks the demobilisation of that 15,000 men, as far as demobilisation in respect of the old terms is concerned, will take place.

Mr. JOHNSON: What will become of them?

General MULCAHY: Re-attestation will be offered to those of them that we consider are suitable for re-attestation in the army at the new rates. Whether that is cutting down the payment to soldiers at present serving or not is a matter of how you look at it.

Mr. JOHNSON: It is a new contract?

General MULCAHY: It is a new contract, but it is tackling the immediate problem, and tackling it immediately. It is suggested that the payments made to army officers may be cut down. Army officers at present serving are serving under very special conditions, and in a service that may terminate at any time. There is not a single officer in the army to whom you could hold out a definite prospect that he will be continued in his position for, say, two or three years, and it would be unreasonable, considering the work that officers in the army have done, and the problematic term of office, that there should be any cutting down of the salaries paid to the present officers.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I am reluctant to interrupt, but I should be sorry that the Minister should labour under any delusion or illusion with regard to what I said. I was not dealing with the question so much of economy as the question of morale. I was therefore dealing, not with the salaries of the majority of the rank and file officers—

if I might use that expression—as with regard to the higher type of officers, and, therefore, with the highest type of salary.

General MULCAHY: With regard to the three members of the Army Council, the Deputy did not suggest what particular cutting down could be made in the amounts paid to those officers. I doubt if there is anybody who, realising the responsibilities that rested on the members of the Army Council for the last 12 months, could reasonably suggest that there should be any cutting down in the amounts paid to them as persons occupying the particular position that they occupy. The name of Marshal Foch has been mentioned, and I fear that the Deputy has mixed up his calculation when transferring Irish money into French money. The task that Marshal Foch was called upon to face, with his experience and training, for his country, was not greater than the task that these members of the Army Council, with their training and experience, were called upon to face for their country, and the achievements of the members of the Army Council for their country will, I am perfectly satisfied, not be written down in history as less than any achievement of Marshal Foch for his country.

The question of whether the present army might not be replaced by a militia, costing two millions or one and a half millions, is not a question that arises on the points of criticism that the Deputy raised. You have to deal with the present situation; with the machinery that you have. At the beginning of the period of hostilities here you might say that you had a militia, and your militia system, faced with the circumstances of 12 months ago, left you without any control of any kind over very much the greater portion of your country; and you cannot, in my opinion, talk of establishing a militia system for, at any rate, the next three or four years. You are tied by your circumstances here. We are laying our plans in this matter of the demobilisation in such a way that we shall probably leave you, at the end of this financial year, with an army of 20,000 men—that is, 10,000 men less than we estimated we would have.

The circumstances in which we will leave that army of 20,000 men at the beginning of the next financial year will not be such as will bind the Government or this Assembly to the retention of an army of that size for the twelve ensuing months, if circumstances do not warrant it. The expenditure on the army will have to depend on the circumstances that face you in the country. While we may hope that they will be such that you can reduce your army even below 20,000, you cannot afford experiments in shifting from the type of army you have at present to a militia system, or any other system like that, until you know in what particular atmosphere you are discussing a proposal like it, and for, at any rate, three or four years. These matters are being thought of by the army authorities. On the general matter of army accounts and army extravagance, which is so much talked of, you hear it suggested from time to time that there has been unnecessary extravagance in the army because inexperienced people have been in charge, and because you have an inexperienced army. I doubt if anyone who knows anything about armies will be very much struck with an argument of that type. Armies in warfare are extravagant, but they are carrying out a business in circumstances where you cannot have ordinary routine methods. There must inevitably be additional extravagance as a result of the manner in which matters have to be carried out. I think it well, for the comfort of Deputies, to state that the system of keeping army accounts is such that I can give you the figures of expenditure in the army up to and including the month of October. That is, on the 14th of November, I can tell you what the army has spent on itself up to the 31st of October. The total Army Estimate was £10,679,500. For the seven months ending the 31st October there was £6,750,810 spent, or 63.2 per cent. of the total Army Estimate. Seventwelfths of the Estimate would be less than that. It would be 58.3 per cent. The first seven months of expenditure for the army were, naturally, the heaviest months. The expenditure for the month of October itself was £779,750, that is, 7.3 per cent. of the whole Estimate. If the expenditure during October was on the ordinary pro rata percentage, it would be 8.3 per cent. That is, 8.3 per cent. would be one-twelfth of the total expenditure. So that your expenditure in October is only seven-eighths of a month's pro rata expenditure, showing that, while you are to some extent overspent for the first seven months, because of the excessive strength the army carried during that time, your expenditure in October shows you are very much on the decline. The expenditure will decrease much more rapidly during the ensuing four months, say, December, January, February and March. While, as I say, that has to some extent crossed the present discussion, I am glad to see from the general feeling of the Dáil that it has not prejudiced the appreciation of the necessity for cutting down both the amount of money set aside for payment of teachers and for old age pensioners. It is not correct to say that the cutting down of either of these amounts is simply because of the fall in the cost of living. Cutting down these amounts is owing to the absolute necessity of reducing your total expenditure, and these are two obvious and outstanding items in which it is possible to reduce expenditure. The reference to the cost of living was made simply in order to demonstrate that it is not unreasonable that such cutting down should take place, and particularly when the cutting down does not bring undue hardship upon any one of these two classes.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS. ORAL ANSWERS.

COLLEGE OF SCIENCE.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN asked the President whether it is the intention of the Government to retain permanently the College of Science for Departmental Offices, and if so, to state whether an equivalent alternative institution will be provided elsewhere.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. E. Blythe) replying for the President: The present position as regards accommodation in Government Buildings makes it impossible to release the College of Science at the present time. The students have been and are provided with alternative accommodation.

FUTURE LEGISLATION.—METHOD OF ACQUAINTING DEPUTIES.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS asked the President if it is the accepted policy of the Executive Council to acquaint Deputies of the proposed future course of legislation through the Publicity Department and the public Press rather than by statement in the legislative chamber?

Mr. BLYTHE (replying for the President): I do not know exactly what is in the Deputy's mind. The general lines of legislation were indicated to the Oireachtas in the Governor-General's speech.

The Deputy will realise, of course, that Press forecasts are sometimes accurate and sometimes misleading, and that it is on occasion necessary to take immediate steps to correct erroneous statements.

REPAYMENT OF OVERCHARGED DUTY.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for Finance whether the Revenue Commissioners wrote, on October 20th, to Mr. G. L. MacCormick, the Pharmacy, Monkstown, regretting that he had been overcharged 2/- duty on a drug imported by him, and stating that the amount would be repaid; whether he is aware that the amount has not yet been repaid; and whether he will take steps to expedite the payment.

Mr. BLYTHE: The facts are as stated in the first part of the question. Authority for repayment of the overcharge has been issued and payment of the 2/- will be made by the Post Office.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Arising out of that answer, will the Minister try to expedite the Post Office in this matter, as his Department is primarily concerned?

Mr. BLYTHE: As the drug was imported through the Post Office, payment falls to be made by the Postal Department. We have ascertained on the telephone that payment will be made forthwith.

Mr. JOHNSON: It is well to know that the telephone is working.

EMBARGO ON COFFEE ESSENCES.

Mr. JOHN GOOD asked the Minister for Finance what steps he proposes to take to remove the embargo on the importation of coffee essences, and to substitute an adequate duty thereon, as recommended by the Fiscal Commission; further, whether he is aware that the continuance of this embargo is depriving the Free State of an important source of income, and is, in addition, causing much inconvenience to a large number of persons who use these essences?

Mr. BLYTHE: The recommendation made by the Fiscal Inquiry Committee in their second interim report that the existing import prohibition on coffee essences should be removed, and an adequate import duty substituted is at present under consideration, and I will make a statement as to the Government's intentions in due course. The prohibition is, in any case, a Statutory one, and can only be removed by legislation in the Oireachtas. I am not at all sure that I can accept the Deputy's argument that the removal of this prohibition would necessarily augment the Free State Revenues. If the import prohibition were removed, the imports of coffee essences would displace pro tanto imports of ordinary coffee which now pay duty, and it does not by any means follow that the Free State Revenues would gain as a result of the change, but the subject is one which can scarcely be dealt with by way of question and answer.

Mr. GOOD: I understood that prior to the embargo there was a duty on these essences?

Mr. BLYTHE: It dates from 1850.

CARTER'S CLAIM.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that John Higginbottom, of Nurney, Kildare, who has been employed as a carter, at £4 4s. per week, in Kildare Barracks, has furnished his bill for £88 4s., for the twenty-one weeks' carting ending 29th September, 1923, and that, although this account has been certified as correct by Lieutenant (Quartermaster) P. O'Rourke and Captain J. Flanagan, O.C., Kildare Barracks, on the 23rd October, 1923, Higginbottom has not yet been paid, and whether instructions will be given to have this account settled at once.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): A certified claim for the amount stated has been received from Mr. Higginbottom. Arrangements are being made to expedite payment.

WOUNDED CIVILIANS' CLAIMS FOR COMPENSATION.

ALFRED O BROIN asked the Minister for Defence if he will state the result of the consideration promised to the claims for compensation in the following cases:—John Ward, 30 Railway Street, Dublin; Thomas Flanagan, 38

Railway Street, Dublin; Patrick Farrelly, 86 Railway Street, Dublin; Patrick Hickey, 38 Lower Gloucester Street, Dublin; Minnie McCoy, 26 Waterford Street, Dublin; all of whom were wounded by National troops, firing on an escaping prisoner, on 19th May last; whether, if not eligible for compensation, he will take steps to have their case considered for an ex gratia payment.

General MULCAHY: It has been found that any wounds received by Messrs. Ward, Flanagan, Farrelly, Hickey and Miss Coy were the result of the discharge of firearms by some person or persons unknown assisting the escape of a man who was about to be arrested. The persons mentioned are not eligible for compensation from public funds. It is regretted that it is not feasible to entertain the suggestion as regards making them ex gratia payments.

Mr. A. BYRNE: Arising out of the Minister's reply, in which he states that these wounds were inflicted by some person or persons unknown, is he aware that these men were in the uniform of the National Army, and that they must be known to somebody?

General MULCAHY: I am not aware that the persons who fired those shots were in the uniform of the National Army, and I will be glad to receive any evidence to that effect. A full inquiry was held into the matter, and at this inquiry the persons named in the answer were allowed to give evidence and were cross-examined. No evidence was brought forward at that inquiry to that effect.

Mr. BYRNE: This is the first time it was contradicted.

TELEPHONE FOR CARRIGALINE.

SEAN PRIOMHDHAIL asked the Postmaster-General whether he has received a Petition, signed by the residents and business people of Carrigaline and district, asking that a public telephone be installed, and if so, whether steps will be taken to give the facilities required.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. J. J. Walsh): A petition asking for the opening of a Telephone Call Office at Carrigaline was received on the 6th instant. The necessary enquiry is being made and a decision will be given as soon as possible.

IRISH MERCANTILE FLAG.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce if any decision has been taken, as the result of the steps being taken to this end (as intimated in an answer made on his behalf on the 10th of May last), to establish an Irish mercantile flag; whether any Bill has been drafted to give statutory recognition to such a flag; and, if so, when this Bill may be expected to be brought before the Oireachtas.

MINISTER for INDUSTRY and COMMERCE (Mr. J. McGrath): I have nothing at present to add to the answer given on this matter on the 10th of May last.

Mr. JOSEPH McBRIDE: Would the Minister, when he is designing the mercantile flag, design a war flag?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is a different matter.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Arising out of the Minister's answer, I would like to know if the assurance then given, which was tantamount to a pledge, still remains an assurance that steps had been taken to establish an Irish mercantile flag?

Mr. McGRATH: Yes.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT IN KILDARE.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Local Government if he is aware that widespread unemployment exists throughout the County of Kildare; also, that several trunk roads, radiating from Dublin, pass through it, being a heavy tax on the ratepayers; and whether, in order to give employment and relieve the ratepayers' burden, instructions will be given to have the grant from the Roads Improvement Fund increased from £2,730 to £8,000, the latter sum being the amount collected in motor taxes in the county.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. J. Burke): I am not aware of any special representations having been made as to unemployment in County Kildare. The allocation of the Road Fund is made primarily for the improvement of trunk roads, and their extent in the various counties is fully considered. Ordinary maintenance charges are a matter for the County Council. The sum of £100,000, which has been provided from the Road Fund, is a preliminary advance. The Deputy will appreciate the fact that the sum collected for motor taxes in a county is not necessarily the appropriate sum for expenditure from the Road Fund in that county.

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO LAND ACT, 1923.

TOMAS MAC EOIN asked the Minister for Agriculture whether his attention has been called to the statement made by the Minister for Finance respecting the financial position of the State, and whether, in view of his demand for a curtailment of public expenditure, it is proposed to introduce a Bill to amend the Land Act of 1923, in so far as it provides for the payment by the State to the landlords of 10 per cent. of the purchase price of land.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. Hogan): The Deputy is under a misapprehension as to the facts. There is no question of payment of vendors in cash. They are paid in bonds. The purchase money of an average tenancy was fixed at fifteen years' purchase of the rent. In the normal course the purchaser pays the purchase money, and under the terms of the Land Act would pay $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on any money lent to him by the State for this purpose. Under former Land Acts the tenant's payment was either $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. or $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. on the purchase money. The increase in the rates of interest was due to the European War mainly. In order to relieve the tenant from the increase in the rate of interest, I recommended, and the Dáil agreed, that the Treasury should pay the interest and sinking fund on one-eleventh of the purchase money of tenanted land. Provisions to effect this were inserted in the Land Act of 1923, and I do not propose to introduce a Bill to alter these provisions. The total amount which the State must find for this purpose, when land purchase under the 1923 Act is completed, will be about £60,000 per annum. Payments under this head will only mature gradually and will not approach the maximum figure during the current financial year.

Mr. JOHNSON: Has the Minister consulted with the Minister for Finance to find out whether even £60,000 is worth consideration, or has he taken any step leading up to it?

Mr. HOGAN: That question is begging the answer, if I may invert the saying.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

MULLINGAR PRE-TRUCE CLAIM.

Mr. PATRICK W. SHAW asked the Minister for Defence if he has decided to allow compensation to Joseph Mulkearns (Ref. No. 653/88), of Mount Street, Mullingar, who was severely wounded on December 12th, 1920, and was afterwards sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment; whether, as this man is physically unfit to earn a living, owing to disabilities contracted during active service, favourable consideration may be given to his application, which has been so long under consideration.

General MULCAHY: Prima facie it appears that Mr. Mulkearns is entitled to compensation under the Army Pensions Act, 1923, but as his case has not yet been fully investigated, I cannot say definitely. He was not wounded in action, but was badly beaten by Crown Forces. Consideration of his case will be expedited as much as possible.

CLAIM FOR DEPENDENT'S ALLOWANCE.

Major BRYAN R. COOPER asked the Minister for Defence whether his attention has been called to the claim of Mrs. Cecilia Griffin, of Dean's Grange, Blackrock, Co. Dublin, for dependent's allowance in respect of her son, No. 22580, Corporal Thomas Griffin, 44th Infantry Battalion; whether he is aware that she was informed on March 21st, and again on September 26th, that the matter was in the hands of the Investigation Branch, and whether he will take steps to expedite the investigation.

General MULCAHY: Mrs. Griffin was informed on the 21st March last that her claim for dependents' allowance in respect of her son, Corporal Thomas Griffin, was under investigation. She was notified on the 27th June last that the claim was rejected. It had been found, after due investigation, that the extent of the dependence which, in the case of an unmarried soldier, is taken to be the amount normally contributed by him to his home over and above the cost (if any) of his own maintenance therein for a reasonable period prior to enlistment, was less than the minimum specified by regulations, namely, 12/- per week, before an allowance may be issued. It should be stated that the regulations in a case of this kind are based on a recognition of an obligation on the part of the soldier to contribute to the support of his dependents a reasonable portion of his army pay, this portion being calculated as 8/- per week in the case of a soldier receiving ordinary rate of pay.

On the 4th September Mrs. Griffin filled in a claim for dependents' allowance in respect of her son Martin, but in a covering letter she stated that as her son Martin did not reside with her, she therefore did not expect anything for him. She was inadvertently informed, on 26th September, that this claim was under investigation, but in view of her letter referred to the investigation of the claim was not pursued.

QUESTION ON ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. P. McKENNA: I beg to give notice that I will raise on the adjournment a question of urgent national importance, namely, the recent embargo on Irish live stock, in order to give the Minister for Agriculture an opportunity of stating to the Dáil the official position as it is at present.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This question is to be raised on the adjournment, but not as a matter of urgent national importance.

INTERPRETATION BILL, 1923.— FIRST STAGE.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Mr. H. Kennedy): I desire to ask leave to introduce the Interpretation Bill, 1923. The title of the Bill is: "A Bill to prescribe rules for the construction of Acts of the Oireachtas and to define the meaning of certain words and expressions commonly used in such Acts, and for other purposes relating to the meaning, construction, and operation of Acts of the Oireachtas, and of instruments made under the authority thereof."

The Bill is in the nature of a draftsman's Bill, the effect of which will be to make certain definitions of terms and to facilitate the shortening of Bills and the getting rid of verbiage by having unnecessary repetitions and unnecessary definitions.

Captain REDMOND: Are the words "United Kingdom" included in those terms?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Wait and see

Mr. CORISH: Those words ought to be familiar.

Leave granted to introduce the Bill. Second stage ordered for November 22nd, 1923.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S ADDRESS.

DEBATE RESUMED.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The motion before the Dáil was: "That the Dáil returns thanks to the Governor-General for his address and approves of the legislative programme of the Government as outlined therein," to which an amendment was proposed by Deputy Johnson: "To delete all after the word 'Address' and to substitute therefor the words, 'but while approving of the decision of Ministers to 'avoid waste and extract the utmost value from all public expenditure' (Par. 23), cannot agree to methods of retrenchment which would be detrimental to education or which would cause suffering to the aged poor.'"

Mr. GOOD: In the discussion that has taken place on the amendment just read out, I fear the Dáil has, to some extent, lost sight of the object of the important statement made by the Minister for Finance. I will read the opening paragraph of that statement so as to remind the Dáil of the object which the Minister had in view in making that statement. He stated: "As we have reached the stage when the credit of Saorstát Eireann is for the first time to be put to the test of an appeal for funds to be borrowed in the open market I think it is proper that I should acquaint the Dáil with such particulars of the financial situation as will enable an accurate judgment to be formed of how we actually stand."

The Minister very rightly recognised that there was in the minds of a great many persons in the Free State some very considerable doubt as to the financial position and the financial stability of the Free State Government, and in view of the loan which he proposes to call for he thought it wise to make a statement on the whole financial situation. That statement, I think, justified the feeling that existed, and which was known to many of us in the constituencies during the recent election. I would like here to say that the Minister's very full and frank statement has done much to restore confidence and to allay that feeling. That statement has revealed a very serious financial situation. He informed us that the Budget this year would be some eighteen and a half millions short of the amount necessary to balance. Of that eighteen and a half millions he proposed to raise seventeen and a half by borrowing, and to get a further sum of one million from other sources. He further informed us that in addition to that one million there would be a debit in the coming Budget of some two millions to meet debt charges, making altogether a sum of approximately three millions, which will have to be raised. As he pointed out, there are two means by which that money may be obtained—either by increased income, on the one hand, through taxation, or reduced expenditure on the other side.

All will agree that the Minister adopted the wiser course in refusing to add to the present burden of taxation in the Free State. As he pointed out in his statement, the Free State at present is suffering from an exceedingly high rate of taxation, much higher than that which exists in Great Britain. To add to that burden would have only helped further to kill industry and further to aggravate the serious problem of unemployment. Might I point out to the Deputies of this Dáil, in connection with this matter, the serious increase per head of the population that has occurred in this country during recent years? In 1914 it cost £2 16s. per head of the population to govern Ireland. In 1916 it had risen to £2 17s.; in 1919 to £5; and in 1923 it exceeds £10 per head. In view of these figures, few will deny the wisdom of the Minister to decide on reducing expenditure rather than adopting possibly what might be looked upon as the line of least resistance—that of increasing taxation. Now, having decided to take this course of reducing expenditure, naturally whatever particular department he decided on to make the object of his retrenchment in that department there would be considerable objection to any retrenchment. I think if exception can be taken at all to his statement and the methods he proposes, it is this, that instead of taking two isolated cases he should have allowed, or should have called for the report from that survey that he informed us he was having made of the expenses in the various departments.

Deputies will remember the statement. He says "Savings on such a scale are not possible without retrenchment over the whole field of the public services, wherever there is a discretion for applying it. A survey is accordingly at present in progress of every head of public expenditure for the purpose of ascertaining where curtailment can be affected with the least detriment to the public interest."

If exception can be taken at all to the action of the Minister I think it is to the fact that he did not get this survey before he made his statement because possibly if it could have been brought home to the minds of all the various public departments that retrenchment was absolutely necessary in the national interests, and that, all would have to bear their share in the national interests of that retrenchment he would have avoided much of the opposition that has been raised by those two isolated sections. First of all with regard to the case of the teachers if we are to have retrenchment in public departments, as appears to be absolutely necessary, they must be treated all on the same terms. It would be obviously unfair to call on the members of the Civil Service or certain Departments to make sacrifices and to refuse to apply the same retrenchment scheme to other departments. It appears to me to be a question of all or none. When the Minister decided on a policy of retrenchment in public departments I do not see that the teachers have any real grievances. I think much the same can be said with regard to the old age pensions, because both the increases in the case of the teachers and in the rate of the old age pensions were made on the basis of the increase in the cost of living, and it is only reasonable to ask when this cost of living has come down that the increase put on to meet the increase in the cost of living should likewise come down. That is a principle, I think, which ought to be generally admitted. I think, speaking as a Deputy in the Dáil, that the figures which the Minister gave us in connection with old age pensions caused some alarm. Few of us were aware that the old age pensions in the Free State to-day amounted to such a large sum as 13.2 per cent. of the Free State Income. That, to my mind, is an exceedingly alarming figure, and one which I think needs some enquiry. I would suggest, in this connection, that there are three Departments, two of them State Departments and a third a Local Department, which might be put under one head to avoid overlapping and waste. You have old age pensions, unemployment payments, and in addition to these you have, what is in many areas a very heavy charge, the question of outdoor relief. I am quite satisfied that if we can see these three funds administered in the one Department instead of under three heads a considerable saving in the amount of waste would be effected.

Now, I come to a subject that I must say I feel to some extent responsible in connection with:

It is the statement of the Minister

[Mr. Good.]
with regard to grants for housing. He stated:—

That, to my mind, is a most serious and important statement, and ought to have the careful consideration of all those engaged on both sides of this large industry. What is wrong with the building industry that houses are not being built? The simple answer is, as all those engaged in the industry know, that houses are not an economic investment. Costs are too high. Wages in the Free State in the building industry are the highest in these countries. I have here a return which shows a comparison of the wages at present paid in the industry. In 1914 tradesmen in Dublin were paid 9d. an hour; the same tradesmen now receive 1s. 10½d. an hour, an increase of 150 per cent. In London, in 1914, tradesmen—I have taken bricklayers as an example—received 11½d.; they receive to-day 1s. 7½d, an increase of 69.5 per cent. Deputies will note that in the case of London, where they are paid a higher rate than in the eight great cities in Great Britain, they received 69 per cent. of an increase, which is practically equivalent to the increase in the cost of living over pre-war rates, as against 150 per cent. in Dublin. In Glasgow the increase is 80.9 per cent., and in Belfast it is 111.1 per cent. That is in the case of tradesmen. Let us take the case of building labourers. In Dublin we are paying labourers 1s. 4d. per hour, as against 5d. in pre-war days, an increase of 220 per cent. In London labourers are paid 1s. 2½d.

as against 11½d. in pre-war, or an increase of 84.4 per cent. as against 220 per cent. in Dublin. In Glasgow the rate is 90 per cent. over pre-war, and in Belfast 166 per cent., so that you see, as regards the four centres that I have taken, Dublin, in the case of tradesmen and in the case of labourers, is very much higher than any of the other centres. What is the result of that? Take a house that cost £400 in pre-war days. What is the effect of that increase of wages on that particular house? I arrive at that by adding 185 per cent. to £200. I am divulging what is known as a trade secret, I am afraid, in order to give you this information. It is that in making up the cost of an ordinary house building materials would practically account for one half of the cost and labour for the other half. The increase in materials at the moment is approximately 100 per cent., so that if you add 185 per cent. to £200 you get a sum of £570, and if you add 100 per cent. to the other moiety of £200 you get a sum of £400. The total amounts to £970, so that on that basis a house that cost £400 in pre-war days cost £970 to-day, which, everybody will agree, is not an economic proposition, and consequently no houses are being built.

We have been told in this connection that the reduction in wages on the other side has not brought about any increase in the industry. Only last night I read a statement made by the responsible Minister for housing schemes in Great Britain. It was to the effect that at the moment more houses were in course of erection in Great Britain than at any time since 1909, so that that will, I think, refute the statement that the lowering of wages has not brought about any increase in the production of houses.

Deputies will recollect that Deputy Johnson made a strong point in connection with the position of building in Copenhagen. That was made some little time ago. I will refresh the memories of Deputy Johnson and the other Deputies by reading the statement that he then made.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The arrangement we made yesterday was that this amendment would open the question of economy and retrenchment. Deputy Good has gone into a subject which seems to have no connection with the amendment, no matter how one regards the amendment, and I think he is going to quote now from a speech which was made on the main question.

Mr. GOOD: Yes, but the whole subject is referred to, with all respect, in the matter of the statement made by the Minister for Finance, and that statement, I think all the Deputies will agree, is of such importance to all those engaged in the industry that it is necessary that the facts in connection with the industry should be made clear.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I quite agree, but it is merely what would be the best time for having a discussion on the particular question. We were rather on the question of economy and retrenchment, and if Deputy Good's line is followed, as I should imagine it will be, by other Deputies, speaking for or against his point of view, we would have a discussion on housing, the cost of housing, and wages in the building trade, sandwiched in between speeches such as we heard yesterday dealing with the reduction of teachers' salaries and old age pensions, and making suggestions for possible economies which the Government might put into operation. I think it would be better if the discussion on housing took place after we had disposed of the amendment, and when the main question is before us. I did not like to interrupt Deputy Good at first, but as a matter of arrangement, I think it will be better if we disposed of this amendment first, and took up the question of housing and the building trade, which is a separate question, afterwards. It is merely a matter of when we take it up, and Deputy Good will not, of course, be precluded from making a speech on the general question, and bringing in the matter he is now bringing in, and others will not be precluded from following him.

I think the Dáil will agree that we are now mixing up two totally different matters in one debate. For example, I am quite sure that there will be a very elaborate reply on this question of wages in the building trade, and a comparison with England and other places, and if that gets in between our discussion on this amendment I am afraid we will be in difficulties. I would let Deputy Good go on the main question.

Mr. GOOD: Well, I am finished on the main question, and really my object in intervening at all was to make the position with regard to building clear. Of course you will understand that it was referred to in the address from the Governor-General, and it was also referred to in a very pointed way in the statement made by the Minister for Finance. I think under the circumstances, however, I was justified in dealing with the matter at some length.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I have no objection to the length of the matter at all. The Deputy will be in order on resuming on the general question, and that will give us a discussion which will be more in order at that particular time, and if the Deputy does not continue now on that matter we could postpone the consideration of it until the amendment is disposed of.

Mr. GOOD: I quite agree.

Mr. MORRISSEY: Listening to the criticism of the workers of Ireland, which has fallen from the lips of some of the Deputies of the Farmers' Party, one would be inclined to believe that their chief function here is to still lower the poor standard of living of all grades of Irish labourers. We on those benches desire the prosperity of the Irish farmers, for of course we realise that agriculture is our main industry, and that the success and efficiency of that industry is essential to the development of the resources of the nation, and we know that industrial peace is essential to the development of the resources of the nation, but you cannot have industrial peace merely by wishing that it should be.

You cannot nor, I dare say, will not have it by attempting to fling unjust discredit on the poor; by persistent condemnation and abuse of the underdog. Nobody wishes to change positions with him; nobody will if they can avoid it. The Ministry found him wretched enough and they now propose to increase his wretchedness by taking from him a share of the comforts given him by an alien Government. They pay repeated and eloquent lip-service to the rights and powers of Irish democracy, but the Ministry never consulted the country as to the desires of the people in reference to old age pensions. Democratic Governments appeal to their people for support on some definite programme of proposed legislation. Our Ministry made their appeal on their achievement in smashing or crushing for the time being the attempt made by an armed minority to establish supremacy in the country, and their victory at the polls does not give them the right to come forward now to weaken the prop, if I might put it so, under the old people of the country.

We are told that this blow to the poor is the result of the destructive civil war that was carried on in the country during the last 12 or 18 months, but England carried on a war at a cost of seven millions per day for four or five years, and did not cut the old age pensions. There has been a greater fall in the cost of living in England than there has been in this country, yet no Minister there would dare come forward with a proposition to cut the old age pensions because of that. The Government here sought no mandate from the people for this, and they know very well that they would get no mandate to carry out what I call this inhuman act in the name of economy.

The Government from time to time, both in the newspapers and in the Dáil, have boasted of their economies in the Post Office. How have those economies been brought about? By reducing the wages of the poorer paid officials and by dispensing with the services of auxiliary postmen and turning them adrift. I will cite one or two instances which have been brought under my notice in my own constituency. An auxiliary postman, with a wife and five children, and with 20 years' service, had his wages reduced to 11s. per week. Of course, the Postmaster-General will tell us that his work was curtailed. I admit it was, as he delivers now only on alternate days. Still he is compelled to contribute for unemployment insurance, and notwithstanding the fact that he is idle three days in the week his work is arranged in such a way that he will not be allowed to draw any unemployment benefit. Another auxiliary postman with 40 years' service was treated in a somewhat similar way. These are some of the economies that have been carried out in the Post Office that we hear so much of.

The Government also take great credit for the big reductions they are making in the army, but they do not indicate what public works they are going to provide in order to give employment to demobilised men. These men, in most instances, have gone to join the big army of the unemployed, and the policy of the Government as regards the urgent needs of the workers seems to be a policy of ruin or drift, the end of which no man can foresee, but which, I think, every thoughtful man should look forward to with an amount of dread.

The Government during their election campaign recently did not consult the people as regards the cut which they are making in the salaries of national teachers. The national teachers are the men and the women that we used to be told were the spear-head of Sinn Féin. They were supposed to be the sponsors of the movement that led to the establishment of the Free State. The movement was called by the Government's late opponents that of the mad schoolmasters. Now, one of the first official acts of the Ministry is to reduce the teachers' salaries by 10 per cent. One feels inclined to ask when did the Minister for Finance become such a superman that he can alter and fix matters vital to the nation without the consent of the people. I might ask why the teachers, who are a respectable and intelligent body of men and women, were not consulted and asked to assist in framing economy proposals suitable to the Service before the Minister to put his cut into operation. It is my firm conviction that the credit of this country cannot be maintained by trying to fling unjust discredit on the poor, as has been sought to be done by several Deputies. We have heard and read a lot during the last few weeks with regard to abuses in connection with old age pensions. I agree that there are abuses, and must be abuses, just as in every other service, but they have been magnified here and in the newspapers in order to cover the inhumanity of the cut.

The Minister stated that he will not hesitate to scrap other services, the maintenance of which cannot be justified. Since the Minister has seen fit to start his cuts on old age pensioners one will not be surprised if the next thing we hear is that the Minister is going to try the pruning knife on the dole, and to leave the unemployed on compulsory hunger strike, for want of food. We, on these benches, would like to get an assurance from the Minister that it is not his intention, if I might put it so, to steal all the eggs from the Labour hen-roosts.

Mr. THOMAS NAGLE: I want to support the amendment of Deputy Johnson. In doing so, I would like to draw particular attention to 4 o'clock, the old age pensions cut.

There were some statements made by Deputies regarding the reasonableness of this cut that I wish to refer to. The Minister for Agriculture and Deputy Good stated that when the old age pension was increased to 10/- it was on the basis of the cost of living, and that as the cost of living had since gone down, the Government were more than reasonable in only reducing the pension by 10 per cent. The Minister for Agriculture congratulated Deputy Johnson on his mathematics. I am sorry that I cannot congratulate the Minister on his mathematics. If, as he admitted, the cost of living was 120 per cent. above the 1914 level when the 10/- was fixed, then the figure was certainly not fixed on the basis of the increased cost of living, as I have yet to learn that 10/- is 120 per cent. over 5/-. I would also like to point out that before the cost of living went down below that figure—

Mr. HOGAN: On a point of explanation, what I did say was, that the old age pension was increased at that date because of the increase in the cost of living, and must have had some relationship to it. That is what I said.

Mr. NAGLE: I accept your explanation, but I suggest the relationship is very distant—something in the nature of a thirty-first cousin. The Minister for Finance mentioned that the pension remained at 10/- when the cost of living figure was 176 per cent. above the pre-war figure. "Judged in this light alone," he said, "it is manifest that a fall in the cost of living index figure to the present level of 80 per cent. above pre-war makes a prima facie case for substantial reduction of the pension." The way I would reason that out would be, instead of reducing the old age pension now, if it ever had to be reduced, or if it was considered reasonable to reduce it in proportion to the cost of living, that the Government should at least allow it to stand for such a period after the cost of living had gone down as would make up for the money that the pensioners did not get, but should have got, during the period when the cost of living was mounting from 100 per cent. pre-war to 176 per cent. which it arrived at in November, 1920. The Minister for Agriculture suggested that Deputy Johnson might ask the Government to increase it as from 1908 to 1914. I think that at least it should have been increased, specially if you are going to settle everything on the cost of living basis, during the period when the cost of living went above 100 points over the 1914 level. I am supporting this amendment because I object to wage reductions in any case, and also because I object generally to the statement made by the Minister for Finance. The reason I object to that statement is because the Minister for Finance and other Deputies who spoke appear to have no other remedy for the industrial situation, and for the general economic needs of the country than a reduction of wages. They do not appear to bother their heads in the least about attempting to reduce the profits, that we all know have been made in this country during the past few years.

Let us see from his own statement the difference between people who draw interest, say, and the people who earn wages. The Minister made a statement to the effect that perhaps a million and a quarter would be spent on the improvement and repair of roads during the next eighteen months. Further on in his speech he said:

"It is an essential feature of these schemes that they cannot be initiated until definite recognition is given to the fact that the Government, in the financial and economic interests of the country, cannot consent to allow them to be conducted in a manner that would raise or keep prices or wages above the nominal level at which they should fairly stand at the present time."

I presume the phrase "nominal level at which they should fairly stand" is to be in proportion to the present cost of living figures, as compared with 1914. There is another reference in the Minister's speech to which I take great exception, and this, in conjunction with what he had previously said, states the whole case. Talking about the loan, the Minister said:

"The loan that we are about to issue will, in accordance with the recent Appreciation Act, have the absolute security of the Central Fund of Saorstát Éireann, and, the charge in favour of the stockholders will, therefore, secure their rights in priority to any of the demands made on the Exchequer for the ordinary public services of the State. In addition to being an entirely gilt-edged security, the loan will possess for subscribers the advantage of giving a yield which, as this is our first venture on the open market, must necessarily be somewhat more favourable than that obtainable in other investments of like standing."

Later in his speech the Minister said: "Next to this source the realisation of investments at present held in Government and other securities abroad is likely to be of the most service both to the State and to the investor, who will obtain by the exchange a higher income and at least equal security." [Official Report, Column 675-7, Nov. 2nd, 1923.]

Deputy Cooper, in talking yesterday about the teachers, gave a quotation from a recent meeting in Dublin attended by members of the National Teachers' Organisation. He stated that one of the teachers threatened that they would advise the parents of the children in their charge to refuse to subscribe to the loan, and he wanted to know was that a patriotic thing to do, and suggested that it was a peculiar kind of patriotism. Certainly the Minister has not got very much faith in the patriotism of the people who have money to invest in this country when he thinks he can only get that money by offering to them a higher rate of interest than they could get otherwise, or in other countries for money they have to invest. I suggest that the reduction in the teachers' salaries, and in the allowance to old age pensioners, will be merely taking money from these people to give an increased rate of interest to people in the country whom the Government expect will invest money in their loan. That, generally, is the reason why I object to the proposed cuts. I say that the Government is just falling into line with the employers, generally, in this country, in their attack on wages. The policy seems to be that if anything goes wrong, blame the people who work for wages; if any economies are to be effected, reduce the wages of the people who are compelled to work for a wage irrespective of whether the things which they produce are dear because of their wages, or because of the profits that the employers are making in the sale of those goods. I do not know if I am in order in referring to a debate which took place a fortnight ago. Deputy Woulfe on that occasion, in talking about unemployment, referred to housing and road-making.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: We have just decided that we will take the housing question later on.

Mr. NAGLE: I was only just going to call attention to what Deputy Woulfe said on that occasion. He mentioned about houses being dear in the past, and that they had been built for people who lived in rural Ireland and who could not afford to pay an economic rent for them. He stated that the tenants paid a rent of a shilling a week, and that the difference had to be made good out of the rates. I suggest that the people who live in these houses, for which an economic rent has not been paid in the past, could only pay a shilling a week because of the fact that their wages were so miserably low. If houses have to be built at an economic rent the people who are going to live in them, and pay rent for them, certainly should have a wage sufficient to meet that cost, the same as every other cost. The old age pension is going to be reduced to 9/- a week. There is a tendency in this country, as well as in England and in nearly every country in the world, to reduce wages to freezing point, and even below it. That is put forward as a remedy for all the ills under which we are suffering at the present day. I can understand the employers putting that forward as a remedy because there was a noted writer on economics who mentioned that employers knew everything about their business except the reason for which their business existed. We are driving down, though Deputy Cooper said the other day we were not, to the Coolie level. He said that there was one thing the dockers' employers in Dublin did not do, and that was to import Coolie labour. Another Deputy, I think it was Deputy Egan, in talking about the standard of luxury, as differentiated from the standard of living, said, or suggested, that the workers should never attend picture houses, that they should not have a flutter on the "gee-gees," that they should never attend a coursing meeting, and that they should not drink any of Guinness's porter.

Mr. EGAN: On a point of order, I did not say that.

Mr. NAGLE: The Deputy suggested it in his speech which is here in the Official Report, but he may not agree with my peculiar way of quoting from his speech. The Deputy made reference to the standard of luxury in the country, and went on to blame the workers for not refraining from attending picture houses in order that they would be able to work for lesser wages.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy is now going into the general question. I think he ought to leave that over until we come to the debate on the general question.

Mr. NAGLE: Would I not then be precluded?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No.

Mr. NAGLE: Very well. I suggest, Vol. 5.

as a solution of the whole problem, that the teachers should work for nothing, that the old age pensioners should not want any pensions; and that the people should not want to live in houses, I suppose that would solve the housing problem. Tradesmen engaged in the production of houses should also work for nothing, and then there would be nothing but profit for the building contractor, and profit for the builders' suppliers.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy must conclude now.

Mr. O'MAHONY: There is one point upon which all Deputies must agree, and that is that the Minister for Finance has to balance his Budget. He can only have a healthy balance if his income is equal to, or greater than, his expenditure. Unfortunately, the statement made by the Minister for Finance shows that this year there will be a substantial balance of over a million on the wrong side of his ledger. Next year he will have a further increased balance on recurrent expenditure of an additional two millions to float the loan to enable the State to carry on. Where are these three millions of money to come from? Is it, as Deputy Johnson said, to be the result of increased taxation—increased taxation in a country that is already groaning under excessive taxation and prohibitive rates. Local rates and governmental taxation, if increased, are going to crush out the remaining element of fiscal life in this country. Therefore, there is only one alternative for the Minister for Finance, and that is to economise. Economy is absolutely essential if you are going to maintain the country in a sound financial position, and if you are going to get the people and the banks in the country to back your loan. If you are to go on the policy of spend, spend, spend, and increase taxation to meet your increased expenditure, the time will come, and come very surely, when you will have no money for old age pensions or for teachers, or for labour, or for unemployment or anything else. Like Othello, your occupation as a nation will be gone. Nobody in this Dáil, either on the Government Benches or any other benches, views with satisfaction the proposal to reduce the amount granted to the old age pensioners, or to reduce the teachers' salaries, but I say it is a case of Hobson's choice with the Minister for Finance who has to find the money to balance his Budget, and he proposes to find it in the only way that will recommend itself in the existing circumstances in this country to level-headed people.

Now, objection has been taken to his proposals on the ground that he proposes to economise slightly at the expense of the old age pensioners and the National teachers. Some Deputies who criticised the Minister on this point evidently read his statement in this Dáil very closely, but there are none so blind as those who will not see. They evidently conveniently close their eyes to that portion of the Minister's statement that did not fit in with the views that they expound in this Dáil. The Minister asked what could the Government do to bridge this gap of several millions that he found in his Budget. The obvious alternatives, he told us, were higher taxes or lower public expenditure, or partly one and partly the other. He said it was unnecessary for him to dilate upon the evils of high taxation. We all recognise that taxation has reached breaking point in this country, and that it will be safe to go no further. What we all anticipate, and what we all hope will result from the measure taken by the Minister, is that from the overdue reduction in our high taxation we will have some benefit out of it in the near future. Did the Minister suggest that he was going to confine his cuts to these two particular services? By no means. He pointed out that these two services accounted for nearly 50 per cent. of the recurrent national expenditure. And what do the two cuts amount to?

To something like £650,000. That is to say, £650,000 in a case, in which he has to face, if not this year, at any rate next year, a shortage of three millions in the National Exchequer. Now, £650,000 is less than one-third of the amount of economies or monies that the Minister for Finance must find next year. That is spread over one-half, or nearly one-half, of the National Income. Therefore, it is up to the Minister, in some way or another, on the remaining portion of the National Income, to find the remaining two-thirds of his shortage. What does he say with respect to that? "It is proposed, accordingly, to aim at securing forthwith substantial savings throughout the public services, distributing the inevitable sacrifices as fairly as circumstances permit." As far as I can see, the only objection that could be taken to the action of the Minister is, that he has associated with two definite services, the expenditure on which is more definite than with respect to other services, a definite cut in each case. In the case of the other services he has, as anybody can understand, to go into the personnel of these services, to see whether they are over-staffed, and, if so, to what extent he can reduce the staff, and to see whether it can be possible to increase the hours of service given by the existing staff, and thereby still further reduce the staff, and to see what extent the present salaries and emoluments associated with these bodies are warranted. That, of course, is not a matter that a Minister who has only recently been appointed to his position could deal with thoroughly. I say it was a better and a sounder policy on the part of the Minister to wait until he got reliable statistics for these several Departments, rather than put before the Dáil an ill-considered return concerning them. Had he done so, and found that he made an under-estimate, we would all be up in arms condemning and criticising the Minister later on.

I am not going to deal with the question of housing or wages and all that. I intend later on when the general debate is resumed, to address myself to these questions. We had a good deal of criticism here. As the Minister for Agriculture pointed out last evening, the Deputy, criticising the Minister for Finance, offered no substantial suggestion as to how he could meet the deficit he is faced with. Deputy Johnson suggested increased taxation or tariff on imported manufactured articles. Well, tariff on imported manufactured articles is a very delicate question, requiring a good deal of consideration, because it may result in robbing Peter.

in the country, in order to pay Paul, his neighbour. From the National point of view, that is a very dangerous policy to pursue until you closely consider the question in all its bearings; there is no use in taxing imported manufactured articles which this country does not produce, and which it could not produce by reason of the encouragement the taxes would give the native manufacturer. Because you are then only transferring to the consumer the taxes which the Government pockets.

That is a bad policy, because it hides from the people that they are paying these taxes. It is not as evident as when you are paying direct taxes. The Minister has been blamed and the Executive Council has been blamed for imposing these cuts on two bodies, two sections of the people, the teachers and pensioners. These are two sections that we all, if we could, would relieve from the cut, if the financial position enabled us to do so. Who is the Minister for Finance in this case? The Minister for Finance is Deputy, or President, de Valera. The Minister for Finance is paying for the destruction that de Valera's dupes committed during the last eighteen months in the country. It is the voice of the Minister for Finance that is demanding the reduction, but it was the other that caused the destruction that has now to be paid for, destruction that imposes on this Dáil a necessity for making radical reductions in these two Services as in every other Service in the country, as will be developed when the Minister has his complete returns before him. There was one point that Deputy Johnson made, and it was a bit illogical on his part. He said that we, in this country, should not emulate British expenditure. He said that we should emulate British economy. But he did not suggest, when speaking in the Dáil a short time ago, that we should emulate the economy in the case of wages that the English worker and the English employer were compelled to adopt in view of foreign competition. That is all I am going to say on that matter for the time.

Deputies are concerned about this road expenditure. Well, I hardly think it has any association with the Resolution before the Dáil, and I shall, therefore, defer my remarks with reference to the proposed cut in connection with it, until such time as we debate the general issue. Deputy Redmond made a reference to Civil Servants whose services are being dispensed with, and his references, unintentionally, I know, would convey a wrong impression to the Dáil and a wrong impression to the public. These Civil Servants exercised the rights that they were entitled to under the Treaty. The Treaty gave them the privilege of retiring, and they exercised that right. That right might not have been exercised as generally as it was, only for the general unrest that was in the country, and I suppose they thought they would make hay while the sun shone. Now suggestions are being made to reduce existing Civil Servants. As I understand, the Civil Servants who are being handed over by the British Government, under the terms of the Treaty, are assured of all the privileges, all the salaries and emoluments and all that they would have enjoyed if the British Government had continued to function in this country. Therefore it would be a dangerous policy to interfere in any way with these public servants, because that may have the result that Deputy Redmond regrets, of making these also resign their positions.

That would necessitate the appointment of others to replace them, so that instead of resulting in a national saving, it would only impose upon us considerable additional national expenditure.

As regards the Civil Servants, the suggestion is that no reduction has been made with respect to them. Anyone reading the speech of the Minister for Finance will find that he says the Civil Servants, whose salary at the end of 1920 was between £150 and £500 a year, have suffered a reduction varying from 30 per cent. at the lower salary, to 25 per cent. at the higher salary, so that these public servants, long before the cuts intended to be made came into operation, have suffered a reduction in their salaries at least equal to, and possibly substantially more than, it is proposed to make with respect either to the Teachers or the old age pensioners. The analytical figures were so effectively gone into by the Minister for

[Mr. O'Mahony.]

Agriculture that I am not going to trouble dealing with them. He showed clearly, taking into account the cost of living now as compared with the cost of living when pensions were fixed, that no hardship could result from the cut. I deprecate the cut on these people. I really believe if we could apply ourselves effectively to the abuses that no doubt exist in association with the Old age pensions, we would bring about a considerable saving. People having a substantial amount of land, fairly well stocked, for no other purpose—

Mr. GOREY: And Bank accounts made out of buildings.

Mr. O'MAHONY:—than to evade not alone their legal obligations, but their moral obligations, made over those lands in favour of their children, and the children refused the natural right that always in the past was jealously regarded by the Irish child, no matter how poor that child might be, of making suitable provision for the parents. I think, when the details of abuses in connection with the old age pensions are gone into, it will be quite possible to discover deserving cases; undoubtedly there is a large number of deserving cases. We ought to hesitate taking 1/- or anything from them. When the whole question is gone into, I think it will be found that none of the deserving cases need be made suffer. I hope the Minister will make provision for such cases and will clearly establish that relief will be given and provided.

Mr. GOREY: That is worth 200 votes.

Mr. O'MAHONY: As regards the teachers, we all know that in the pre-war days the teaching body was entirely underpaid; but we have a statement made here; that statement has not been controverted, and if it were open to challenge, I am sure Deputy O'Connell would have challenged it. That statement was that the salaries of the teachers have been increased from 3 to 3½ times the pre-war standard. Now, if we take the middle figure of 3¼ times, and if you take 10 per cent. off that, it will leave you with something like £295, as compared with a salary of £100 pre-war. Surely, taking into account the cost of living and the legitimate increase in salary that the teachers were undoubtedly entitled to, this £295, as compared with the pre-war salary of £100, leaves us sufficient margin not alone to pay for the increased cost of living but to provide for a decent increase in what everybody was satisfied were absolutely inadequate pre-war salaries?

Mr. O'CONNELL: Provide for a decent cut.

Mr. O'MAHONY: With the idea pervading the amendment, nobody could take exception. That is, nobody would like to make a cut upon, in the one case, an essential service, and in the other case, a deserving body amongst the old and the poor classes of the country. But "Where needs will the devil drives." We are compelled to, and we must, make ends meet. We must balance the books. No Deputy has shown that the Minister can effectively do so by any other means than by making an all-round cut, not a cut confined to those two particular instances, but an all-round cut that, I believe, when the personnel of the different staffs is investigated and the reduction of salaries considered, will represent substantially a much bigger percentage than is concerned in these two cases.

Reference has been made to the Army. I should like to see the Army at a considerably reduced figure from that which the Minister for Defence anticipates will be the case at the end of the financial year. At the same time, owing to our experience in the last 12 or 18 months, we must hasten slowly. As long as it is necessary to keep an Army in being to secure the legitimate protection that the citizen is entitled to, then the duty is cast upon the Minister of doing so; but I would make some appeal to him, as has been made by other Deputies, and that is to consider whether the officers' establishment is not too large in proportion to the establishment of men, and whether substantial reductions might not be effected also in the salaries of the higher grades as compared with the lower grades in the Army. If we are going to economise, let us economise all round. Let us economise in every direction in which economy, consistent with efficiency, is possible. I am certain that neither teachers, pensioners, Civil Servants, nor any section of the public life of the country will feel dissatisfied if they find that the axe of economy is generally and equitably distributed.

PADRAIG Ó h-OGAÍN: An rud a bhí le rádh agam tá se ráite cheanna. Is doigh liom gur mhór an truagh gan iarracht mór a dhéanamh chun stóp do chur leis an bhfeall atá ceapaithe. Caithimid admháil go ndearn na muinteoíri naisiúnta obair mór ar son na tíre. Do dheineadar a ndícheall chun an Gaoluinn d'ath-bheochaint, agus cuirim an ceist ar Aire um Airgead "An bhfuil aon dream eile againn a dhein níos mó oibre ar son teagain na tíre ná na muinteoíri naisiúnta?"

When the grip of the foreigner was relaxed on the throat of the nation some of us imagined that the bloom of health would colour the face of the country, and that those who were charged with the administration of the essential restoratives would see that those restoratives were applied in proper proportions and in a proper manner. If I judge rightly, education is one of the most essential restoratives the country needs—that is real national education—and anybody who has been in close contact with the country's happenings will admit that the national teachers have done more to save the national life of the country than any other body of citizens. I put the question directly to the Minister for Finance. Can he mention any body of citizens who did more for the Irish language or from whom we can expect more for the salvation of the Irish language than the national teachers? Under foreign and alien administration they did excellent work, and it would seem to be a new standard of justice were we to continue the penal regulations they suffered from in the past. I have seen in several cases that the Minister for Finance is keenly interested in this, and I believe honestly he is. I ask him is it a proper way to induce those people to give effect to that hope he has expressed so often for the salvation of the national language of the country inadequately to recognise and scantily to appreciate the services the teachers are likely to give in the future. Several of the speakers yesterday did not take this into account at all, and Deputy Bryan Cooper seemed to confuse motion with progress. They are two entirely different things. If he gave any serious thought to the progressive programme of the national schools of this country, and if he gave any thought to the progressive methods of teaching expected from teachers, he would admit that progressive salaries would be more in the nature of things than reduced ones.

Progress is a natural growth; pruning and dwarfing are artificial introductions. I suggest as we have progressive programmes of education and teaching, progressive salaries should be the rule. Deputy Redmond endeavoured to make a suggestion to the Government regarding one service that might possibly help the Minister for Finance to bridge over the chasm in his budget. I will endeavour to make another. I have here a demand signed by 30,000 people, men and women in the constituency which the Minister for Education is representing, demanding that certain retrenchments be made in certain directions, and they demand that avenue to be travelled before any other avenue in Government expenditure. They demand that the expenditure of £20,000 or £30,000 per week entailed in keeping in the political prisoners be done away with and that it should go into the Government Exchequer to relieve the deficit. That is a demand which I would recommend for the consideration of the Government, and particularly for that of the Minister for Education. Deputy Gorey would have us think that the teachers in the country are living in Paradise, and that their economic conditions are different from those in cities or towns. I do not know whether Deputy Gorey thinks there are any teachers living in the cities or towns. I suggest there are thousands. I also suggest he is fighting with glass when he uses that argument. The Minister for Agriculture should take note that the farmer is a country dweller and also participates in the economic advantages the teachers of the country have and in striking a flat rate on income the Minister for Finance should take that into account.

Mr. GOREY: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOGAN: I am glad to hear Deputy Gorey say "Hear, hear." It puts him in the position that he admits he suffers less, and, therefore, should be penalised. He tells us that teachers in the country marry, and, therefore, double their incomes. I wonder do the farmers in the country marry and thereby increase their income. Regarding the old age pensions, it is difficult to see why this was singled out except that the Minister, having struck at the youth of the country, thinks, to be consistent, he ought to strike at the aged. In that I compliment him for his consistency. It has been proved we owe money to the old age pensioners, because when the cost of living went up, the rate of pensions did not go up accordingly. I am going to ask who fixed the rate by which we calculated what the standard of living was in 1908. Who said 5/- in 1908 was any standard of living? Who said 10/- a week is any standard of living at all now? It would be more decent and honest for the Government to say that it is because they have the power to make those cuts that they do so. Their basic principle is that they have the power to do it, and it would be more honest for them to tell us that that is the principle they are working on, and not that they are working on principles of justice and consideration.

Mr. WILSON: I did not intend to rise again in connection with this matter as we defined ourselves. I think, very clearly in the speech of Deputy Gorey yesterday. We look upon the reduction of old age pensions with regret. We look upon it in the light of a necessity. We are sorry that the necessity arises, but where the necessity arises we realise that we must do justice. The figures quoted by the Minister for Agriculture yesterday place it beyond ye or nay that a reduction of 1s. from 10s. leaves the old age pensioners in a better position than they were two years ago. I will not deal with the aspect of the subject concerning teachers or old age pensioners.

vernment borrowing so largely on bills from the banks, the farmers in this country are getting restricted credit and thereby are placed in sore straits. Heretofore, or at least in the time of inflation, everybody knows that the farmers sold their farms at high prices, but immediately bought new ones and went to the bank and got a mortgage. The banks were then glad to get the custom of the farmers, but now they find it more profitable to lend money to the State on short term loans. They are thus restricting the credit of the country and placing these men in jeopardy. They are forcing them to sell their stock to reduce their liability, and they are reducing the number of people who would be able to buy this stock by reason of the restriction on credit. I hope the Minister for Finance will bear in mind what the British Government did a few years ago under Lloyd George when they made preparation for this deflation and adopted a system by which the farmers were given long term advances by the State to enable them to weather the difficulties so as not to be placed on the roadside. The reduction in the teachers' salaries has been spoken of as a weapon which is going to destroy education in Ireland. I would be long sorry to think that our 15,000 schoolmasters and schoolmistresses are so wanting in civic ideas and patriotism that because of a reduction by a small amount in their salaries they are going to be rendered useless and, in revenge, will neglect their duties.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Who said that?

Mr. WILSON: Nobody specifically mentioned it, but that is the underlying principle on which the matter has been debated here. We are told that these men have done so and so, and now they are to be repaid by being reduced in their salaries, and because of that reduction they will neglect their work. I realise that it is a hardship for any man to be reduced, and I think that those who have twenty years' service and who have only £300 a year are not suitable subjects for reduction, but fit subjects for reduction than married men with twenty years' service who are compelled to live on £300 a year reduced by 10 per cent. I just want to refer shortly to the statement of one Labour Deputy. He spoke of the Farmer Deputies pressing on the under dog and that they as a body were always throwing discredit on the workers of Ireland, particularly, I suppose, the agricultural labourers. There is nobody who examines the subject but will find that the agricultural labourer in Ireland is worthy of as much pay as we can afford to give him. We recognise that while wages in England have been considerably reduced and that while the farmers there are quite close to the markets, the prices we are paying ought to be higher than the standard set in England. We recognise that the labourers in the past have stood by us in our difficulties, and that it is only by direction of their leaders in the cities that the line of cleavage has taken place. Their prosperity and ours are interwoven. Anything we say here must not be taken as if we intended to crush them or interfere with their prosperity. I see readily where the complaint is made. In the agricultural industry we support our unemployed, but why should labourers on the land getting 30s. a week be obliged to contribute to the Central Fund in tobacco, beer, and sugar in order to give the men in the cities 30s. a week for doing nothing, while the agricultural labourer is working as hard as he can for the same money. They are being used by the city dwellers to their own disadvantage. Their interests are interwoven with those of the farmers, and the farmers and the labourers, if they understood each other rightly, would be in a position to call the tune here and make laws for the prosperity of both.

Mr. JOHNSON: The labourers have long memories.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: With the exception of Deputy Johnson and his followers and those whose cries fill the columns of the yellow Press, I believe the country will endorse just as strongly as this Dáil, the proposal contained in the statement of the Minister for Finance. I refer not alone to the concrete proposals which he outlined, but to the more shadowy reforms which he promised would be initiated. A good deal of ink has been spilled over these two questions for the past fortnight, and the only argument that I could see in the public Press on behalf of the teachers was that if a teacher lost 10 per cent of his salary he could not meet his pupils in the morning with a smiling face. With such a state of mind it is almost impossible to argue. We say to them let them have a heart, and when they take heart let them realise what the situation demands.

Let them realise that the deficit facing the Minister for Finance is the outstanding question, and that 5 o'clock. the nation as a whole, and every individual composing that nation, must bear a share of the sacrifice in righting the situation. A good deal was said about broken treaties and the sanctity of engagements. I wonder if those people realise that time and time again when agreements were entered into they immediately started agitations requesting advances in pay. What are the arguments put forward on their behalf? That it was impossible to work for the wages they received. Let us understand the reverse of the process. Suppose the State finds it impossible to pay them, must they be bound by the hard terms of a bad bargain? I need not remark, surely, that the teachers would be bound by the terms of what they would regard as a bad bargain. For instance, if the currency was inflated from an economic collapse, does any Deputy believe that the teachers would not immediately demand increments to keep pace with the cost of living? They certainly would. Similarly, the State, in the interests of the people, and of its very existence as a civilised nation, must, in view of the dreadful deficit we are faced with, urge economy all round. There is no particular animosity against the teachers; they have not been victims, nor have they been singled out in this matter. There must be an all-round reduction in the case of every person drawing public money.

Mr. DAVIN: What about the Governor-General?

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: I cannot speak on behalf of the Governor-General. That is a question for the Minister. As Deputy Wilson pointed out, we very much regret that it is necessary to cut the old age pensions, but the same argument that I have advanced applies to this case, that it is necessary, in the interest of national solvency, to have this cut. Deputy Johnson threw down a challenge yesterday when he said that no candidate went up for election on a campaign of economy. I am in the unhappy position of having to reply in the affirmative. I did, and I certainly will vote for the proposals put forward by the Minister for Finance, and against the amendment, because I feel that it is necessary, in the interests of the nation, that these economies should come into operation forthwith, and I realise perfectly well that if we do not economise now there will not be a shilling to give any man in a year's time.

Mr. O'CONNELL: The Minister for Agriculture spoke yesterday, and as is always the case, when he speaks, we had an interesting address. He is an adept at making a good speech when he has a good case, and vice versa. He told us, at the outset, that he would vote for this amendment. I hope he will remember that when the Division comes.

MINISTER FOR AGRICULTURE (Mr. P. Hogan): Possibly Deputy O'Connell's speech would compel me to change my mind.

Mr. O'CONNELL: It might be well that the Dáil, at this stage, should be reminded of what the amendment is. It is:

To delete all the words after the word "address," and to substitute therefor the words "but while approving of the decision of Ministers to 'avoid waste, and extract the utmost value from all public expenditure,' cannot agree to methods of retrenchments which would be detrimental to education, or which would cause suffering to the aged poor."

Of course, I take it that those who vote against the amendment are thereby saying that they can agree to such methods. However, the question is, and

I hope that the Minister for Agriculture, before he finally makes up his mind, will make enquiries, say, from the Minister for Education, or such Deputies as Deputy Professor Magennis, Deputy Lynch, Deputy McCabe, and those who have an expert knowledge of this question, as to whether or not the proposed action announced by the Minister for Finance will in fact be detrimental to education. He himself made no attempt to show that it would not; neither has anybody who has spoken on behalf of the proposal. The Minister for Agriculture scoffs at the idea of describing these proposals as in any way autocratic. They are, in his opinion, the essence of democracy. It is perhaps not unreasonable to think that a Minister who has such a love for rough and ready methods of administration, should be pleased with the method adopted in this case. He tells us that it is quite right, that these proposals have been given to the Dáil, and it is for the Dáil to accept or reject them. But perhaps the Minister does not know that at this very moment, before the Dáil has accepted or rejected, or expressed any opinion whatsoever on the proposals, the actual cut, so far as national teachers are concerned, is in operation. That is an undoubted fact. I would ask the Minister for Finance to correct me if I am wrong. The Minister for Agriculture, and most of the other speakers, referred to more cuts. The Minister for Agriculture repeated it; so did Deputy O'Mahony and other Deputies, but up to the present we have no indication whatsoever, nothing beyond mere general promises as to what these cuts are to be.

We are to have a survey, an examination of the position, to see where cuts can be made. There was no survey into education; there was no survey into the position of the old age pensioners. When this survey is finally made, if it is to be made, shall we get an assurance from the Minister that the cuts will take effect from the same date as the cuts from the old age pensioners become effective, or the cuts in the teachers' salaries become effective? The Minister for Finance, in spite of what the Minister for Agriculture has said earlier, told us that these cuts were not made because of a fall in the cost of living. They were made in order to reduce expenditure on public services, and it is not unreasonable to ask why two services should be singled out to be the first, without any guarantee whatsoever, except mere vague promises, that cuts would take place in any other direction in the Government.

I agree with Deputy Good and Deputy O'Mahony, who, I think, said that if there is to be an effort to reduce expenditure, and if sacrifices must be made, then they should be made and borne equally by all. We have no intimation from the Minister for Finance or any other member of the Government as to what the intention is with regard to any other public servants. There is no intimation that the basic salary of any Civil Servant will be reduced, and that those servants who appear in the Estimates as having inclusive salaries will be reduced, or that the Civic Guard, or D.M.P., State Solicitors, Under Sheriffs, and Clerks of the Peace, and other public servants will be reduced. Only one body of public servants is specially singled out for reduction, and in my humble opinion, and the opinion of a great many others, that is the service that should be the last to be singled out. National teachers, as I have always stated, and will continue to state, are not grumbling, and will not grumble, at having to bear their fair share of any sacrifices to be made by the nation, as a whole, but they object, and in my opinion rightly, to be specially singled out in the first instance before there is any more than a mere general intimation that we are going to have all round cuts in the public services. Until we have definite statements as to what other servants are to have their incomes reduced, this general talk of economy and all round retrenchment is so much eye-wash. One would have imagined that the Minister, in his attempts to balance his accounts, would have said that all the Departments of State would have to bear a certain percentage and that the course he would take, and it would have been the wise course in my judgment, should be to go to all the Departments and say, "We want ten per cent. off the expenditure of this particular Department."

If that were said to the Department of Education, and that Department were compelled to reduce its expenditure by ten per cent., I have not the slightest doubt whatever that the teachers would co-operate with the Ministry of Education in effecting that reduction. The Minister for Agriculture taunted Deputy Johnson with having only one constructive proposal to put forward. I listened closely to the Minister for his constructive suggestions, and the only one I could gather was a request to Deputy Johnson to reduce the cost of living. The Minister has strange ideas of the responsibility that should attach to a Government. Bread is a very important item in the cost of living. How, might I ask, would Deputy Johnson proceed to reduce the cost of bread, for instance. He might, perhaps, ask the workers to work for nothing, and thus reduce the cost of the loaf by something about one halfpenny. How would he reduce the cost of meat? How would he see that the farmer and producer got a fair share of the price which the consumer has to pay for the meat? These are things which it is the duty of the Government, who have the responsibility in the matter, to look into, and surely it is not very helpful or constructive on the part of the Minister for Agriculture to attempt to throw his responsibility on other people. They have not made any great progress in putting into operation even the small recommendations of the Commission which they set up a few months ago. We are waiting still for the result of their efforts in that direction. To tackle the profiteers and profiteering would probably be too troublesome a problem. It is much easier, of course, to look at the total sum paid for old age pensions and education, and simply divide it by ten, and say "We are going to save this amount."

Deputy Cooper, in the course of his speech, said a lot was being said with regard to the agreement, and that a great deal of importance was being attached to it, and that is perfectly true. In my opinion the discontent caused by the announcement made by the Minister for Finance amongst the teaching body is not so much at the actual loss of the £30 or £40 per annum as with the method adopted by the Minister for Finance, in view of the solemn agreement entered into. Deputy Cooper was labouring under a misapprehension when he spoke of teachers breaking previous agreements. That is not so, and the quotation made by Deputy Cooper had to do with an altogether different thing, as the Minister for Finance can probably tell. The Minister for Finance should be very well informed in these matters, because the principal officers of his Department were in the British Treasury Department at the time these agreements were come to. One of the matters dealt with was purely temporary bonuses, which were revised after short periods by the same Board which entered into the agreements, and which contained a special provision by which this revision should be made. I want to emphasise the point that only one agreement was entered into at any time with regard to a permanent scale of salary, and this is the agreement which I have here, and which the National teachers are speaking of when they refer to a solemn agreement being broken.

The Civil Service Arbitration Board, which adjudicated on this particular claim and pronounced judgment on it, are exactly the same body who adjudicated on the claim of the Civil Servants. The Civil Servants are engaged under the terms of the agreement arrived at by that Arbitration Board, and the Government has not departed one iota from the terms of that agreement in their treatment of Civil Servants. Not only have the Government kept the agreement in the letter, but in the spirit, for if they had kept it in the letter alone Civil Servants would now be paid according to the British cost of living figure. This agreement entered into on that occasion is not at all confined to salary scales. As I pointed out on a previous occasion, it is a very comprehensive agreement, and deals with conditions of service, and are we to take it now that the teachers are no longer bound by that agreement?

It abrogated many of the rules which were in force until that agreement was signed. Are we to understand now that one portion of the agreement may be disregarded while the other portions must be strictly kept by the teachers? It is not a question merely of figures of salary that is involved in this matter. It is a question of the whole of the conditions of service. Much has been made out of the fact that this agreement was entered into at a time when the cost of living was near its highest point, but the salaries only came into full operation in April, 1922. Surely if this agreement had any relation to the cost of living the peak point of the salaries would have been paid at the time when the cost of living was at its highest. The teachers bartered away at that time immediate gain. They could have got, if they insisted, the same terms exactly as the civil service got. They could have got a very much higher increase at that particular time than they did get in actual practice, but they bartered away immediate gain for stability and permanency, and now that permanency is being taken from them, so that they have neither end of the stick.

This agreement, for instance, contains provisions under which salaries can be reduced in certain conditions. The average attendance at school may go below a certain figure, and the teacher has no control over that. Down goes his salary to the extent of £70 or £80. If he writes to the Department of Education to complain, the agreement is quoted for him. If he writes again protesting he will be told that his own representatives signed that agreement, and his mouth is effectually closed.

The Minister for Finance feels that this agreement and those conditions do not bind him in any way. I am not surprised that he holds that view after listening to what he had to say yesterday, speaking on another matter with regard to what he called paper safeguards. He has no regard whatsoever for paper safeguards. I just took a note of what he said at the time. He said there used to be a lot of talk about paper safeguards, but when there were no paper safeguards it was found that we were, perhaps, just as well off then as now. I can only say that is an extraordinarily strange doctrine coming from a representative of a Government which pins its faith and the country's faith to an agreement or document that was signed some two years ago in consequence of and by virtue of which we are all here. If a paper agreement can only be regarded as a scrap of paper when either party to the agreement finds that he is in a position to so regard it, well, then, we have done with stability in all matters.

Deputy Gorey has a wide and varied knowledge of many things, but when he enters on the domain of education I am afraid he is not always a success. He undertook to give us figures, and the figures he gave us were these:—A first class principal, he said, began at £370 for men and £300 for women. Perhaps I might tell Deputy Gorey, first of all, that there is no such grade as first class principal in the service; secondly, that no teacher begins at £300 or £370. I have the figures here in the official document. It states that the normal scale for men trained teachers shall commence at £170, and the normal scale for trained women teachers shall commence at £155. There are other teachers who begin at £100; there are teachers who begin at £110; there are teachers who begin at £130; but the normal scale, I take it, is the one that Deputy Gorey has in mind. At the end of some 20 years or so the man who begins at £170 may find himself at £370 per annum, but to do that he has every year to undergo a severe test of his efficiency by officers of the department. No one knows better than those who have been engaged in the service of teaching how difficult it is to get through that test. It is not a mere matter of form as tests of efficiency are in some services. I was very pleased to hear Deputy Wilson express the opinion that a man after 20 or 30 years' service as a national teacher is not too highly paid if he gets £370 per annum. He did say, however, that £170 was too high as an initial salary. I would like him to compare that with the salary that can be got in another service. A teacher spends from 7 to 9 years preparing for his position. He has to undergo a secondary education or the equivalent of it. He has to go to a training college. Some years before the new scale of salaries came into operation the fees paid at the training college were nominal—£5 or £10. They have been increased to £45 between the past few years. At the age of 21 or 22 this young man goes out and takes up the important work of teaching, getting £170 per year. From that £170, 4 per cent. is deducted to contribute towards his pension. He has to pay for his lodgings, and very often travel a long distance to his school. It is not unusual for him to take his share in paying to keep the school clean, tidy and quipped. His brother might come along at the age of 18 or 19 to the Civic Guard Depot here in Dublin, spend 3 or 4 months in training, and go out and get £182 10s.

Mr. WILSON: And stop there.

Mr. O'CONNELL: He does not stop there. Read the recent reply given by the Minister for Home Affairs. In addition, he lives in barracks and he has other allowances, of the value perhaps of £20 or £25 yearly. I did not hear from Deputy Wilson any complaint that this public service was too highly paid. These rates which I have referred to are in operation only from 1922, and all during the war years teachers were living largely on hope and on credit—hoping for the time that was coming in 1922 when the agreement which they had entered into in good faith would begin to bear full fruit. Deputy Gorey challenged me to say that teachers in other countries were as well paid as here. I think he mentioned England as an exception.

Deputy Gorey need not run away to Belgium, France, Russia, or Austria, or even to England for comparisons. He has only to go some 40 or 50 miles, across the border, into the Six Counties, where he will find the teachers working under this agreement—which was an all Ireland agreement at the time—and those very scales and conditions are in full operation in that area at the present time. Although the Six County Government during last year brought in an Education Bill, which increased very considerably educational expenditure in that area and which made special provision for increasing the salaries of Secondary teachers, still they have not touched this agreement. They pay the teachers and continue to pay them, and no move has been made to cut off 10 per cent. or any other percentage. If they can afford to do that in the Six Counties, it is not too much to expect that we in the Free State should be slow to touch such an essential service as education. Deputy Gorey touched on a great many other things. I can only say that Kilkenny seems to be the happy hunting ground for teachers. After what the Deputy stated no doubt there will be 40, 50, or 60 applicants for every vacancy henceforth advertised in Kilkenny. His playful references to myself I pass over. I will only say that I am willing to swop my share of this world's goods with Deputy Gorey, and I will get 6,000 or 8,000 teachers who will do the same.

Mr. GOREY: Done!

Mr. O'CONNELL: All right, we will enter into an agreement about it, and I hope it will be kept more honourably than the one we are talking about. I was not surprised at the attitude taken up by Deputy Gorey, but I would be extremely surprised to know that the farmers of Ireland, as a body, would echo the sentiments he expressed yesterday. Apart altogether from the fact that the teachers are in the main drawn from the farming class, and that teaching is one of the few openings that farmers' daughters in the country have to look forward to, there is no class who will benefit more by increased education than the agricultural community. On the other hand, no class will suffer more if the educational efficiency of the country is interfered with. That is why I say that I would be surprised to know that the opinion of Deputy Gorey was general amongst the class he represents. It is not unusual to find teachers in the country looked up to by farmers as helpers in many ways. I know several co-operative dairy societies to which teachers act as secretaries. I know perhaps a few branches of the Farmers' Union that owe their success to the co-operation of the local teacher.

Mr. GOREY: Sometimes he is chairman.

Mr. O'CONNELL: The teacher who is chairman of a branch of the Farmers' Union will have a big strain put on his allegiance when he reads Deputy Gorey's remarks of yesterday. The rate of salary paid to the teachers, as I have said, was not fixed on a cost of living basis. The cost of living did not enter into it. What did enter into it was the figure which would attract to the service suitable men and women. That was the main consideration. It should be the main consideration. We had it on the last debate that took place in the Dáil on education from the Minister of Education himself that the new rates of salary had not begun to operate yet, to attract the right class of people. I hope if the Minister for Education gets an opportunity of intervening in this debate that he will tell us exactly how far the new rates of salary have up to the present succeeded in attracting to the profession a different type of men and women from those who have been coming into it for the past few years. The records of the Training Colleges will show the numbers of failures amongst the students since the Ministry of Education raised the standard somewhat, and will also show exactly what the position is now. Within the past few days I came across a circular that has been issued by the Church of Ireland authorities calling attention to the fact that the supply of teachers is running out. This may seem strange to Deputy Gorey, but the facts are there. I will read some extracts from this statement. It asks: "Are our schools to be closed?" "What can we do?" A few facts will demonstrate that these are not academic questions, that they bar our way, and that unless we deal with them future progress will be impossible. There will be no future for the Irish Church. If the Irish Church is to continue we must have schools. Schools are impossible without teachers, teachers are impossible without a training college well supplied with students." The Circular goes on, and asks: "What is the prospect at present of a sufficient or even a moderate supply of teachers?" It says "Each year 45 women teachers are needed to supply vacancies; 28 left College in 1923. At most 28 will leave in 1924, and only 17 can be expected to leave in 1925." The Circular was published before the cut was announced, so that I am afraid even 17 will not be available after the action of the Ministry. The Bishops of the Church of Ireland issued this document, in which they say: "What is wanted at the moment is candidates who can pass the Easter examination of 1924. A great number of candidates have not hitherto done so, many having failed at this examination."

They find it necessary to send out a special document of that kind, urging and enticing their people to invite candidates to come forward for the teaching profession, and that in spite of these exorbitant salaries which are being paid, according to some Deputies of this Dáil. They send documents out telling what the salaries will be, and of course they will have to revise these documents now. Now there is one important feature of the Minister's statement that I would like to emphasise. It seems to have been lost sight of by most of the speakers here. All the speakers here refer to the 10 per cent. cut as if that was the final end of the proposal, but that is not so. I quote from the Minister's statement. He says:—"The Government have decided that an immediate cut must be made in the remuneration of the teachers. They do not want to take drastic action at short notice, and to make the full reduction which the facts appear to justify at once. They, therefore, propose that a reduction of 10 per cent. should be made, with effect from the 1st November, and that an inquiry should be set on foot immediately for the purpose of exploring the question of what further adjustment may be proper." [Official Report, column 672, November 2nd, 1923.]

Now this is not a question of a 10 per cent. cut that we are considering here; it is only the beginning, and I want to emphasise that. I want to show that that very suggestion has increased, and naturally increased, the discontent among the teaching body. The teachers are told there is to be an immediate 10 per cent. cut as from the 1st November, and there are promised other reductions. The teacher in this instance is like the Cockney in the song, "'E don't know where 'e are.'" The Minister for Finance, speaking a few evenings ago on the question of Irish, said that he believes with Padraig Pearse that freedom for this country was a worthless thing unless there was the preservation of the national language. There are few in this Dáil who will disagree with that. Deputy Hogan, speaking from the Labour Benches a few moments ago, challenged the Minister for Finance to say what other body in Ireland was doing as much at the moment to preserve the national language, and to revive the national language, as the national teachers were. It may be said, of course, it is their duty. That is all very fine, but this particular task—new work to many of them—cheerfully undertaken, cannot be carried on without a fund of enthusiasm, without special effort every day of the year. It is not a question of doing work which is easy to them, and which comes natural to them. It is work that requires every day in the year special effort, and effort requiring behind it a fund of enthusiasm; effort which requires the entire attention of the teacher; and now we find this apple of discord thrown in amongst the teaching profession to distract their attention from what should be rightly a matter which would claim their fullest attention. "They had," said the Minister for Finance, "at their disposal the machinery which would enable them to revive and preserve the Irish language." What is the machinery they have if it is not the machinery of the schools? There is not the slightest doubt in the mind of anybody who has at heart the cause of the Irish language that if the language is to go down in the schools it goes down in the country. The schools are the only hope, and surely the Minister who would bear that in mind, and bear in mind the things for which we have been striving in this country for generations, would consider very carefully indeed before he would take any step which, instead of oiling that machinery, would throw sand into it to clog its wheels, and that is what the Finance Minister's action in this matter has done.

Deputy Johnson was challenged to say whether he went to his constituents and asked them to vote for him and for increased taxation. I ask any Deputy on the benches opposite whether he went to his constituents and told them that if they elected him he would support a cut in teachers' salaries.

Mr. GOREY: Here is one.

Mr. O'CONNELL: And the cut in old age pensions?

Mr. GOREY: No, not in old age pensions.

Major BRYAN COOPER: As a matter of explanation, may I say that I stated in my election address that I would cut down all estimates? I did not specify teachers' salaries or old age pensions, but I did not except them.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Deputy Johnson quoted yesterday an announcement that had been made on the 20th of August—I think it was by the President of the Executive Council, who was then also Minister for Finance. The announcement was made on behalf of the Cumann na nGaedheal, and we had it there that education was to be reformed in its whole character and outlook, and that efforts would be made to attract to the work teachers who would be enthusiastic and whose remuneration would be secure. It would be difficult to believe, and yet we are constrained to believe by the facts, that at that very moment when the Minister for Finance was planning these words, officials in his Department had then under consideration the cutting of the teachers' salaries. Now, if Deputies who support the Government will ask themselves honestly if they have a mandate from their constituents to support this action, and I lay special strain upon the fact and special strain again on the fact that I am objecting to the singling out of these two special services—if they can persuade themselves that they have a mandate to support the Government in the action they have taken, and above all in the method in which that action was taken, then, of course, they will vote against the amendment moved by Deputy Johnson. I am constrained to think that the silence of many Deputies on this matter is an indication that they are not quite satisfied that their constituents sent them here to support such action as this. If the suggestions made by Deputy Major Cooper and by Deputy Captain Redmond had been taken, and if a Committee had been set up—an independent Committee composed of members of this Dáil or people outside—to go over the whole field of administration and expenditure and report where savings could be effected, and if such a Committee, which would have the confidence of this Dáil and of the country, had been set up and reported, that the teachers with others should have a cut, well, then, perhaps, the Government would not meet with the same opposition as it is meeting and must continue to meet with in the action they have taken in this matter.

AIRE UM OIDEACHAS (Eoin Mac Néill): Tá a lán cainnt ar an gceist seo. Cuireadh mion-phointí os ar geomhair—mion-phointí nach bhfuil ciall no cifeacht ionnta. Acht in a dhiaidh sin agus uilig is soláir an cheist í agus caithfidh í a scrúdú ins an doigh ceart. Dá m-ba rud é nar thuit rudai airithe amach 'san tír seo le deidheanaighe thiochfadh linn i bhfád níos mó a dheanamh ar son oideachais. Ní féidir linn an cheist seo a phléidhe gan aire a thabhairt do'n mheid airgid a chaill an tír ar feadh na bliana.

There has been a great deal of rhetoric and a great deal of special pleading, and a great many of what I may call debating society points made in connection with this discussion. We have a plain situation to face. It would have been possible, under certain circumstances, had certain things not happened, to maintain and to improve beyond measure, the whole position of education in this country. I impeach the sincerity, and I impeach the candour which, on every occasion, ignores the fact that that improvement would have been, and should have been, possible, and ignores the reason why it has not been possible. It is like some resolutions that we read in the newspapers from public boards scraping up votes, scraping up votes here and there from people and avoiding the essential, the plain, and the main truth about these things. Now, it is not pleasant for a Minister, in charge of any Department, to have the money at the disposal of his Department reduced. It is not pleasant for me in particular; it is not pleasant in the matter of education to have a reduction, and I do not pretend that it is pleasant. I do not say that in order to curry favour with teachers, and I am not going to balance what I say, as one or two who have spoken here on this debate have balanced what they have said, by throwing out catchwords to console the people, while they intend to vote in a certain way on this amendment.

The amendment has been worded in a very artful form. I ignore the artful form of the amendment, and I propose to vote against it, and no one will misunderstand me or anyone else who votes against it. No one will venture to pretend, or, at all events, if they do they will not take in the members of this Dáil: they will not even delude themselves that we are voting for the detriment of education or for the oppression of the aged poor.

Mr. JOHNSON: On a point of personal explanation, I would have desired that the amendment should have directly referred to the two items, but as a matter of procedure and order, it was necessary not to refer to the Minister's address. Therefore, the direct form had to be avoided.

Professor MacNEILL: That is, so far, satisfactory. I think it is clear now, at all events, that it is not a case of voting for or against the detriment of education or the protection of the aged poor. In voting against this amendment, I am going to vote for the benefit of education and for the benefit of the aged poor. Deputy O'Connell has asked whether any of us, in going up for election, proposed retrenchment. Well, we did not propose retrenchment on two particular items. The Minister has made that clear. But over and over again, as probably some of those who are present here, and who were opposed to me in the election in Clare, may testify, the Government of that time was attacked, and I think unfairly attacked, by the official representatives from the official headquarters of the Farmers' Party on account of extravagance. I made it perfectly clear at that time that the policy of the Government that I would support, if I were elected, would be a policy of retrenchment. It was evident to everyone that the whole future of this country depended, and depends now, on one thing more than on any other, and that is on sound national finance. The future of education in Ireland depends on placing the finances of this country in a sound position, the future of the aged poor in Ireland depends on placing the finances of this country in a sound position. Is it suggested that we are going to make a capital loan in order to meet the present high expenses, high I do not say in reference to the merits of the subject, but high in reference to the resources of the State—the present high expenses on the head of education or on the head of the maintenance of the aged poor. Are we to borrow for these purposes?

If we are to borrow what is to be the end of it? If we have to borrow on continued annual deficits

6 o'clock. that means borrowing and more borrowing, and more borrowing, borrowing to infinity. The first duty of this Government, and the first duty of any national Government, and the first duty of the Deputies of this Dáil at present, if they have in view the future stability, the future progress, the future peace, the future liberty and independence, the maintenance of the liberty and independence which this country has attained, is to place the finances of this country on a sound basis. That is my profound conviction. I believe that industry, I believe that employment, I believe that education, I believe that the Irish language, and I believe that every interest which we wish to advance, depends on that. I believe that if we fail in that one respect we fail in every respect, we lose everything, we will lose the whole of our national control over education, we will lose the future economic welfare of the country, we will lose peace, we will lose prosperity, we will lose our liberty, and we will lose our national independence.

Consequently, I have made up my mind a long time ago that the principal policy, the chief national policy that is before the Government and the Dáil, and the people of Ireland at present, transcending everything else, is the security of national finance. And the [Professor MacNeill.] basis of that, as quite a number of speakers have said before me, is that expenditure that can be estimated as "current expenditure" shall not exceed the revenue which shall be estimated as "current revenue." If that cannot be secured, then we cannot ask our own people, and we cannot expect our own people to face the prospect of being, as they ought to be, their own national creditors. Moreover, many things have been alluded to. The whole ground, almost of national existence, has been covered in this debate. We have had the army, the farms, unemployment, and I do not know what was not mentioned. On the particular head of unemployment, there is no question that without sound national finance, we shall be faced with an immense increase of unemployment, and without making reductions where they can be made without grave injustice, we shall increase unemployment. We have been told about an agreement. I think it would be well for us to be candid on that subject also. Supposing that money values had taken a different course and that the money values embodied in this agreement, as it is called, were reduced at present to one-half of what they were at the time, would the agreement stand? Would it be claimed that the agreement ought to stand? I do not think so.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Might I interrupt to say that we could not break the agreement without the consent of the other party. We had not the power to do it. The decision lay with the other party.

Professor MacNEILL: I do not understand the interruption. I do not think it is possible—and possibly the exponents of the doctrines of the Labour Party would enlighten me on the subject—for the State to bind its own Sovereignty, to bind its own power absolutely and rigidly by the terms of an agreement of the kind specified. I have not myself the terms of that document, whatever it is, before me. I should be very glad to have them. I can only deal with the thing on general principles. This body here is a Sovereign Legislature. Everyone understands that the Sovereignty of this nation rests in it. I do not think it contracted away, two years ago, its powers to modify the terms upon which it remunerated any form of public service.

Mr. O'CONNELL: It is not this Dáil that is modifying the agreement.

Professor MacNEILL: It is this Dáil that is modifying the agreement, and the very fact that this debate has been challenged, will show and will prove that it is this Dáil that is modifying the agreement. As Deputy O'Connell has endeavoured to put me right on that point, I will endeavour to put him right with regard to another point. He says the cut was introduced recently beforehand, and that it is operative already. It is not operative already. It cannot operate until the end of this month, and if this Dáil decides that it cannot operate, it cannot operate at all, and it is not operative yet.

Mr. JOHNSON: Are we to understand, then, that the rate of pay for this month will be the old rate of pay?

Professor MacNEILL: If the Dáil so decides.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is the proposition put before the Dáil?

Professor MacNEILL: I am very much puzzled by these interruptions. I wonder what is the meaning of the amendment? Does not the amendment propose to set aside—would not that be the effect of it?

Mr. JOHNSON: It is not within the power of any private member to raise matters of finance. Is it the formal proposition from the Minister that there should be a change in the rate of pay of these teachers for this month?

Professor MacNEILL: I deprecated rhetorical arguments and special pleading. If this amendment is going to be carried against us, if it is going to be carried against those responsible for the retrenchment policy of the present Government, the Deputies opposite know perfectly well what the result will be. We stand by this policy of retrenchment, and as far as our responsibility is concerned we are determined to carry it through. It would probably be a waste of time if I were to attempt to deal with quite a number of arguments put before us. We have been told, for example, about the Northern Government. The Northern Government has no such responsibility in finance as we have. It has to face no such conditions as we have to face. The Northern Government is subordinate to the British Government, and its finances up to the present have been fed and guaranteed by the British Government. We are an independent State; we have to stand on our own legs, and we have to manage our own finances.

There was another point which has just been barely touched upon. Deputy O'Connell felt that there was some force in it when he said that these increased salaries only came into operation in April, 1922. When were they fixed? The value is to be taken, not at the time at which they came into operation, but at the time at which the salaries were fixed. Even if we are comparing present values with the values of April, 1922, and certainly and emphatically if we are comparing present values with the values at the time when the salaries were fixed, my belief is it will be found that the 10 per cent. reduction is not a reduction at all; that is to say, it is not a reduction in value. The salaries subject to a 10 per cent. reduction are equivalent in value—much more equivalent in value—to the salaries originally fixed. That is a point which has been ignored, and I do not wonder that it has been ignored. I was a Civil Servant myself, and I remember making a desperate fight over being compelled to work overtime at 1/6 an hour. I felt it would be a great injustice, and I made all the fight I could. I am not surprised at the teachers making all the fight they can in order to maintain their salaries at the highest figure at which they can maintain them. Deputy O'Connell certainly has spoken here with very much more moderation than many of the teachers have spoken elsewhere, to judge by the reports we read in the papers.

He has not threatened us with a campaign against the finances of the State, and although he has said that a reduction of salary means a reduction in enthusiasm, he has not uttered any veiled threat here against the teachers doing their duty in carrying out the policy of national education which is the nation's policy. I congratulate him on having avoided those more violent lines, those menacing lines, of argument which have been addressed to us outside. He has recalled the fact that, speaking before in this Assembly, I spoke with satisfaction of the prospect that improved salaries would lead to an improvement in the personnel of the teaching profession. I cannot see the point of argument in a circular which he produced from the Church of Ireland Education Society. I wonder does that circular impute the shortness in the supply of teachers to inadequate remuneration? I think that the causes, whatever they are, are to be sought elsewhere. I am quite sure that the causes are elsewhere. Deputy O'Connell referred also to the cost of training, which some years ago was nominal and which now amounts to about £45 a year. I might recall to his mind that in an Act which the present Minister for Finance sponsored in the last Session of the Dáil, he provided special powers for the County Councils—and that for the first time—to assist teachers with regard to the expense of training. I wonder whether the teachers themselves have been alive to the existence of that provision, or how far they pressed it on the County Councils that it would be desirable for them to use this special financial power? It seems to me if the County Councils were wakened up on the subject we would hear less about the shortage in the supply of candidate teachers.

So many points have been brought forward, I leave them to others to deal with them. I content myself with saying it is no more grateful to me than it would be to any other Minister in my position to have less money to spend on education. It is not fair or right to say that two particular points of retrenchment have been singled out. The Minister has already made that clear. I am sure if it is necessary he will again make it clear that he aims at a wide and comprehensive scheme of retrenchment. It would not have been possible to bring forward such a scheme—it would have been absolutely impracticable—as Deputy O'Connell suggested, namely, to assess each spending department in the State with an equal assessment of a 10 per cent. reduction or something like that. There are probably some departments in which a larger reduction than 10 per cent. will be possible. There are others which, from the nature of the case, are dealing with development in the country and are themselves developing, and it would not be possible, as a matter of ordinary practicable policy, to assess them with the same reduction, or with any flat rate of reduction of expenditure.

That is plain, but the Minister has made it clear, and I think no one here misunderstands him—that he intends to extend the policy of retrenchment all round so far as it is practicable. The actual amount of reduction obtained on the two items which have been singled out, not by the Minister, but by those who are attacking the Minister, because they have the tactical advantage in concentrating on these two points—the total amount that could be saved by 10 per cent. reduction on these two items will not meet the Minister's requirements for the purpose of producing properly balanced accounts, but that purpose I, as a member of the Ministry, stand by the Minister for Finance. He acts in this policy of retrenchment not for himself, but for the Government, and not for the Government alone, but for the nation, and in that policy I stand by him. I think it is the most important item of our policy at present, and I trust that he will be an efficient instrument of the Government, of the Dáil, and of the country to carry that policy resolutely and successfully through.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I have had to remind myself now and again that this is a debate on the financial statement made by the Minister for Finance, and not a debate on the cut which the national teachers are asked to bear. I must say that I approve, and at the same time disapprove, of the statement made by the Minister. It would be a strange thing if I, as a member of the Farmers' Party which made economies in all national and local services the foremost plank in their platform, should disapprove of any steps taken by the Government in the nature of economy and retrenchment. I was almost taken by surprise, and was very much pleased, when I heard that the Minister for Finance had taken upon his shoulders a determined attempt to bring the finances of the country to a stable and sound basis. Although I approve of his action in doing so, I cannot say that I fully approve of the method by which he did it. It would seem to a casual auditor of this statement that the methods which guided the Minister were something like this. He said "We will have to retrench; now I will have a look at the expenditure list." One of the first items that strikes his eye is the immense amount of money spent on education, something like four millions. At the same time he sees an item for a somewhat similar amount for old age pensions, and he says: "I will retrench on these two items." I do not think that that is the right way to go to work on retrenchment. If retrenchment is necessary, as, of course, it is, all members of society, whether in the Government or outside it, should be forced to bear their share.

I have been closely associated all my life with many school teachers, and for many of them I have the highest regard. They are men who earnestly devoted their lives to inculcating ideas to their pupils which will lead to their advancement, and they did so at a very small remuneration. It is hard lines on them, at the moment when they were getting on their feet and becoming free from financial care, to be forced to bear a cut on their salaries. At the same time I believe they will have to do what every other member of society has to do, simply bear it, because the first essential to the prosperity of the country is a sound financial basis. We as farmers feel that we have borne more than our share of the depression which has fallen on the country. We have borne a large portion of taxation. Our prices are governed by foreign markets, and our salaries are not fixed at the highest war rate. We have to take whatever price we get in the markets of the world. It will be necessary that every member of the community should bear a reasonable share of the burden placed on us, and that the greater portion of the burden shall not be thrown on the farming community. There are a great many departments of State. I noticed in the Government returns on expenditure and revenue that there are over fifty Votes. I think there is room for economy in every one of these Departments. We would like to be sure that strenuous efforts will be made at once towards economy. We read in the papers day by day of appointments being filled which are not necessary. Civil servants are walking idle about the streets, while other men are filling their jobs. If there is any truth in those statements it is necessary to have measures adopted to stop such procedure.

I think a small committee should be set up with instructions to wield the axe in every department in which it can be wielded, and not to have it confined to one or two departments. There are other big estimates in the Government list besides education and old age pensions. There is, for instance, the Army. We all recognise the absolute necessity for the Army, but we are not at all sure that the Army is being run as economically as it could be. We are not sure that the higher officers are not being paid higher salaries than they should be. There are a great many internal economies within the Army that could be effected, such as in the catering, clothing and other branches in which we would like to see economies. We hear talk about establishing a flying corps and cavalry regiments. Are such things necessary? I, for one, cannot see that they are necessary.

Mr. JOHNSON: What would the President do without them?

Mr. HEFFERNAN: There is one item in the financial statement that does not please me, and that is with regard to the Post Office. We see that the estimated expenditure for the year is £2,720,000. The actual return for the half-year is £750,000, or £1,500,000 for the year, which means a loss of £1,200,000. Is it not possible that some economies could be enforced in regard to that system? I had a good deal of sympathy with Deputy Morrissey when he spoke of the auxiliary postmen who had to relinquish their jobs or take smaller salaries. I do not see why we in the country should be forced to bear the brunt of the economic axe. I do not see why we should be forced to have an unsatisfactory postal service in the country while the cities and towns have a full service. We should not be asked to bear such a large proportion of the expense of conducting the Post Office service.

I am sorry to see it has become necessary to enforce a cut in the pensions given to the old people of this country. I cannot say I would be prepared to vote against such a cut because apparently it has been absolutely necessary. Statements have been made by Deputies with regard to pensioners getting pensions to which they are not entitled, and I think Deputies are referring to the cases of small farmers who are getting pensions after having made over their farms to their sons or daughters. They say it is a duty which should be imposed on these sons and daughters to maintain their parents. Are Deputies aware of the profits made by small farmers in the past two years, or do they think those small farmers are in a position to support anybody? Are they in a position to support themselves? Deputies say these farmers should not have been allowed to retire until they retired into the grave. I must say those statements are most unreasonable. Finally, I should say that we are willing to give all the support possible to the Government in enforcing economy, and we wish to see economy, not piece-meal, but economy enforced all round. All officials who are drawing salaries from the Government should be forced to bear an equal share of the economies. There are other methods of economy which I think will come within the purview of the Government. They hardly come within a discussion of the statements made by the Minister for Finance. There are economies in Local Government to be effected. It is the duty of the Government to see that efforts are made at once to enforce economy in all public and local services.

MINISTER FOR FINANCE (Mr. E. Blythe): Like Deputy Hogan, I could almost vote for this amendment if it had been put in a slightly different form, and had been something in the nature of an addendum. It is unnecessary to assure the Dáil that we do not desire the detriment of education or to inflict suffering on the aged poor. We have simply to face the situation we are up against. This country has been thrown under a great burden of debt during the last year, and money has to be borrowed to meet the liabilities of the country. Deputy Johnson, in his statement, said if there was no struggle during the last year, we would have been as badly off owing to the clause in the Treaty with reference to the British National Debt. Whatever might have happened then, we would not have been up against the necessity of getting large sums of cash which we would have to borrow in the open market. If we had not to borrow big sums we could have run on for a year or so with an unbalanced Budget. It would not have mattered if we had to borrow two millions or so. It is undoubtedly an entirely different thing when we have to go into the open market to borrow big sums on terms which will not be ruinous to this country. Between good borrowing and bad borrowing there is the difference between safety and ruin. If we cannot establish the credit of this country, nothing can go ahead in it. There was talk about the need for spending money during next winter for the relief of unemployment. We could not think of undertaking this work without establishing our credit. If our credit is bad, and we have to borrow at some extravagant or ruinous rate, it would be impossible to contemplate such work. Take the Land Act. The actual operation of the Land Act will not cost the State very much, but if land is to be divided up, money must be borrowed to effect improvements. It will be a crushing burden on the tenant or occupier if the money cannot be borrowed at reasonable rates. Everything depends on reasonable and fair terms that will not destroy the country. We will have no credit if we do not make the best attempt we can to balance our Budget, and to show that from year to year we will be able to pay our way. To my mind there is no possibility of thinking of higher taxation. This country is fundamentally an agricultural country. The farmers of this country have to sell in a market where there is lower taxation than there is here. They have to compete with people who have lower taxation. If we go in for high taxation we are simply going a step further towards strangling the agricultural industry. I realise as well as Deputy Johnson the advantage there would be in the development of industry, and in promoting the growth of industrial towns and cities, if that could be done; but you cannot change the whole economic system of a country overnight. These are matters in which you must go slowly, or you will do more damage than you can anticipate.

Mr. JOHNSON: Let us know the direction.

Mr. BLYTHE: I think that high taxation, or increased taxation, must be absolutely ruled out. As a matter of fact, we might be compelled by circumstances to decrease our taxation. We might be compelled to make cuts that we do not contemplate at the moment to enable us to decrease taxation, for I believe if the British lower their Income Tax another 6d., and ours remains at 5s., our yield would decrease. There are cases where, if you put your taxation higher than the circumstances would warrant, your yield diminishes. I believe we would be in that position in regard to Income Tax if what I have suggested were to happen, and in that case, I believe, to safeguard the revenue we have, we should sacrifice the revenue that would be brought about by reductions. In any case if we could reduce taxation, it would be one of the best possible ways to facilitate the development of industry. I think there is nothing we can do which will promote industrial development better than to cut taxation down, and that can only be done by effecting savings. When we talk about savings we must look at the situation steadily, and we must really try to understand its seriousness. Some of those who have spoken here, and a large number of the people who talk and write about the matter outside, do not face its seriousness. More than £3,000,000 must be saved if we are to balance our Budget in the financial year, so far as ordinary recurrent expenditure is concerned. That postulates an army which will not cost more than £2,000,000. If the Army costs more than £2,000,000, then the saving to be effected will just by so much exceed £3,000,000, so that it is necessary to face the fact that we must economise in every way that we can.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I do not want to interrupt the Minister, but he states that the Army, on the estimate that he made for recurrent expenditure, must not exceed £2,000,000. In his opening statement he said £4,000,000. I would like to know exactly which of the two figures we may accept, or if his present statement has not been made in error.

Mr. BLYTHE: I estimate that the Army for the next financial year will cost about £4,000,000. I anticipate that we will have to borrow some of the Army expenditure for the next year, but we cannot go on borrowing for the Army. I do not expect that we can get down to what I would regard as normal expenditure for the next year, but that does not contemplate that we will pay £4,000,000 out of revenue. When I say that we must effect a saving of £3,000,000 to balance our Budget, I do not contemplate paying £4,000,000 out of revenue for the Army. I believe that we will have to borrow to the extent of a couple of million pounds to meet the Army charge. It is necessary to face the making of savings in every possible direction. A great deal of the talk about old age pensioners and teachers is absolutely unreal; it does not move me in the very least. People say, "Why should these be singled out?" I know that the people who say that do not believe for a moment that they are singled out. Deputy O'Connell casts doubts on my honesty or sincerity when I say that further cuts will be made in respect of other services, but he is quite prepared to accept the statement that we will consider whether further cuts, or what further cuts, can be made on the national teachers. There is not much consistency in that. These two services were services where it was possible to make a straight cut, as it were.

The teachers bore no reductions as the cost of living fell. It was possible to make an all-round cut. For reasons that I will come to in a moment, except in one or two other cases, it was not possible to make an all-round cut; the thing had to be gone into in detail. You had to see where the burden could be laid more heavily and where it had to be laid more lightly, but I defend these two cuts on their merits. Other cuts will be made very soon. I have already made up my mind, subject to further consultation with the Departments concerned, in regard to other very substantial cuts, and I have put forward suggestions in regard to other very substantial cuts already.

Take the case of the teachers' salaries. A male principal teacher, Grade II., with about 20 years' service in a school of 60 pupils, received, before the war, in salary and capitation, £129 per year. He receives at present, in salary and capitation, about £436 per year, representing an increase of £238 per cent. That means that that particular teacher has had 125 per cent. added to his pre-war salary, with full Civil Service bonus on top of that. That would indicate that a cut could be made, having regard to the fact that these new salaries were fixed when the cost of living bonus was at its highest point. When the negotiations leading up to the fixing of these salaries took place, the cost of living was steadily rising. Admitting, as I do, that the pre-war salaries were inadequate, I think that it is not good economy to take a whole class and to increase their salaries to the extent that I have indicated, because, taking them on the average, you get men with certain ability and certain qualifications coming on at low salaries, which is the thing that happened in the Civil Service. You had increases; men were graded anew, and you had the same men doing the same kind of work on very much higher salaries. I think if you are to get the best value for your money increases should not be so rapid or so sudden as that for a whole class of people.

Deputy O'Connell referred to teachers who were getting a salary of only £24 a year pre-war. Now they are getting £110, five or six times the pre-war salary. There has been a very substantial increase there. I do not believe that any reasonable person really believes that there is any injustice in this 10 per cent. cut. We should have regard, as we have in other respects, to the value of the money paid and not to the number of notes. If the teachers' increases had been spread over a period when they got the full scale, when the increase was fixed, they would not have been nearly as well off as they are to-day. If the cost of living goes down another 20 per cent. they would be a good deal better off than they are to-day. It is ridiculous to argue that they should be paid so much money in notes regardless of the value that that is stability. That is not stability. You have stability by giving them such a salary as will enable them to live in a certain way and at a certain rate. The outcry I do not take too seriously. It is just the sort of outcry that is natural and is to be expected, and I do not believe that you will find the teachers refusing to do their duty. It does not do them an injustice, and I have no fear that, in spite of any soreness, they will fail to do their duty, just as before the cut was made. All classes of people have had to suffer cuts, and they have gone along when they recognised it to be inevitable, and accepted it, and there was no more about it. I do not attach any importance to the suggestion some very foolish teachers have made that they would not do their duty in the future. I think they only got intoxicated with the eloquence that sometimes goes on at these meetings.

The old age pensions question has, I think, been very carefully debated. We have no desire to hurt or to cause any suffering to the aged poor. We were very reluctant indeed to come to the decision that this cut should be made, but it was clearly one that could be made without inflicting hardship, because it leaves the pensioners in substantially the same position as they were so far as the actual value is concerned, pre-war, and in a very much better position than they were a couple of years ago, or than they were when the pensions were fixed. It is not very much use, having regard to the seriousness of the financial situation, to say that money could be saved by striking off those who are not entitled to the pension. We want it all, and anything that can be saved by striking off those not entitled will have to be saved. I believe, however, there is more humanity in making an all-round cut than in trying to make a saving by an administrative tightening up. When you have a service like this there is a great deal of rigidity.

If you attempt, too carefully, to exclude every single person who might be excluded by any rule you will inflict more hardship than you will by spreading over the cut in this way. I would save all that could be reasonably saved by careful administration, but I certainly would not be out to save the last penny that could be saved by rigid administration, because I believe you would have your rules cutting out people who ought to have pensions. I believe that, while some legislation should be made to have a tightening up, that particular thing ought not to be carried too far, because you have to see that you do not need to press it in such a way that there is no absolute discretion in favour of the applicant in a doubtful case.

In regard to the Civil Service, there has been a great deal of exaggerated talk which has gone from mouth to mouth, and newspaper to newspaper, about swollen staffs. As a matter of fact, practically no permanent appointments have been made since the change of Government.

Mr. JOHNSON: Do the temporaries cost nothing?

Mr. BLYTHE: I will deal with that. For instance, on the established staff, between the 1st of May and the 1st of October, there was really a reduction of 189. A temporary staff have been taken on in considerable numbers for temporary work. For example, a considerable temporary staff is required to deal with Army Accounts and Army Finance, but there has not been any permanent appointments owing to the fact that the Civil Service Commission was not set up, and there cannot be any inflation of the permanent staff, so that if the permanent staffs are inflated it is not our fault. We have certain special difficulties in dealing with the Civil Service. The people who were taken over at the change of Government were given certain rights under Clause 10 of the Treaty. I think that that is the worse clause in the whole Treaty. It follows the line of the Act of 1920, and was incorporated in the Treaty direct from that Act. I do not know what negotiations ever took place in regard to it. I certainly think that Civil Servants were entitled, on change of Government, to some reasonable protection, but the clause goes further than such a clause need have gone.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Why not scrap it?

Mr. BLYTHE: We have no intention of scrapping the international agreement which enabled this State to be set up, and which enabled the Irish people to have control over their own affairs. If we dismiss or alter substantially the conditions of service of these Civil Servants who have the protection of that clause, we might let ourselves in for a swollen superannuation charge, which would perhaps exceed the savings that we might effect by a cut in this particular service. The Treaty gives rights to those particular servants to retire on particular terms if there is a material alteration in the conditions of their service.

We have been charged already with getting rid of civil servants and public employees wholesale. Deputy Captain Redmond said that we had a policy of sack the lot."

Captain REDMOND: I must interrupt the Minister. I am very sorry, but that is not what I said. I asked whether that was to be the policy.

Mr. BLYTHE: In all, the discharges have totalled 454. These include 36 Resident Magistrates, 23 o'clock. Crown Solicitors, 304 Petty Sessions Clerks, and 53 officers of the Marlborough Street Training College, which is closed down, leaving a very small number of other civil servants. To my mind those discharges were unavoidable in the circumstances. They were financially very costly, but not to have made them might have been a great deal more costly still. For instance, when the Resident Magistrates were discharged there was no sort of civil government in the major part of the country. You had neither police nor courts, nothing but the army. There was no use in putting police there without putting courts. You could not have the Resident Magistrates to function. Some of them were fair and reasonable men who would have been good enough magistrates; others of them were incompetent, but whether competent or incompetent you could not use them. For the interest and for the future of the country, and in order to get settled conditions, it was necessary to get rid of them and to establish courts in which there would be public confidence and against which there would be no public feeling. The same thing applied to the Crown Solicitors and Petty Sessions Clerks.

Mr. WILSON: Petty Sessions Clerks!

Mr. BLYTHE: In the present atmosphere we may not realise the difficulties that existed until a very short time ago. Conditions are comparatively settled now, but anybody who will just cast his mind back will realise that without the changes that were made, without getting rid of the old officials whom the people felt to be nothing more than agents of the old regime, it would have been impossible to get a system of police and a system of courts and civil government working in the country. It would be a different thing at the present time, but in the circumstances that existed when these things were done there was nothing else to do. Remember it would not take very many Mallow viaducts or very many mansions to meet the whole cost of these discharges. If we did try to use the old officials whom the people were against we would have caused a continuance of the campaign of destruction that would have cost us a great deal more than the charge that was involved in making the change. For my part I say that the Government has absolutely nothing to regret or apologise for in regard to them. We have very carefully done as little as we possibly could have done in the public interest in the matter of discharges. We have never discharged any man for the purpose of making room for another. Never! I say that without any hesitation. We discharged men with regret and reluctance, and only when we felt that the public interest demanded it.

In addition to those who have been discharged 700 persons have retired in consequence of the change of Government, and under Article X. of the Treaty, they have got special terms, but not terms that were so onerous on the State as those that were given to people who were discharged. Of the 700, 400 have gone from the Post Office, and there is just one matter for regret in that. During the Post Office strike there was some thought of dismissing the men who were on strike. The settlement came a little quickly in the end, and the men were not dismissed. They went back to work and then—I do not know whether the whole 400—but the majority of them went out claiming that they would not serve under the Free State Government, and claimed Treaty terms. It is a matter for regret that they were given the opportunity of doing that.

The suggestion that has been made that the Government, by inflating the public services and by wholesale discharges of people who were willing to serve the Government, have brought the country to the present financial pass is entirely without foundation. When we say that the headquarters establishments of the Government must bear their share of the economies that are to be effected we must have regard to all these facts. We first have to make our economies in such a way as to see that they are not neutralised by swelling the pension lists. Then we must have regard to the fact that very substantial cuts have come off the ordinary civil servants during the past eighteen months. The man who in March, 1921, had an inclusive salary of £200 has now an inclusive salary of £140. The man who had £300 eighteen months ago has £214 now. The man who had £400 has £294. The man who had £500 has £374. That is, a civil servant who had £500 in March, 1921, has already suffered a cut amounting to £126 per annum, so that fairly substantial cuts have already been taken off.

In the Government Departments economies are to be effected in two ways. They are to be effected by salary reductions where you can effect the salary reductions. They are to be effected by reductions of staff. You cannot go into a Government department and say that anything is to be done on the lines of ten or fifteen per cent. In the Departments in which there is over-staffing the over-staffing is in pockets. You must go over the service, you must examine the department, you must see where the economies can be effected. If there are to be salary cuts you must see where the salary cuts should take place. If there are to be eliminations of personnel, you have to go over the department and see where those eliminations can take place.

At the present time the Civil Service roughly consists—these figures are not just up to date, but they are roughly accurate—of some 7,856 established civil servants (of whom 4,339 are in the Post Office and 3,517 in the other departments); and 12,078 unestablished civil servants (of whom 8,264 are in the Post Office and 3,814 are in the other departments). Staff has to be eliminated by getting greater output where the output is insufficient, and by getting rid of services where the services can be got rid of. It might have been possible, if we could have waited long enough, to have given a complete scheme of economies, to have said we propose to save so much in such a department and so much in such another department, and bring out a total here to the Dáil. But Deputies, I think, will see that cannot be done in a week or even in a month.

We must really effect our economies as we can see how they are to be effected. We are not in the pleasant financial position in which we can say that the teachers are not to be touched until the last possible clerk has been discharged from, say, the General Registrar's Office, or whatever office you like to talk about. When you have a deficit of three or four millions to be made up, and the necessity of borrowing immediately ahead, you cannot take the casual irresponsible attitude taken up outside and say So-and-So should be the last. Anybody who will look over the Estimates for a moment will see that it will be with the very greatest difficulty that four millions or three and a half millions of saving can be effected. I would like any Deputy who looks over the Estimates to try and form an opinion as to where that amount of money is to be got. Roughly speaking, I can see where the most of it is to be got, but the remainder of it will have to be got by very close scraping indeed. It is simply trifling with a very serious situation to suggest that we should wait, and that we should go on spending at our present high rate until we can see what is the last economy to be effected. As I have stated, to suggest that we intend to make the cut in these two services and then do no more is an insincere suggestion. So far as we are concerned, we might as well not bother at all if that was all we were going to do. If it was our intention to make these two cuts only, better not begin at all, as the result would go nowhere near meeting the deficit. Deputies should at least give us, if not any credit for sincerity, at least credit for having some little intelligence. It would be only earning odium for ourselves and doing nothing to stave off what would inevitably overtake the country if we did not attempt to balance the Budget. I would ask Deputies to look at it in that light.

The suggestion has been made that an independent Committee should be appointed to look over the Departments. At the moment, I do not believe that an independent Committee would be of any value. The appointment of a Committee would simply delay the work and not expedite it. We are not a bit afraid of doing anything that is necessary to be done. We have done many things that were unpleasant and difficult during our period of office, and we are not afraid of doing anything necessary for the welfare of the country. We are able to face any unpopularity that may be necessary for the purpose of balancing the Budget, so that we do not need the protection of a Committee. We do not need to say:

"We would not do it, but the Committee recommended it."

There are matters on which we might want advice from a committee. There are matters where it is not simply a question of economising, but a question of dispensing with services. That is a much more difficult matter than is involved in the cases we have mentioned. It may be very important and have widespread reactions to dispense with a particular service, and in that respect it would be a good thing for us to get advice from some sort of a committee, representing different points of view, who would examine the matter.

As far as one particular service is concerned, I have had under consideration the appointment of an independent committee, but there is really no virtue in a committee as such. The matter is fairly simple, and certainly the driving force is very strong. Failure to show a clear determination to balance our Budget would mean that we might get a certain amount of money now, but we would get it on onerous terms. We would not get enough to carry us any distance, and when we came to look for more the terms would be still more onerous, and the burden cast on the country would be greater than might be expected from us. That would be detrimental to the national interest, and so we would be slipping down the slope to complete bankruptcy. We are absolutely determined that we are not going to be in the position, having brought the country through all that it has been through, of allowing any sort of sentimental feeling or any desire to drift along comfortably to cause us to let the country get into as bad a mess as we brought it out of. I can only say to Deputies at the present moment that we will effect all the economies necessary to balance the Budget, and that we will not spare any class or any service that can be laid under contribution. We must do that. It is our simple duty to do it, and we, I think, can be trusted to do it. There is no need, I think, for me to indicate to the Dáil the economies where the decision as to the exact nature and extent of the economies is not fully come to. There is no need to put forward suggested economies, but we are under the necessity of indicating, in a practical manner, that we do mean to economise. People have stated here, one after the other, and there has been a sort of parrot cry throughout the country, that we should not have effected these particular economies until we were ready for them and until we could announce the whole lot of the others. My settled conviction is, it is not much use to promise the country those interested economies sometime. We must show them the economies now. It was in that spirit, in places where the matter was fairly simple, that we decided on announcing the economies at once. The other economies that are coming will be announced as they are made and as we have come to a final decision as to the exact character and to the exact nature of the particular economy. Deputy O'Connell reminded me of Oliver Twist when he was asking for more, that is more for other people. The more will be forthcoming all right, so that he need not be alarmed. If he simply thinks of the teachers he will probably have enough to think of, and we will effect the economies in regard to other people. As I have said already, some credit should be given to the intention of the Government, and to the determination of the Government, to do what it is their duty, in the interests of the country, to do.

OLD AGE PENSIONS REDUCTIONS.

Mr. ALFRED BYRNE: I beg to move amendment No. 3:—

“To delete all after the word ‘address,’ and to substitute therefor the words ‘but, while approving of the decision of Minister to “avoid waste, and extract the utmost value from all public expenditure (Par. 23), cannot agree to the proposal which would cause severe hardship on many poor old age pensioners in the Free State.”’

I promise to be brief in moving this amendment. One point that has not been touched upon, in connection with old age pensions, is a matter which is bound to come into effect in the City of Dublin, and that is, the reduction in the old age pensions in the city, which may mean something small to the Minister for Finance, but which the Minister for Local Government must be aware will have a very serious effect upon the majority of the old age pensioners who are living in the slums of Dublin. They will be forced to apply, if this cut is made, for Poor Law relief, and, if they do not get Poor Law relief, they will be compelled to go into the workhouse. While you may save a little, therefore, in the one department, the Department of Finance, you are bound to get considerable cost and loss in the Departments of Local Government in consequence of this cut of a shilling in the old age pensions. I am aware that there are many cases in the City of Dublin of old age pensioners who have no other source of income, and if a shilling is taken off the ten shillings it will mean that they will not be able to exist. It will be the last straw, and they will have to be taken into the workhouse, and the cost in the workhouse is estimated at 18s. 6d. per head. The Minister for Local Government would do well to consider that point, in my opinion. I endorse the suggestion made by three or four Deputies who have spoken in previous debates, that a committee should be appointed to consider these cases of reduction on their merits, and wherever it is found that the recipients of old age pensions are not working and not in receipt of other means they would deal with them accordingly. The cases such as I have alluded to in the tenement areas of the city might well be left alone, and the people so situated saved from the workhouse.

I am personally aware that some years ago there was a building in the City of Dublin let in rooms at 1s. per week, and the Assistant Master of the Union, when pensions were increased to 10s., made every effort to get accommodation in these places for people entitled to pension if they came out of the workhouse. He succeeded in getting a great many of them to transfer from the workhouse to these rooms let at 1s. per week. There are many deserving cases such as I have mentioned, and in this one building I know the Assistant Master of the Dublin Union got accommodation for twenty people who were not in receipt of any more than the 10s. a week pension. I think it will be a great hardship if these people are to suffer because there are others in various parts of the country whom the Minister thinks unworthy of the pension. Suggestions have been made as to how retrenchment could be effected. The public outside are saying that there are too many thousand-a-year men knocking around. There are too many appointments being made of thousand-a-year men whose value in the commercial world would not be more than three or four hundred a year at the very outside. If the Government wish to retrench they can start with these thousand-a-year men. Let them begin with the highly-paid officials and reduce them. I would be greatly against curtailment of the salaries of the smaller under-paid employees. I am not beyond saying that even the members of the Dáil and the members of the Seanad should be prepared to forego some of their salaries in the interest of economy.

I promised I would be very brief, and I will keep that promise. I will move the amendment, and I hope it will get some larger support than the previous amendment by Deputy Johnson.

Mr. JAMES COSGRAVE: I beg to second.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE DÁIL.

EMBARGO ON IRISH LIVE STOCK.

Mr. BLYTHE: I move the adjournment of the debate and the Dáil until to-morrow. Although it may not be on the Order Paper, if there is time after the other matters on the Paper are disposed of, it may be possible to resume the debate to-morrow. If not, it can be adjourned further.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: On to-morrow's Order Paper this item does not appear. If the Ministers and Secretaries Bill does not take the whole day, there will be time to resume the debate. The adjournment, therefore, means that Deputy O'Connell's amendment with regard to the fishing industry may be taken to-morrow if the Order Paper permits it. The motion, therefore, is that the Dáil adjourns until to-morrow.

Mr. McKENNA: I wish to call the attention of the Dáil to the unfair action of the English Board of Agriculture in closing the ports to Irish live stock owing to the recent outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease at the landing places of Great Britain, with a view to giving the Minister for Agriculture an opportunity of stating the exact position at the present time, and also with a view to strengthening his hands in dealing with the authorities in Great Britain. As members are aware, the whole live stock export trade of this country has been held up for the past eight or nine days. Thousands of cattle, sheep and pigs are lying at the various ports in Ireland and Great Britain. Our fairs have also been held up with the exception of any internal trade that has been carried on. The result that our agriculturalists have suffered untold losses, and this important industry is being ruined by these harassing regulations. In view of the fact that we have the cleanest bill of health of any country in the world so far as the livestock trade is concerned, I think it is our duty to enter an emphatic protest against this embargo because it constitutes a stigma on our livestock trade which is unjust and injurious to its reputation throughout the world. At the outset, I would like to tell the Dáil as one of the members who has been in close touch with this question that the best thanks of the Dáil, and of the country, are due to the Minister for Agriculture and his veterinary staff for dealing so quickly with the matter and proving to the world that Ireland has a clean bill of health. Nobody can realise the difficulty with which Mr. Hogan had to contend in this matter. To my own knowledge he was bombarded every day with deputations and every minute with telephone messages, and the most difficult task he had to accomplish was due to the demand made by the English Board of Agriculture to have traced the places from which these animals were taken to the landing places in Great Britain.

That was a huge task, because you can well imagine cattle mixing in the various ports of Ireland, sold at different fairs and shipped from 8 o'clock.

different ports. The Minister acted in a manner highly satisfactory to everybody, and he certainly pleased a crowd which it is often very difficult to please—namely, the farmers and the dealers. The only people he did not please are the men of the type of diplomats who think that the best way to remedy a situation like this is to go to the Minister in England and shake their fists in his face. I do not wish to suggest that we should interfere with the domestic regulations in Great Britain, but I think it only fair to ask the English Board of Agriculture to deal fairly with us in this matter. I think they have forgotten—eaten bread is soon forgotten—what we did for them in the war. During the war Ireland sent to Great Britain 3,862,222 cattle. In 1920 Ireland had only 10 per cent. of the population of Great Britain, but had 43 per cent. of the cattle, and two out of every five of that number were slaughtered in Great Britain. We have started housekeeping on our own, and if we are to be hampered by these harassing restrictions in our infant State, it is going seriously to affect this country. We had new legislation introduced under the Diseases of Animals' Act, but a good many people do not seem to understand these regulations. Owing to the lifting of the embargo on Canadian cattle and the passing of the Free State Act, legislation had to be introduced regarding the movement of animals. There was an Order in Council passed in 1884 under the Diseases of Animals' Act, and in 1896 that Order was made an Act of Parliament. So far as that Act of Parliament was concerned, it was passed for the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and within the meaning of that Act every country outside Great Britain and Ireland was a foreign country. The embargo was removed off Canadian cattle, and the Free State Act was passed. The question then arose whether Ireland was still an integral part of the United Kingdom. Sir Edward Carson said that Northern Ireland was, but that Southern Ireland was a foreign country and should be treated on the same terms as Canada. That meant that the Government had to introduce fresh legislation in Great Britain.

An Act was passed in 1922, and the word "imported" was substituted for the word "foreign." That is the position of affairs at the present date, and it is due to this change in the legislation that a good many people do not understand the situation, and the biggest difficulty the Ministry and the country had to contend with was that the Government in England refused now to pay compensation for any animals having this disease detained at Ports in Great Britain. That question has to be dealt with by the Government or trade. It is a very big question. We have had conferences with the Minister. I hope some arrangements will be come to, because if those stoppages keep on, it will interfere very much with the carrying on of the live-stock trade.

Another thing I wish to call the attention of the Dáil to in connection with this matter is the lying statements circulated in Great Britain about this country. Statements are being made throughout England at Agricultural meetings and to members of Agricultural Societies, that we are cloaking this disease and have not a clean bill of health. Seeing that the Government has a Publicity Department, they should refute those statements and tell the people the truth. Here is a statement made at a very important meeting the other day:—

“Mr. Sadler (Cheshire) said he was sure the Chamber had no desire to embarrass the Minister in this matter; rather were they anxious to help him. There were, however, circumstances which made it imperative in the interests of stockowners that a searching inquiry should be made without delay. On September 1 eleven cattle arrived at Crewe from Fleetwood. Immediately after being unloaded some cattle and sheep were driven down the same alleyway. On September 3 one of the cattle was suspected, but no order was made until midnight of September 3. Every opportunity was given of the sheep being distributed, and almost wherever they went there were outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease. These outbreaks would not have taken place if the Order had been made in the morning instead of at midnight. On September 5, 40 cattle were slaughtered and burned at Fleetwood; presumably they were part of the same consignment from which the eleven in question came. These cattle had come from Belfast, and it was the opinion in Cheshire that these cattle brought the disease from Belfast. The Ministry, however, said it was believed that the disease was carried into the lairage by a veterinary surgeon who had been attending a milk fever case amongst the cattle. The entry of Irish cattle into Cheshire had now been prohibited for a period. If these facts did not call for a searching inquiry, what did?”

What occurred in that case was a Vet., belonging to the English Board of Agriculture, came in to attend a cow, down with milk fever, and brought the disease into the port. That is the kind of thing that is going on, and we are accused of bolstering up the foot-and-mouth disease here. Here is another statement:—“‘It is about time that we stopped trifling with this foot-and-mouth disease,’ said Mr. J. James Sheepecote at the Cardiff Farmers’ Union on Saturday, November 3. He added that when the Ministry of Agriculture had control over Ireland they had very little trouble with the disease. British farmers believed that it was brought in with the Irish cattle and were asking for a month’s period of quarantine detention, while some Farmers’ Unions were calling for the total prohibition of Irish cattle. Captain Howells-Evans, County Secretary, said they must be fair with the Irish farmers. The National Council had gone into the matters thoroughly, and not a single case out of the 100 outbreaks of foot-and-mouth since August could be traced to Ireland. A resolution was agreed to calling for a 28 days’ quarantine on all imported cattle.”

In England at the present time County Councils of each county have a right, independent of the Board of Agriculture, to make an order prohibiting, if they so desire, the importation of any cattle into their own county. There is a lot of prejudice against our live stock trade. Consequently, I would like to give all the support we can to the Minister for Agriculture in this country. Also Northern Ireland and we should co-operate with one another. In this matter it is like the Siamese Twins, the life of the North and South are dependent on one another. I would like that the Minister would see that some arrangements are come to with these people. What they are after doing at present is ridiculous. Although they were not able to trace this disease to Ireland they allowed all the live stock at the landing places go to slaughterhouses in their thousands, and refused further shipments until they were disinfected. They took 11 days to disinfect Manchester lairages. That long interval is an impossible state of affairs. I would like the Minister to impress them to have those arrangements modified. I will say no more than that I would hope the Government in England will not, in the infant stage of this State, do anything that will injure the principal industry of our country. In the past we had very few industries which were not crushed. This is practically among the last left and I hope it will not be killed by Government action.

MINISTER FOR AGRICULTURE

(Mr. Hogan): My task is fairly easy and a little unusual. When a matter is raised on the Adjournment, as a rule it is to complain of maladministration of some Irish service, but in this case it is to complain of maladministration of a service in England. We must realise, and I think Deputy McKenna realises, that England is an independent country, and that we are another. They will take the steps that they think fit to protect their own interests, and we cannot do very much to compel them to change their methods. The cattle industry is, of course, extremely important, in money values probably the most important of our exports, and I quite realise that it would be the duty of the Ministry of Agriculture to make to the English Government whatever representations should be made in view of the seriousness of the case and in the light of the fact that we are two independent countries. We are doing that. The facts are not quite as the Deputy stated them. It is admitted in England that there is no foot-and-mouth disease in Ireland. Of course you will not prevent farmers in England from talking, as you will not prevent farmers in Ireland. Farmers are much the same all over the world; they have their good qualities and their bad qualities, but they are very much of a type. They will complain sometimes without much reason. In some of the agricultural papers I saw the report of a farmers' meeting in Cheshire, which might have been a farmers' meeting in Cork. They wanted to know what this Agricultural Department of theirs was doing, and it was stated that, in fact, their veterinary surgeons were carrying the disease around in their pockets, and spreading it among the cattle. Anyway, they wanted to know the reason why, and they are going to put an end to things generally. That was the whole tone of the meeting, and it reminded me very much of similar meetings in Cork. But English officials have admitted publicly that there is no foot-and-mouth disease in Ireland. That was admitted in the English House of Commons and House of Lords within the last couple of days, and they have also admitted, which, in my opinion, was very frank, that the contagion in the particular instance mentioned by the Deputy was carried by an English vet. from infected stock which he had been visiting to stock which were perfectly healthy before he arrived at the landing place where they were detained, so that the facts are clear. We can do a certain amount to make them hurry up, and we are doing it. They have agreed, on our representations, to take cattle at present in British landing-places out of these landing-places, and to allow the owners either to sell them at the landing-places prior to removal or to remove them to places outside the landing-places. This is extremely important for this reason. The old law in the matter, the Act of 1894, was changed by the Importation of Animals' Act of 1922, as the Deputy has stated, and the existing law is as follows:—Any cattle slaughtered in England, except at landing-places—and "landing-places" is a technical term which I will explain in a moment—are paid for by the British Government, no matter whether English, Irish or Canadian. No cattle infected in Ireland are paid for, so that there is only one missing link in the chain, and that is, the landing-place.

There are landing places at all the ports to which cattle were shipped for the last twelve years, the usual ports used by the cattle shippers in Ireland, and the areas within those ports which come within the legal meaning of the term are strictly defined. When a cargo of cattle is landed from Ireland, they are immediately taken to the lair-age in the landing place, isolated there—or supposed to be isolated—and they must be kept there for a minimum period of ten hours, after which they may be taken away on licence. These regulations, of course, might be improved from our point of view, but they enable the trade to carry on without very much trouble. I think dealers will agree, generally, that though the regulations look severe enough, they do not prevent ordinary normal trading in normal times. But when foot and mouth disease breaks out in England it is another question. The outbreak may occur near a landing place. The area surrounding the landing place is scheduled, and the cattle are kept there. The outbreak may spread within that area. The veterinary surgeon may have taken it into the landing-place; the cattle become infected there and are slaughtered, and there is no compensation. That happened in Glasgow. There are 700 Irish cattle there not yet slaughtered, but we fear they will be slaughtered, because the outbreak has occurred actually in the landing place. The concession which they made, as a result of our representations, is that they are taking out the cattle detained in all the other places and removing them to an area covered by the Act in this sense that if they are slaughtered in this area they will be paid for. That, of course, is a big and very important concession from the point of view of the Irish trade. We tried, and I presume the Northern Government made the same attempt, to satisfy the English authorities that they should pay for cattle even when they were slaughtered in the landing places. We both failed. They refused to do that, and that is a standing grievance with the Northern Government. They say: "We are not a Free State; we are part of England; we have insisted on remaining along with the Motherland, and yet we are treated like foreigners," and some of the most hot-headed members of the Belfast Parliament have spoken very frankly of that particular procedure, on the part of the British Government that they used to be so fond of.

In any event, they refuse absolutely to pay compensation for cattle slaughtered in these landing places, and have done so even though it was proved beyond question, as it has been in this case, that the cattle were not infected on this side. Once they admit there is no foot and mouth disease in Ireland they admit by implication that the cattle must have been infected on the other side. That is their present attitude. While there is life there is hope. I am not going to say more on the attitude of the British Government on the subject. Irish farmers knew of this for a year, and their organisation should have taken steps to cover themselves against this particular risk. The cost would not be over £10,000 a year for a lengthy period. That is a very small charge indeed. An arrangement could be made by which a charge for insurance would cover that risk, what cattle might become affected in the landing stage. Irish farmers knew for a year that was the position, and perhaps they might have taken steps earlier to meet the case. However, we are all waking up now, as we do when the event occurs, and possibly we will be able to come to some satisfactory arrangement, pending the time the English Government changes its mind in the matter. We cannot ensure what the English Government will do. England is an independent country, but I cannot resist seizing this occasion to remind farmers that we were enabled to present a clean bill of health to the British Government within four days of the notification of the outbreak in England by reason of the regulations which we made in the last six months and concerning which, I suppose, I have got five thousand letters from farmers and cattle dealers all over the country complaining bitterly. I read of meetings of farmers all over the country and find that they say that this is officialdom, and that the officials have nothing else to do but make these regulations, and that they are asked to fill up that form and this form as if they had nothing else to do. But the reason we were able to present a clean bill of health in four days was that we had made these regulations and enforced them. The regulations I refer to are those in regard to tagging and handing certificates to station masters where the cattle are loaded, giving the origin of the cattle. We intend to continue these regulations; they have justified themselves. We intend to go further. If we discover any case where farmers or dealers have given wrong certificates—and I know they have gone to the trouble of filling up certificates which they have given to the station master, and they have these certificates filled in with wrong names; every cattle dealer knows that is done—we have pretty effective powers to cope with that, and if we find any case of that we will deal with the offenders drastically. We cannot make any arrangement which would help matters in England, but we can make arrangements to cover ourselves here, and do not blame the Department of Agriculture if we make further regulations which may have the effect of saving hundreds of thousands of pounds to the cattle trade by way of expedition when the outbreak occurs.

Mr. JOHNSON: May I ask the Minister will he give the Dáil an assurance that sufficient protection is being provided against the carrying of foot-and-mouth disease from England to Ireland?

Mr. HOGAN: The position in that regard is very difficult. It is through good luck that the foot-and-mouth disease has not broken out here. It is rife in England for three months, and it is extraordinarily contagious. In fact the technical men are not quite clear as to how it is carried. We have arrangements under which every dealer, and every man in the trade crossing from England, shall be disinfected at the ports, and we find it extremely difficult to get these arrangements carried out and properly enforced. The disinfection process is very simple. We do not know how effective it is, but we are told it is fairly effective, and it does not delay the man very long. Yet I know, and the cattle dealers know, that every attempt has been made to evade it, and actually they have told me they are not going to have a policeman collar them when they land and shove them into the disinfecting chamber. We have had policemen at the ports and warnings to come into this disinfecting chamber. The cattle traders would be doing themselves a good turn if they took up this matter through their organisations, and insist that every cattle dealer who lands should be disinfected.

Even if that is done of course it is only ensuring against one-tenth of the risk. It might be carried by a passenger, a drover, a groom, or anybody, but we might happen to get the right man if everyone co-operated. I think it right to say this, that in addition to allowing the cattle at present at the landing-places to be removed, the ports are going to be opened within a day or two, but under more stringent regulations. The regulations in force about six months ago are going to be repeated. This is not official, but I understand that the position will probably be something like this: The existing regulations allow cattle to be taken from the landing-places to a premises or market after ten hours' detention. After 10 hours' detention they are taken from the landing-places either to a market or a slaughter-house. If sold at a market they are taken to a farm, and they must be quarantined there for seven days. The trade is carried on all right in that way, because what happens really is that the cattle are taken to market, purchased and taken home by the farmer, kept for seven days, and then they can be taken away. It is possible that they may increase the seven days' quarantine. It is not exactly quarantine, but a detention period. They are doing it for this reason: They say that Irish cattle are not infected with foot-and-mouth disease. We all know that. Their case is that Irish cattle are the carriers of the disease. They are the cattle that move through England from east to west, and if they become infected near the port, the incubation period is anything from three to seven days, and it takes from three to seven days before anyone discovers it. The English case is that these cattle may infect other cattle on the way through. Hence it is possible that if they open the ports they may lengthen the period of detention.

Mr. J. T. NOLAN: The statement of the Minister is, I think, very clear.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is the Deputy going to ask a question? That [An Ceann Comhairle.] is the only opportunity the Deputy can have.

Mr. NOLAN: Could the Minister make arrangements that these veterinary surgeons who come from infected areas will not come into contact with the Irish cattle after coming over, so that this outbreak will not be repeated again if possible? If they are coming across will he see that these people will be disinfected, so that they will not bring the disease to us?

Mr. HOGAN: English veterinary surgeons do not come across here. I presume what the Deputy means is that he is afraid English veterinary surgeons attending to English cattle which are infected will go into Irish lairages. The English regulations deal with that. It is to the interest of the English authorities to see that veterinary surgeons are duly disinfected after dealing with infected cattle before they come in contact with healthy cattle. That is a thing that the English authorities look after.

Mr. WHITE: Would the Minister consider the advisability of employing travelling veterinary inspectors to accompany large consignments of cattle to the principal landing-places in Great Britain to see that officials of the English Board of Agriculture are doing their duty fairly and straightly?

Mr. HOGAN: I am glad I was asked that question because it is rather important. Some one said "Economy!" The very minute an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease occurs, say, in Glasgow, I am rung up on the telephone and asked if I will receive a deputation.

I need not ask what it is about. It is to send a man over to Glasgow and see what is wrong. That looks very reasonable at the first blush, but remember this: the English Department always takes our certificate, and the certificate of our veterinary surgeons, without question. We must reciprocate. We cannot do business on any other lines. There is an arrangement that when an English veterinary surgeon discovers disease amongst Irish cattle and is in doubt as to whether it is foot-and-mouth disease or not that he calls in an Irish veterinary surgeon. But where foot-and-mouth disease is discovered, and confirmed by the English veterinary surgeons, we take their word just as they take our word for our statement that there is a clean bill of health in Ireland. Once alter that and what is the effect of it? An outbreak occurs in Irish cattle in England. The Irish ports are closed. We satisfy ourselves that there is no foot-and-mouth disease in Ireland, and say so, and the English say "That will not do; we will send over veterinary surgeons to have a look round also." We have, as a matter of fact, on the invitation of the veterinary surgeon there, sent a man to Glasgow.

Mr. WHITE: That clears it up.

Mr. WILSON: How do the Minister's agents at the ports discriminate as to who is a cattle dealer and who is not?

Mr. HOGAN: They use whatever little intelligence they have.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think we ought to adjourn on that.

The Dáil adjourned at 8.30 p.m.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.

ORAL ANSWERS.

COMMISSION REPORTS.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS asked the President if he will state when it is proposed to circulate the Report of the Canal Commission among Deputies; further, to ask if he will cause the following Reports to be circulated:—

The Report of the Commission on Prices, the Reports of the Fiscal Commission, and the Reports of the Agricultural Commission.

[Mr. Darrell Figgis stated that since this question was handed in the Report of the Commission on Prices had been received.]

The PRESIDENT: The Reports of the Canal Commission and of the Fiscal Enquiry Committee are at present being printed, and it is expected that copies will be available at an early date.

The Report of the Commission on Prices has already been circulated to Deputies.

It is proposed to embody the Ad Interim Reports of the Agricultural Commission in the Final Report of the Commission which is now in course of preparation. The Transfer of Functions Order of 1st April, 1922, which the Deputy spoke to me about yesterday, will be circulated within a week.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Could the President give any date for the issue of the report of the Canal Commission. When will it be received?

The PRESIDENT: I stated that the Reports are at present being printed, and it is expected that copies will be available at an early date.

DUNMANWAY COMPENSATION CLAIM.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Finance whether he is aware that a claim for compensation was lodged by Mrs. Alice Gray, of Dunmanway, Co. Cork, in respect of the shooting of her husband, David Gray, in April, 1922; whether he can state what award has been made on the claim, and when Mrs. Gray—who has a young family to support—might expect payment.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. E. Blythe): The claim is at present under consideration, and a decision will be reached as soon as possible.

REPORT OF POSTAL COMMISSION.

TOMAS DE NOGLA asked the Minister for Finance if he is yet in a position to say what action the Ministry has taken or intends to take with regard to the recommendations contained in the Report of the Postal Commission submitted to the Government last December.

Mr. BLYTHE: I have communicated my decision to the Postmaster-General, and an announcement, I presume, will be made shortly.

INSTALLATION OF TELEPHONES.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Postmaster-General how long is the usual interval between the signing of a contract for a telephone and its installation in a house already wired for it.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL: (Mr. J. J. Walsh): It is not possible to give a general answer to the question. The time which elapses from the signing of an agreement by a subscriber to the installation of the telephone depends upon several factors, such as the locality, the number of prior orders on hand, whether spare wires already exist between the premises and the Exchange, or whether the erection of [Postmaster-General.] poles and wires is necessary. In a district served by underground cables, if no spare wires are available in the cables, delay in executing new orders must necessarily occur until additional cables are laid. The fact that a house is wired does not always indicate that the fixing of a telephone in the house is all that is required to provide a service.

Major COOPER: Arising out of that answer, may I ask the Postmaster-General if he is aware that I signed a contract on the 3rd October for a telephone, and that the telephone has not been supplied yet? Is he going to charge me the full quarter's rent when I will have the telephone for only six weeks?

Mr. WALSH: The Deputy will be charged pro rata.

Mr. FIGGIS: A baffling reply.

UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFIT IN DUNMANWAY.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce whether he is aware that John James Burke, of Chapel Street, Dunmanway, who was discharged from the Royal Navy on September 13th, 1922, and who joined the National Army on September 26th, 1922, and was discharged on 30th July, 1923, and whose Army Number was 25466 and Pay Book No 20996, has been signing at the Labour Exchange, Dunmanway (Book No. 1104) for fifteen weeks, and whether enquiries will be made into his claim for benefit with a view to payment.

MINISTER for INDUSTRY and COMMERCE (Mr. J. McGrath): In the time at my disposal I regret I have not been able to make such inquiries as would enable me to answer this question. Inquiries are, however, proceeding, and I will communicate the result to the Deputy as soon as I am in a position to do so.

KILDARE POULTERER'S ACCOUNT.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Home Affairs if he is aware that, although Mr. Laurence Berns, poulterer, of Kildare, has furnished bills several times to the Commandant's Office, Civic Guard Depot, for £15 for provisions supplied in December, 1922, he has not been paid yet, and whether the Minister will give instructions to have this long overdue account paid.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS

(Mr. K. O'Higgins): I am informed that Mr. Berns supplied eggs to the Guards mess at their Depot in Kildare. Provisions so supplied are not chargeable to public funds, and consequently payment in such cases is a matter for settlement between the trader concerned and the officer in charge of the messing account. I understand that Mr. Berns has been repeatedly informed that not more than 50 dozen eggs were supplied by him, and payment for that quantity amounting to £7 10s. has been repeatedly offered to him in settlement of his account. Liability for any greater quantity is denied.

COMMANDEERING OF MOTOR AT CASTLEREA.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence if compensation has yet been paid to Martin Cahill, of the Central Motor Garage, Castlereah, on account of a car commandeered by National Troops on February 7th, and concerning which an inquiry was held in Athlone on July 24th, also whether Mr. Cahill's bill for motor hirage, amounting to £15 8s., has yet been paid.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): The question of compensating Mr. Cahill has not yet been decided but is now being considered. No claim in respect of hirage has yet been received at Headquarters.

GORT (CO. GALWAY) CLAIM.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence whether he has received a claim for £300 from Denis McCarthy, of Gort, Co. Galway, for compensation for damage done to property, etc., by members of the National Army, who, on 5th September, 1922, are alleged to have evicted Mr. McCarthy, without any legal authority, from his home at Ballinamanton, Gort; and if so, whether this claim has been paid.

General MULCAHY: I have not received the claim mentioned from Mr. McCarthy, but I understand that a claim has been made by him under the Damage to Property (1923) Act. I am in communication with the Minister for Finance with a view to expediting the consideration of the claim.

DUNGARVAN ARREST—QUESTION OF ALLEGED ILL-TREATMENT.

SEAN BUTLEIR asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that, on the 30th October, 1923, at 9.30 p.m., Maurice Condon, O'Connell Street, Dungarvan, was arrested by Captain Hayes and Lieutenant Lawlor, of the National Army, and detained, without any charge being preferred against him; that he was taken to the Barracks, Church Street; that it is alleged that at 1.30 a.m. the following morning Captain Kenny and Lieutenant Lawlor entered the guardroom, and that the latter kicked the prisoner and beat him with the butt end of a rifle about the head and face, and that a pull through was also tied around the prisoner's head and was used to pull him to the ground, where he was again kicked; that he was then released, and is at present in hospital, in a very bad way; further, if the Minister will cause an inquiry to be made into the whole circumstances concerning the arrest and detention of Mr. Condon.

General MULCAHY: I regret to say that my information is that the facts are somewhat as stated. One of the officers has been placed under arrest, and a full enquiry will be made into the matter.

GLASTHULE CYCLIST'S CLAIM.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that the claim of Mr. Christopher O'Toole, of Glasthule, Co. Dublin, for damage done to his bicycle in a collision with an Army tender on February 12th last, is still under consideration, and whether he will take steps to expedite a decision in this matter.

General MULCAHY: It is regretted that there has been a delay in dealing with the matter. The case will be disposed of forthwith.

SOLDIER'S CLAIM FOR PENSION.

SEOIRSE DE BHULBH asked the Minister for Defence if he will consider the claim for a pension of Joseph Bracken, Abbey Bridge, Naas, Co. Kildare, who served sixteen months in the Army, and who was wounded outside New Ross, as a result of which he lost one eye and is permanently lame on one foot.

General MULCAHY: Mr. Bracken's claim will receive consideration at an early date.

NAAS ACCIDENT—CLAIM FOR COMPENSATION.

SEOIRSE DE BHULBH asked the Minister for Defence if he will consider the claim for compensation of the father of the late Peter Roche, of Naas Barracks, who was killed by the overturning of a military lorry outside Naas about 9.30 p.m., July 29th, 1922; and whether he is aware that the man in question is in a dying state and absolutely dependent upon the charity of friends.

General MULCAHY: The claim for compensation made by Mr. Roche in respect of his son Peter will be considered in accordance with the provisions of the Army Pensions Act, 1923, as early as possible. Pending assessment of the claim, Dependents' Allowance at the rate of 14/- per week is being paid to Mr. Roche.

DUNMANWAY MERCHANT'S ACCOUNT.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that Maurice J. Howley, of East Green, Dunmanway, Co. Cork, furnished details of an account due since October, 1922, amounting to £14 1s. 4d. several times, and whether he can expedite payment of the claim.

General MULCAHY: Portion of the account is being paid to-day, and the remainder will be settled with the least possible further delay.

KILDARE ARMY ACCOUNT.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that, although Mr. Laurence Berns, poulterer, of Kildare, has several times furnished bills for provisions supplied to General Hospital, Central Stores, and Officers' Mess, Medical Corps, Curragh Camp, he has not yet been paid; further, whether, as these bills total £232 19s. 10d. and Berns being a small trader, and in need of prompt settlement, the Minister will give instructions that this account be paid at once?

General MULCAHY: The whole account, with the exception of the June portion, £55 10s., which cannot be traced, has been received. A portion of the account, £27 9s. 10d., was contracted by local officers, and arrangements are being made to have it paid by the officers concerned. The remainder of the account will be paid with the least possible further delay.

QUESTION ON ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BAXTER: I beg to give notice that on the adjournment I wish to raise the question of the position with regard to the political prisoners and the hunger-strike.

TEMPORARY CINN COMHAIRLE.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: In accordance with Standing Order No. 9, I have to announce that I nominate Deputy George Nicholls and Deputy Bryan Cooper to act as temporary Cinn Comhairle or Chairmen of Committees of the whole Dáil when requested so to do by me.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (INDEMNITY) BILL, 1923—FIRST STAGE.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. Seamus Burke): I beg leave to introduce the Local Authorities (Indemnity) Bill, 1923. This is a Bill to establish the validity of certain acts done and omissions made by Local Authorities during the period between the 31st day of March, 1920, and the 6th day of December, 1922.

During the period that elapsed between the Summer of 1920 and the coming into operation of the Treaty, Local Authorities throughout the country, on the advice of Dáil Eireann, engaged in the struggle with the British Government. They broke off relations with the British Local Government Board and functioned under the authority of the new Local Government Department established by Dáil Eireann. This change naturally led to considerable disorganisation and to much uncertainty with regard to the law of Local Government. So many different acts and matters are involved and so many different occasions for illegalities exist, and the records of the period are so incomplete, that it has been found necessary to seek for powers admittedly wide in order to regularise the position.

Mr. CORISH: Might I ask the Minister for Local Government will this Bill deal in any way with the relations as between County Councils and Rate-collectors who refused to carry out their duties under the new condition of things?

Mr. BURKE: I do not think this is the proper time to go into that question. If I was to make a statement on that it would really amount to a Second Reading statement.

Mr. JOHNSON: This seems to me to be rather a challenge to us of taking a division on this proposed assent to a First Reading. If a Deputy cannot ask a question on a matter of this kind, surely it is depriving members of the Dáil of their reasonable rights?

Mr. BURKE: The Bill does not specifically state anything about the Rate-Collectors. I would want to enquire very deeply into the matter to be able to answer that question. I would certainly want notice of it.

Mr. CORISH: As this is an important matter, and engages the attention of County Councils in most parts of the Free State at the moment, I do think the Minister would be well advised to give it consideration.

Mr. BURKE: Some of the Rate-Collectors will come under the head of the Bill and others will not, and I am not in a position at present to say exactly where the line will be drawn.

Mr. CORISH: As one concerned in this thing to a great extent in the Wexford County Council, which has had to deal with Rate-Collectors who would not do as they were told when the country was in the middle of the war with Great Britain, I feel that I must vote against the First Reading unless this matter is dealt with.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The main question is whether an opportunity will be afforded in discussion on the Bill for raising this particular question. Will the Minister answer that?

Mr. BURKE: Undoubtedly there will be opportunity for raising that question. It comes within the scope of the Bill.

Mr. CORISH: I am satisfied if such opportunity will be given.

Mr. BURKE: Undoubtedly it will.

Question: "That leave be given to introduce the Bill," put and agreed to. Second stage ordered for Friday, 23rd November, 1923.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. GOREY: I regret I was not in when the Questions were finished. I wish to raise a question of privilege. I think it was in Wednesday's issue of the "Freeman's Journal" a statement was made that reflects on the members of this Dáil and Seanad. The statement did not actually charge the Oireachtas with a practice that ought not to obtain, but it certainly said so by implication. I want to draw the attention of the Dáil to this. It appeared in the last portion of their article:—

"Economies of this kind would not make a large total, but they would prove to the country that its representatives are in earnest in their pledges of retrenchment, and if all this is true where there is no abuse, it is ten-fold more obvious when there has been abuse. It has been asserted the privilege of free railway passes is being abused. These passes should be used only when the members are on public business. They ought not be used when members are engaged particularly in their private concerns, going to fairs and markets or even to race-courses, for example. Inquiry ought to be made into the uses of these passes and the Railway Companies asked for information on the matter. The Oireachtas itself has to show an example of public spirit beyond the ordinary in times that are not ordinary."

Now, very grave abuses are implied there, as being practised by members of this Dáil and the Seanad, or I should use the word Oireachtas. To begin there have been no passes issued by the Minister for Finance that I am aware of. There is issued when a Deputy or Senator wants to go down to his constituency a voucher that will entitle him to a railway ticket to travel on the day of the issue of the ticket. It is not a pass. There are no passes issued. The words used in the article "going to fairs and markets" would seem to be levelled at a certain section of this assembly.

Mr. WILSON: Racing.

Mr. GOREY: Yes, going to the race-courses also. Speaking on behalf of the party I belong to, we have never used or abused the ticket that was issued for any purpose other than to go back to our homes or constituencies directly from here when the session of the Dáil was over. If we had to come up to the city between the meetings of the Dáil we came up at our own expense, and, needless to tell you, we did not travel first-class. I think a statement like this in a public newspaper should be either proved or withdrawn. If it is neither proved nor withdrawn, I will ask the Dáil here to summon to the Bar of this assembly whoever is responsible for the statement—the owner or editor of the paper. He has either to prove his statement or withdraw it. This effort to sling mud is not, I think, at all worthy of any journal. They must be either in possession of certain facts or they must confess themselves that [Mr. Gorey.] they have been malicious, without information or authority. It is not alone a reflection on me and the party I belong to, but it is a reflection on every member of the Oireachtas. I do not know whether the Minister for Finance would make a statement on the matter, but I want free discussion on this matter and the whole thing thrashed out, and if a proper treatment of this article and the questions it raises is not forthcoming, and if the Editor is not prepared to prove what he says, then he must withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT: I was Minister for Finance when this question of railway passes was raised. It will be within the recollection of the Deputies that it was frequently put to us that it would be a much more satisfactory arrangement for Deputies if season tickets were issued. We went very closely and carefully into this matter. We found that it would require a slightly additional number of journeys to and from the Oireachtas to warrant the issue of season tickets.

I do not know that during that time many members complained of the inconvenience to themselves of the arrangements which were made by the Ministry of Finance to ensure that there should be no abuses, and even if members were disposed to abuse this privilege the arrangements that were made did not leave any room whatever for abuse in the matter of travelling vouchers, so that there was no possible chance of any member getting a railway voucher to or from a fair or market, or anything of that sort. It is certainly unfair to members of the Oireachtas, and unfair to the Ministry of Finance, that there should be any question whatever regarding the railway vouchers. I have not even heard of any case in which any member of the Oireachtas applied for a voucher other than the one he was entitled to, and I have heard of many cases in which members did not apply though entitled to do so. The very arrangements that we have made here of sitting from 12 to 4 on Fridays was come to so that members could get away early in the evening, and there were many occasions upon which members, in a hurry to get away to the country, could not get the vouchers in time, and many of them were at a loss in consequence. It is laid down in The Oireachtas (Payment of Members) Act, 1923, Section 3, Sub-Section (1):—

“The travelling facilities to be received by each member of the Oireachtas under this Act shall be—

“(a) in the case of a member of Dáil Eireann, travelling facilities as defined by this Act between Dublin and any place in the constituency for which he is a member, and (b) in the case of a member of Seanad Eireann, travelling facilities as defined by this Act between Dublin and his usual place of residence for the time being: Provided that such place of residence be in Saorstát Eireann unless in any case in which the Minister for Finance shall be satisfied that special circumstances existing in Saorstát Eireann reasonably deter such member from residence for the time being in Saorstát Eireann and justify the allowance in whole or part of travelling facilities to or from such member's actual place of residence.”

It says, in Sub-Section 2:—“The travelling facilities aforesaid shall be provided and paid in such manner as shall from time to time be prescribed by regulations to be made by the Minister for Finance after consultation with the Ceann Comhairle of Dáil Eireann and the Cathaoirleach of Seanad Eireann.”

Even at the risk of repeating myself I would say that if there was a desire to abuse there was no room for it, and I have not heard of any case where an attempt was made to abuse the facility which members are perfectly entitled to under the Constitution.

Mr. DÁVIN: I happen to be one of the members that raised the question of passes, instead of vouchers, upon one or two occasions in the Dáil. I did not do so in order that I, as an individual member, should get any advantage, because so far as I am concerned personally, it would not affect me, living as I do in the Metropolitan area. Since I became a member of the Dáil, I have not used more than five of the vouchers to which I am entitled. I would say that the article, to which Deputy Gorey has very properly drawn attention, displays a certain amount of ignorance with regard to the use of these vouchers. The article says that "Inquiry ought to be made into the use of these passes and the railway companies asked for information on the matter." I do not think that the railway companies can give any information on that matter to show abuses, even if there were any, but the counterfoils of the vouchers in the Clerk's Office would show, if an inquiry is necessary, whether or not the privilege to which members are entitled is being abused. According to this article, it might mean that if Deputy Gorey wanted to go to a fair in Longford he could get a voucher if he asked for it, but as far as I understand, and I think all Deputies understand the exact position, a member is only entitled to a voucher between Dublin and any railway station in his constituency. It can be quite clearly proved beyond all doubt, if investigation is made, or is necessary, whether that privilege has been abused by any member of the Dáil.

When I made representations to the Minister for Finance suggesting that there should be railway passes instead of vouchers, I was under the impression that the passes would mean a saving to the Exchequer, but I realise now that, unless a certain number of journeys are covered per week, there would not be a saving. I think Deputy Gorey has done a public service by drawing attention to this article, which is absolutely unwarranted, and the statements in which, in my opinion, could not be proved. It is extraordinary how information of this kind could be obtained by the person responsible for writing that article. I do not know whether Deputy Gorey, in suggesting that the writer of the article should be brought to the Bar of the Dáil, meant this Chamber here, or the chamber in another place, but if he meant that the writer should be brought here to explain this article I agree that his suggestion is a proper one. However, the person responsible for writing the article displays such ignorance of the whole procedure that I think we can leave the matter now where it is after hearing the explanation given by the President.

Mr. JOHNSON: I just want to say that I think it would be very unwise for us to pursue this matter after the condemnation that has been expressed. I think it would be attaching altogether too much importance to the newspaper or to the leader writer, or the proprietor of the paper, to ask them to come to this Dáil to explain.

Mr. GOREY: I quite agree, though I feel a little bit of temper in approaching this matter. When I referred to the Bar of the House, I meant the Bar of the House, and not the bar of the restaurant, but if the Dáil is satisfied with the statement that has been made, explaining the whole position, I am satisfied. At the same time, I think an apology is due from the paper that published such a statement, or else the paper should prove it. I really think the matter ought not be left there. I do not want the proprietor of the paper brought to the Bar of the House, but I think an apology should be forthcoming from him. As one member of the Dáil, I insist that the person who wrote the article should either prove it or apologise for it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There is nothing for me to add to what the President has said, except a little about the machinery of the matter in the Dáil office. As the President has said, no railway passes are issued. A Deputy under the Oircachtas (Payment of Members) Act, 1923, is entitled to a voucher between Dublin and any place in the constituency for which he is a member. For a particular journey, he gets a particular voucher signed by the Clerk of the Dáil. He must make application in the office for that voucher before he gets it. Obviously a great many Deputies never get a voucher. Deputies who represent Dublin City and Dublin County never get a voucher at all. Other Deputies only get a railway voucher between Dublin and their constituencies. It would be utterly impossible, for example, for Deputy Wil-

[An Ceann Comhairle.] son, who represents the County Wicklow, to get a voucher to, say, the County Wexford, the County Kilkenny, or the County Donegal, utterly and completely impossible under the arrangements made.

When the Dáil is sitting, Deputies who come from a distance to Dublin, get, on an average, one return voucher per weekly sitting. That is to say, practically all the country Deputies will this evening get a return voucher to their own constituency and will come back on it next Wednesday. Some of them will stay over. That is the average number of vouchers issued. During a recess, when the Dáil is not meeting, vouchers are not issued in the office except for attendance at a Committee of the Dáil, or other business of the Dáil, and Committees of the Dáil, as a matter of fact, very rarely meet during a recess. There have been very few examples of that, so that when the Dáil is not sitting, members practically never get a voucher. The arrangements made under the Act are made by the Minister for Finance in consultation with myself and with the Cathaoirleach of Seanad Éireann, and they ensure the utmost economy, consistent with affording Deputies railway facilities as between the place where the Dáil meets and their own constituencies.

The article in question has, therefore, no possible basis in fact. I, personally, think it is not worth while to say any more about it than that, and I think the matter has now been satisfactorily dealt with and can be left at that.

Mr. GOREY: I am quite satisfied, A Chinn Comhairle, as you suggest, but as I said before, I felt in a bit of temper about the whole matter. On two or three occasions during the sittings of the last Dáil I came to Dublin to attend the meetings here at my own expense. There were also occasions when the railway line between Kilkenny and Dublin was cut, and I had to go round by the Dublin and South Eastern Railway system to get to Dublin, and I did that at my own expense. I need hardly say that I travelled third class, but the expense I was put to amounted to something like £8. I did not make any claim for a refund of that money, and I do not intend to do so, but personally I think that this article is an insult to every member of the Oireachtas.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I know the circumstances of which Deputy Gorey speaks. I know a Deputy who has a season ticket on the Great Northern Railway who goes home nearly every night from the Dáil and comes up to Dublin on the following day to attend the meetings of the Dáil. He does that at his own expense, though I think he would be entitled to a voucher which would cost considerably more than the ticket he possesses. Therefore, he travels at his own expense in the interests of the State.

MINISTERS AND SECRETARIES BILL, 1923.—SECOND STAGE.

The PRESIDENT: I beg to move the Second Reading of this Bill, notice of which has been given for a long time past. The Bill interprets the Constitution in the organisation of the Ministries; it sets forth Departments of Government and allocates the various services under the control of each Minister, and places those Departments on a statutory basis and indicates the distribution of State services.

Experience in administration will perhaps be the most useful guide in any further distribution which may be made, and power to provide for such re-distribution or transfer of powers is reserved in the Bill for changes where necessary or desirable.

There is an alteration in the description of one Ministry made at the request of the Department itself. The Ministry for Home Affairs is described in the Bill as the Ministry of Justice. The former term was very wide in description and indefinite in its interpretation. It might conceivably connote the whole of the internal organisation of Government with the exception of the Ministry for Finance. There will be under the Minister for Justice, the administration and business of the public service in connection with law, justice, public order and police, as set out in Sub-section (3) of Section 1 of the Bill.

There is then the Department of the Attorney-General, upon whom rests the responsibility of advising proceedings. The Attorney-General is nominally and actually associated with the President—nominally because the first and last word as to proceedings is with the Attorney-General, and actually, in so far as may be required, in the event of the Attorney-General not being a member of the Oireachtas, and having in consequence to have some person in the Ministry to answer for him in either House. In this arrangement the Executive Council has the general responsibility, and must be prepared to answer for the Attorney-General, but the immediate responsibility for proceedings rests with, and must be accounted for, by the First Law Officer of the State. There is also power in the Executive Council to supersede and dissolve certain Boards.

As the House well knows, there were, during the British administration, quite a multiplicity of Boards and Statutory bodies, and during the last two years it has not been possible to survey the whole field and to see how better we may construct the Government machine. There are provisions of far-reaching importance in this Bill which merit attention and which may provoke discussion. I do not think it is at all necessary to enter into an elaborate explanation of these. The form prescribed for dealing with Bills in the Committee Stage affords perhaps the very best opportunity for dealing, in detail, with these matters, but I think it is not necessary for me to refer to the importance of this measure. From the point of view of the State, it appears to me to be next in importance to the Constitution itself. Engaged here in the consideration of this measure, we are laying the foundations of the future governing institutions in this country. However it may be subsequently altered, the foundations are being laid in this measure, and I think the House appreciates its importance, and that it will get fair and careful examination and analysis. It has so far received a rather mixed form of criticism.

In the Dublin Press, I observe, it has perhaps received the closest and most careful examination from the "Freeman." On the other hand, the "Independent" has concerned itself with one of the smaller details of the Bill and apparently loses sight of, or is satisfied with, the very much more important considerations which are embodied in it. We have had now something like two years' experience of government, and the experience we have gained has been of considerable assistance in compiling this measure. I think if there is one thing more than another that we have learned in the last two years it is that it is not humanly possible for a Minister to work from 12 to 16 hours per day, and for seven days a week; and if there is another thing we have learned it is that there is nothing to be gained from the financial experts of the "Independent."

I did not intend, at any time, to deal with some of the work which is not seen either by the public or the Press or the Dáil on the part of Ministers elected by this Dáil, but I do say that the present Ministry, and those Ministers who are no longer with us now, have effected very large savings—savings sufficiently large, if capitalised and invested at a normal rate, to provide every member of the Oireachtas with the salary of a Minister. That may seem to be a fairly large claim, but I think it is about time that we should deal candidly and fairly with those peculiar forms of criticism which disclose small and incompetent minds.

There have been occasions in the past during the great political changes which have taken place upon which men engaged in public life have had opportunities of showing service to the State. I do say that during the last two years there has been real service rendered to this State by the Ministers—those who are living and those who are dead—which has not been placed before the public, because they simply thought they were doing their duty, and they did not want to get any great public credit for doing their duty. We have to consider in this measure the construction of an institution of government which will make for efficiency. We have had to take over what was left of one Government and what had already been constructed of another. We have had to re-organise what was left of one and to adapt what was there of the other to suit the needs of the country. During the period of which we have had experience—that is the last two years—for something like twelve or eighteen months we have had three Parliamentary Secretaries. Two were attached to me; one in my capacity as President and the other in my capacity as Minister for Finance; the third was Assistant Minister for Industry and Commerce. The Parliamentary Secretary, who was attached to the Ministry of Finance, and the Assistant Minister of Commerce were approached by me in reference to one service which was functioning under the Ministry of Finance, and in the course of their administration of the one particular service they saved a sum per annum almost sufficient to discharge the entire estimate of the Oireachtas. It is not by nominal economies that real results are to be effected, and if excellent services can be rendered by a large number of Ministers we consider that power ought to be given in a measure of this sort to enable the Executive Council to have available for the services of the State such assistance as they consider is necessary.

Generally the Ministries in this Bill stand as at present with slight modification. It is proposed in the Bill to group within certain Ministries services considered to be more suitably connected with others. It will be observed that there is, perhaps, the greatest transfer to the Ministry of Education and a minor transfer of one small service from Agriculture to Industry and Commerce. These alterations, or rather the proposed services attached to the Ministries, will be found in the Schedules. It is possible that Government amendments may yet be moved before the final stages are reached dealing with the various Sections of the Bill.

Section 1 deals with the Ministries. Section 2 deals with the status of Ministers. Sub-section 2 of Section 2 sets down in law what has been the practice observed up to date. That is, wherever the principal officer of a Minister was being appointed the appointment came before and was sanctioned by the Executive Council. Section 3 prescribes the allocation, by the person elected as President, of Departments to particular Ministers, and Sub-section (2) empowers the President to assign two or more Departments of State to a single Minister. I do not think it is necessary to go into greater detail. This building up of a State machine is not an easy operation. It requires time, it requires examination and analysis, and it requires patience. It is only by experience that one can learn, when the machine is running well, how far it would be possible to group one, two, three or more Ministries under one particular head.

Section 4 prescribes without alteration the salaries attached to the various offices. I do not propose to agree to any reduction of the Ministers' salaries. I have no personal objection to any reduction of the salary of the President. During the recent elections and at many other times one heard criticism of Ministers' salaries and of the salary of the President. There is, as far as I know, one office in this country which approaches the salaries paid either to the President or to the Ministers—that is, the salary of the office of Lord Mayor of Dublin. I would say that there is not £100 difference between the actual salary received by the Lord Mayor and the actual salary received by the President. I would say that there are a few hundred pounds difference between the salaries received by Ministers and that of the Lord Mayor of Dublin. It is an extraordinary thing that people do not apparently realise, when criticising small matters like this, that we have now an acknowledged nationhood and that we ought, in discharging obligations to the State in connection with that newly acknowledged nationhood, see that the principal officers of State get salaries in accordance with the dignity of their office.

Section 5 prescribes the collective responsibility of Ministers who are members of the Executive Council. I observe some criticism of that. I do not think it is necessary to speak at any considerable length upon that particular Section. It is laid down in the Constitution that the Executive Council has a collective responsibility. I take it that that means that in so far as the various Ministries, presided over by the Ministers of the Executive Council, are concerned, if any one of those Ministries does not meet with the approval of the Dáil, a vote of want of confidence can be moved, and the other Ministers, who, perhaps, may not be under any ban or subject to any criticism, fall with the fall of any particular Minister, and the whole Ministry goes out of office. It means that in so far as these Departments of State are concerned, one Ministry does not stand independently like the extern Ministers. I do not think it is necessary to go further into that.

Section 6 prescribes the office of Attorney-General, and Section 7 deals with the appointment of Parliamentary Secretaries, who must be members of the Oireachtas. In accepting the Treaty we accepted it not alone in the letter but in the spirit, and in the acceptance of it we accepted all that it meant. It meant in this connection two Houses—Seanad Éireann and Dáil Éireann. I must say freely that during the last twelve months the Ministry has not been able to devote to one of the two Houses the time and attention which the second House of the Parliament deserves. There were occasions upon which we had measures concerning a particular Ministry, or the whole Ministry, in both Houses at one time, and it was impossible to attend as much as we would like during that period to the business of the Seanad. I do not know that it will be necessary at any time to appoint more than three Secretaries—any more than three. I believe that the number we had in the last Dáil will be sufficient for the purposes of this Dáil, but I do say that it is impossible to forecast what might be the necessities of the future and, I think, sufficient safeguards are provided for the Dáil in the event of any extravagance. If it were thought that the appointment of an extra Parliamentary Secretary was being entertained there is sufficient authority for the Dáil to deal with any such abuse, if there should be abuse on the part of the Executive Council.

Since reassembling after the election I have not been once in the Seanad. I do not know about the 1 o'clock attendance of the other

Ministers, but I do say that there ought to be close attention to the business of that House, and that the Ministry should be in a position at all times, to know exactly at first hand and be in touch with the business of the second House.

Section 8 sets out in law the Constitution of a Defence Council to assist the Minister for Defence whose authority is not diminished. I think that during the last twelve months the Council was composed of much the same members as have been functioning, and that has been satisfactory. That is a matter which can be dealt with when that particular Section comes under review, and the Minister for Defence will be able to speak to it. Section 9 empowers the Executive Council to dissolve boards of Commissioners or statutory bodies to which the Section applies. Section 10 empowers a Minister by an order of the Executive Council to function through the agency of another Minister. Section 11 empowers the Executive Council to prescribe the re-distribution of public services amongst Ministers. That I have already referred to, so that I do not think it is necessary to go into it further. Section 12 retains to the Oireachtas full control and supervision of orders made, so that if a board were by order dissolved, and if the Oireachtas were dissatisfied, it is a matter over which they still retain control. Section 13 deals with the authentication of official documents. Sections 14 and 15 deal with the Official Seal of the Executive Council, and proof of official Orders. The final Section deals with the coming into law of the Acts that have been passed.

I think I owe it to the Dáil to acknowledge the patience which has been shown to me personally about the introduction of this Bill. The first mention of it I think was about January last. Though it was not introduced earlier the Bill I think has not suffered by being held up. In considering this measure I think the Dáil will be satisfied that we have not lost time, and that, now that the measure is before them, Deputies will be in a better position to appreciate how difficult the work of building up this Government machine was, and how necessary it is for us at this stage to take the greatest possible pains to see that in compiling this measure we are laying the foundations of a sure and safe institution for the future. I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Mr. JOHNSON: On Wednesday I agreed with the proposition that this Bill might be taken to-day although we had only received the Bill in print that morning. I rather expected that it was purely a formal matter, and not one requiring more than assent to the principle before examination in Committee. I realise now that I made a mistake in giving my acquiescence in that proposition, because the Bill does very much more than contain formal provisions. It has not been possible to give that thorough analysis to the Bill that one would like before the Second Reading Stage. So far as I have been able to read through and examine the Bill I am very disappointed at the form it has taken. The Minister said that we have been under a promise of this Bill since January last. I hoped that when it did appear there would be a re-casting of the various functions of Government and administration into something like a scientific form, and that some principle of allocation would have been observed. As the Minister says, not many changes have taken place. Two or three functions have been transferred from one Department to another, from one Ministry to another.

When one looks at the Schedules I, for one, find it difficult to understand what principle is at work in the assigning of the various Departments to the various Ministries. I think there should be some principle at work in doing this, and I think we should know what the principle is. The page is clean, or practically so; nothing has been fixed. When preparing this Bill, one would have expected that some allocation of administrative duties would have been based upon a plan that would have shown some consistency. That, I think, has not been done. There are a number of matters that would require consideration and criticism. Section 8, for instance, dealing with the Council of Defence, would, I think, require careful examination before the Dáil should agree to it. To me it seems to be running counter to the promises made and the assurances that have been given by Ministers and, as I understand it, the intention of the Dáil, that the Minister for Defence shall be a civil Minister responsible to the Dáil, and that the Army or Defence Forces should be a subordinate body, just as subordinate as any other Department of Government or administration. In this Bill the Council of Defence is singled out for special honour. By the way, one notices with interest that this is the only Department to which is set up anything in the nature of a vocational Council. We have a Council in this case attached to the Minister, but the Council comprises people who are not civilians, who are not in the Dáil, and who are not responsible to it, and yet they are raised to a certain level in the Bill, that, I think, is not justified, and that rather places those soldiers in a position not subordinate to the civil authority. "The Council of Defence shall consist of the following members, namely—the Minister for Defence, who,"—and it is strange to put this in a Ministers' Bill—"under the style of Commander-in-Chief) shall be Chairman of the Council of Defence, and four other members,"—a civil member who shall be Parliamentary Secretary. That goes to show that there must be a Parliamentary Secretary for this Ministry, "and three military members being commissioned members of the State Defence Forces, who shall be the Chief of Staff, the Adjutant-General, and the Quartermaster-General, and shall be respectively responsible to the Minister for Defence" for the administration of so much of the business as is defined. "The Council of Defence shall meet and act as a collective body and shall be collectively responsible for all matters entrusted to it in its collective capacity, whether by any Act of the Oireachtas or otherwise." I do not know what that foreshadows. I think we should know exactly what plan we are to work upon. Is it intended that this is the forerunner of a series of vocational Councils dealing with various administrative functions, and that there will be allocated to these various vocational Councils certain collective responsibility?

Is it a departure from the plan that has hitherto been understood that the Minister for Defence, sitting in the Dáil, as a civilian, would be responsible for all the acts of the Council of Defence and for the Army? It seems to be rather shifting the responsibility from the Minister to the Council, and, in the absence of explanation, I do not think that is justifiable or desirable.

The Minister, in introducing the Second Reading, touched upon the various Sections and mentioned Section 6, dealing with the Attorney-General. I do not know whether a further reading of the Bill would make it clear to me, but I am not clear whether the Attorney-General and his office is a Ministry. Is he to be considered a Minister? If not, who is responsible for his department? Is his work part of the Ministry for Justice? It is not. Then, who is responsible? Is the Attorney-General a Minister? If not, is there any Minister to whom he is responsible? That seems to require some clearing, because there are certain administrative functions assigned to the Attorney-General, including charities. Perhaps we shall get some enlightenment on that before the Second Reading stage is finished.

In regard to the provisions for the appointment of Parliamentary Secretaries (Section 7), I have occasionally suggested that there was obvious need for the appointment of Parliamentary Secretaries to Ministers, that they would do useful work; they would relieve Ministers of certain attendances at the Dáil, when they were required elsewhere, and would help the Dáil to carry on its business in the absence of those Ministers. But, when making those suggestions, I had in mind Parliamentary Secretaries, not Assistant-Ministers, not new Ministers. It rather seems to me that the conception behind this Section is not to appoint Parliamentary Secretaries to Ministers who will assist them in their Parliamentary work, but to appoint assistants to the Ministers who would relieve them of some of their Ministerial responsibilities. That, I think, is not desirable, and I think it is not in accord with the speeches we have heard about the need for economy. In the debate yesterday the speeches of the Minister for Defence and Minister for Education seemed to suggest "one lobe of the brain," as Father Keegan says, "not knowing what the other lobe doeth." Bearing in mind that discussion, and reading this Bill, one is tempted to think of the conflict between remorse and ambition, remorse for the murdered king, Economy, and the desire to fill his place. "Try what repentance can."

"We are sorry for our profligacy; we are sorry for the excessive expenditure of the past; try what repentance can, what can it not." The Minister for Finance says "Cut down expenses at all costs and at any cost." "Try what repentance can, what can it not." But what can it when one cannot repent? And they introduce Section 7. We cannot repent because we have to find Ministerial offices. I think there is a need for Parliamentary Secretaries. I think there must be keenness for public service amongst members of the Ministerial party, which would provide sufficient active, intelligent, eager men who are members of the Dáil, who would give all the Parliamentary assistance that is requisite to Ministers and would not require anything like the salaries that are suggested, additional to their allowances as members. It seems to me that a very small addition to the allowances as members would suffice to recoup the keen member of the Dáil who is fitted for the work of Parliamentary Secretary to a Minister to assist that Minister in his Parliamentary work.

The President, in defending this proposition, spoke of the saving to the State, which had, as a matter of fact, been accomplished through the appointment of Parliamentary Secretaries. I wonder whether he is quite accurate in that. Was it a saving to the State from the appointment of a Parliamentary Secretary, or was it a saving to the State from the appointment of an Assistant Minister, which is a very different proposition? The Assistant Minister should be attached to the Department in its Departmental work. The office of Parliamentary Secretary is quite a different one. It seems to me that one of the lessons we have learned from last year's experience in the Dáil is the need for Parliamentary Secretaries—men who would be kept acquainted with the general business of a Ministry in respect of Bills, in respect of matters of a Parliamentary kind, which the Minister cannot deal with in detail and of which the Secretary would relieve him. That is not what is proposed in this Bill at all. It is proposed, as a matter of fact, to appoint men to assist Ministers who will also be members of the Dáil, and the assistance is not Parliamentary assistance but Departmental assistance. That, at least, is what I read out of the propositions in this Section. And it may be noted that they are to be appointed to assist Ministers who are to be members of the Executive Council only. A Minister who is not a member of the Executive Council is not to have the assistance of a Parliamentary Secretary unless he appoints him—as he is quite entitled to do—as an unpaid Secretary. But this Section seems to me to relegate those Ministers who are not members of the Executive Council into a position of subordination, which I do not think was ever intended by the Constitution, and which, I think, it is unwise to allow. I think the Ministers for affairs, who are not members of the Executive Council, may well be of the very greatest importance and equal in status to the Ministers who are members of the Council, and there should not be any attempt to place them in a position of subordination or to lower their status.

When we come to the Schedules, one wonders at the result of the year's cogitation, which continues to combine in the one Ministry a Roads Department, a Nursing Board and the conduct of Elections. For the life of me I cannot see the connection. If there is to be a Ministry of Health, let there be a Ministry of Health, and do not give to the Ministry of Health the responsibility for conducting local elections. Surely there is no connection. Surely the responsibility for the conduct of elections should be thrown upon the Minister for Justice and Order. It is a matter of public order, and not of public health. There seems to me to be no justification for retaining that combination. I am disappointed that there is not, as a matter of fact, set up a Ministry of Public Health, where all the health services would be brought under one administration. I am disappointed—but perhaps that is not the word; disappointment rather suggests that one expected something which he had not received—I am sorry, that the Ministry for Posts and Telegraphs is retained as a Ministry for Posts and Telegraphs alone. I would like to see a Ministry for Transport and Communications. I would like to see some one responsible for all those functions which have to do with communication—roads, railways, posts, telegraphs, telephones, all under one Ministry. I hope that proposals in that direction will be made before many days are over.

Then we have such a curious combination as the allocation of the Rural Industries branch of the Congested Districts Board to the Fisheries Department. There has been a desire to take away from the Agricultural Department, responsibility for fisheries and to set up a Ministry for Fisheries. I do not think the circumstances of the country justify a separate Ministry of Fisheries. Letting that pass for the moment, if we have a separate Ministry of Fisheries, why add to that Department responsibility for Rural Industries? Surely that should have been transferred to the Ministry of Industry and Commerce. There are quite a number of queries one might raise as to the allocation of the various functions, but I suppose this Bill will get its Second Reading, and I suppose also, when we come to discuss the matter in Committee, that these questions will all be raised. I am sorry that the Bill has not given us some recognisable plan, or that the re-assortment has not been made with some regard to the probabilities of the future. The idea of those who say that there should be plans prepared before a building is begun, has not been put into operation. There seems to be no plan in this and a number of the details strike me as being dangerous and others of them as undesirable. I hope we shall get some explanation regarding the position of the Attorney-General, what Minister he will be responsible to, and who will answer for his Department; and also some explanation on the more important question as to what is intended regarding this Council of Defence.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: This Bill, as the President informed us, has been promised since the beginning of this year. Its delay has at least enabled us to receive it hard upon the stern admonitions delivered to us by the Minister for Finance with a view to economy. Perhaps, if only for that reason, the delay might have been to its advantage. With regard to what one might call the Second Reading principle of the Bill, I presume it would be that there should be Ministers, and that they should be paid. That is a principle that no one could disagree with.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE at this stage took the chair.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I shall not oppose the Second Reading because I am in agreement with that principle. It is a sound principle, and in any case it is a very necessary principle. The Bill, as drafted and put before us, includes a considerable number of matters that are not quite in consonance with that very simple principle which could be provided for in a very simple manner. Before I come upon those matters which, I suggest, should have no place whatever in a Ministries Bill, I wish to touch upon some matters that are included within the ambit of the Bill. The first is with regard to the allocation of services. I think it would have been desirable, as Deputy Johnson suggested, that there should have been a very careful inquiry and a very careful plan made out as to the apportionment and adjustment of one service with another. It is very clear that some progress has been made, and it is greatly for the advantage of clarity that that promiscuous title, the Ministry of Home Affairs, should have been dispensed with, and that there should have been introduced in its place a Department of Justice. I am not aware, after some inquiry, of any country in which such a Department has been created, where there has been created together with it, side by side with it, and ranking almost, if not entirely, as a separate Ministry, an Attorney-General's department.

Vol. 5.

In countries such as England where there is a Minister for Home Affairs, there is an Attorney-General; but that there should be both a Minister for Justice and an Attorney-General, I am not aware. If one interprets the particular kind of a shake of the head that the Attorney-General gave in answer to Deputy Johnson's question, it appears the Attorney-General is not to be responsible to the Minister for Justice. Then at once one is faced by the question that if it be sound and right that a Department of Justice should be created, what has the Clause dealing with the Attorney-General to do in a Ministries Bill? Surely it is a matter for an entirely separate Bill altogether. Amongst these Ministries there are two to which I would direct particular attention. The first is the Department of Fisheries. It is perfectly clear from the statement made yesterday in the Dáil by the Minister for Finance that the necessary finance for the re-organisation of the Fishery industry is not going to be forthcoming. I have had occasion to make some inquiry into this industry, and I am the first to appreciate the great importance it will be in the future re-construction of the country. It is one of the most important of our industries; it could be one of our wealthiest. It draws upon a natural resource that may prove to be quite the richest that we have. But if the money is not going to be forthcoming to re-create that industry as it requires re-creation, and to place it upon a firm and economic foundation, then why should the money be allocated towards creating a Ministry, when the Ministry itself has little to do except to continue the present unorganised state of affairs, which could easily be done by some other department?

There is no need in the present state of the national finances, or in the way in which the national finances will be unquestionably regarded during the next twelve months, for a Department of Fisheries, and therefore, it is desirable on the grounds of the admonition given us with a view to retrenchment and economy, that retrenchment and economy should be begun by limiting the Ministries only to those Ministries that can be expected adequately to function during the next twelve months, and no one will suggest that the Department of Fisheries was one of these. No one is going to suggest that any work is likely to be undertaken in that department that could not quite adequately be done by any one of the other departments. Therefore, the expense necessary in the end should be postponed until the time when it will become due, along with the finance required for the re-creation of this industry.

The next Ministry to which I desire to draw attention is the Ministry of External Affairs. I think this is a Department also that could be dispensed with at the present time. It is doing very little work indeed. It is, in fact, so far as its personnel is concerned, much less a Department of External Affairs than a Department of Publicity. That publicity is not always calculated to assuage some of the national wounds. There is really no need for this Ministry. There is no place for this Ministry, and there is no place because the hard logic of circumstances eliminates this Ministry from any responsibility in the Dáil. That is so on the very face of facts. A fortnight ago a Deputy rose here asking for certain information dealing with the affairs of this country with the affairs of a great and friendly neighbour respecting the fulfilment of one of the articles of a Treaty made between the two peoples. Who rose to answer that question? The only person competent to give the answer, and that was the President of the Executive Council. The Minister for External Affairs must necessarily be the President of the Executive Council. It is to the President that this Dáil will naturally look for guidance as to the relations of this country with other countries, and for information respecting those relations, and for responsibility respecting the ordering of those relations.

It will be said that he will want additional assistance in this regard. That is true, or it may be true; but if it is true, then the additional assistance will be required in matters affecting the Civil Service and not in matters affecting responsibility in the Dáil. Therefore I think that here we have the case of a Department that under any circumstances could quite easily and should quite properly be dispensed with. I have suggested that the Department of Fisheries should be dispensed with; but I have said that ultimately such a Department will become necessary. In regard to the Department of External Affairs, I hold very strongly that not only is it unnecessary now, but that it will always be unnecessary, because the people of this country and the Dáil, will naturally look, not to a particular Minister to answer for responsibilities in these, the gravest of matters, but will properly look and always look to the President of the Executive Council. Some of the same kind of criticism is created in my mind by Article 7, and it is helped and furthered by every word the President of the Executive Council has spoken in the Dáil in commending this Bill for Second Reading. Deputy Johnson suggested there was a misnomer in the description of the persons whose services would be required. He has suggested that instead of being Parliamentary Secretaries, in point of fact they really would be Assistant Ministers.

I carry that criticism one stage further, and instead of their being either Parliamentary Secretaries or Assistant Ministers, what really is required, if at all required, is a different apportionment of administrative staffs. He has stated that a certain Deputy on the Contracts Committee, representing him on that Committee, has effected considerable economies for this State. I have no doubt of it; but why could not some official of his Department serving on that Contracts Committee have effected these economies equally well? That particular Deputy was not responsible to the Dáil for the Contracts Committee. He had no functions in this Assembly in respect of that work. The work was strictly as between the Ministry of Finance and the Contracts Committee. Therefore it is not a case either for a Parliamentary Secretary or an Assistant Minister, but strictly a case for allocation of services within the Department concerned. A Parliamentary Secretary is someone who undertakes definite services in the Dáil. The explanation that the Minister has given of the kind of work for which they would be required has shown clearly it is not so much in the Dáil that they will be required, but outside the Dáil in connection with administrative services. For that reason I believe this Clause is not required within the circle of the President's own defence and advocacy of it; but I am perfectly certain it will be very largely desirable at the present moment, especially in view of the discussions that have kept us here during this present week, that they should not be pressed at the present time. Not merely is there a question of actual economy, but in the effecting of that economy there is a question involved of National morale, and there is no question whatever that this proposal, coming after the Minister for Finance has urged economy, will have an unfortunate effect.

The actual additional expense involved is in the nature of about £7,000 roughly, after deducting the allowances that would be received by them as Deputies. The amount may not be large, but if Parliamentary Secretaries truly functioning as such prove to be necessary in the end, let us at least postpone their appointment until we have got our National finance in a better state of order than exists at the present moment. Let them not at least be pressed now. I believe that they may become necessary. Let the proposal not be pressed now, seeing that economies are to be called for in respect of other services. At least, let these economies be started here, and do not let us on one day be asking the people outside to economise and on the following day bring in proposals which, even if necessary, are proposals that do not look well coming so soon after the arguments in favour of retrenchment. It must be remembered that we have managed for 12 months without the official creation of the payment of such persons. Let us at least, even if it gives discomfort, manage for another 12 months, and in view of all that has come about then, and the re-organisation of National finance, let us re-consider the matter at that time. Now I come to a matter that I consider to be the most important in the whole Bill, and that is Section 8.

I read this Section with considerable astonishment. This Bill is called the Ministers and Secretaries Bill. It is not accurately designated as such. It should have been called the Ministers, Secretaries, and Army Council Bill. If an Army Council be required the right place for the creation of such a Council should be in the Army Bill and not in the Ministers and Secretaries Bill. By bringing that into the Ministers Bill a status is accorded to the Army in this country that is not accorded to that service in other countries. We are faced here directly by an attempt to put the Army in a privileged position by which the Council, as created, ranks practically with the Ministry. The words in line 5, page 7, are words to which I draw special attention. Last July we had here in this Dáil an Army Bill that was rushed through in such a manner that we got through 245 Sections in one hour and a half in Committee. The question was several times asked of the Minister for Defence and the President of the Executive Council as to whether the Minister for Defence was or was not going finally and definitely to surrender the title of Commander-in-Chief, and the assurance was given that the Commander-in-Chief was to be the Executive Council in its collective responsibility, and through the third clause of that Bill, now an Act, it is distinctly stated that the Commander-in-Chiefdom is held by the entire Executive Council in its collective capacity. Now, in spite of that earlier profession and in spite of the assurances given that the Minister for Defence shall be a purely civil person holding no military rank, we, nevertheless, have the Minister for Defence using the title of Commander-in-Chief.

Now, I am not desirous of using words in any exaggerated sense, but we all know of certain tendencies that have been in this country for several years. I know, personally, having worked and fought with colleagues for the last seven years, that there was a spirit in Ireland, in the Sinn Féin movement, to regard persons who served on the civil side as persons who did not count in the least degree, and that the real responsibility always lay with the military arm. I testify that that did exist, because I heard expressions used in the inner council of Sinn Féin that the real decisions were taken by those who were responsible for the organising of the army forces of the Republic, as it then was. I see in this Section a clear and definite continuance of that assertion, and therefore I think it is a very undesirable thing that we should have it here. It may be necessary for the Army Council. If the country finds it necessary to have an Army Council and a Commander-in-Chief only in a state of war and not otherwise, why should we find it necessary immediately after the Minister for Finance has told us that acts of destruction have ceased? But even if it is found necessary to have an Army Council and a Commander-in-Chief in time of peace, contrary to practice in every other civilised country, let us avoid endowing it with a special rank, and special status, and special privilege and authority by putting that into a Ministers' Bill. I hope before this Bill becomes an Act that this Section will be cut completely out, and that if there be any matter proper in it for attention it should be passed over now and embodied in an Army Bill. There is only one matter, in closing, to which I desire to refer quite briefly. I think it is an oversight. I presume it will be necessary in Committee to add a Schedule repealing all the earlier Acts which have been superseded in this Bill. I have not seen any such repeal section, but I presume one will be necessary.

Mr. GOREY: As one who represents the party concerned in agriculture, and consequently having to bear the heavy burden of the State, the first section of this Bill that seems to strike me in the face is the seventh Section. Provision is made there for seven Parliamentary Secretaries at salaries of not less than £1,200 a year each. These Parliamentary Secretaries are justified, according to the arguments of the President, by the over-work of several Ministries, or of the Ministers themselves. In the last Dáil we had, I think, two or three—two at least—of what the President describes as Parliamentary Secretaries. We must also remember that in the last Dáil the President held two portfolios, namely, President of the Executive Council and Minister for Finance. We can understand the necessity in that case of a Parliamentary Secretary to the President, but now these two Ministries that were held by the President are held by two Ministers. I think that the work of the Ministry now in the hands of two individuals can very easily be handled by the Ministers themselves. The other was the Ministry of Trade and Commerce, and any of us who were here in the last Dáil know that when the Assistant Minister for Industry and Commerce took up his duties the Minister for Commerce was never here and was engaged apparently on other duties. Now he has been relieved of these duties, and if he has not he ought to have been if he is to keep the position of Minister for Industry and Commerce. If he is so relieved, I for one, and the party to which I belong, and the people we represent in the country, cannot see the necessity for a Parliamentary Secretary for this Department.

The Minister for Finance, in his statement the other evening, said he aimed at cuts all round, and aimed 2 o'clock. at economising. He aimed at getting good value for the money of the State, and if he aims at these things, and if these things are intended, we ought to get proof of it in this Bill, but the proof is not contained in the Bill. It is far otherwise. We ought to have some sort of proportion in this country, though our heads for the last few years have been considerably swollen about our nation and our nationhood and all the rest. What are the actual facts? The whole population of Ireland, including the Six Counties, is less than that of an English city. It is less than that of the County of Lancashire in England. The County Council of Lancashire is administering more money, and is acting for a population greater than the whole of this country. We ought to have some sense of proportion and not be living in the clouds. I see here "Minister for External Affairs, Parliamentary Secretary." I think that we, as a nation, when it comes to hard facts with us, are really all amateur actors. I do not know of any other country in the world that could produce, as we have produced at the moment, three Governments. We are the Government of the Saorstát, then you have the Government of the Republic, and the Jim Larkin Government.

Mr. DAVIN: What about your own?

Mr. GOREY: We have not tried to govern yet, though we gave an example at the North Wall of what we could do. The Bill will create a very bad impression on the public. I have been speaking to several members of the public, and I know from conversations with them that the creation of, to my mind, unnecessary offices will not help to inspire confidence in the Government. Whether the offices are necessary or not, they could, I think, be done without for two or three years. The first thing the Government should do is, by wise administration, to inspire confidence in the public, and to my mind the provisions of this Bill, some of which are necessary and some of which are not necessary, will not help in that desirable direction. I see that under the provisions of this Bill technical instruction is to be added to the Ministry of Education, and taken from the Ministry of Agriculture. I hope that no change will be made as regards the Agricultural Colleges at Glasnevin and Athenry and other places, and that they will still be retained under the control of the Minister for Agriculture. Technical instruction, to my mind, should also be left where it is at present.

I want to say a few words about the Ministry of Fisheries. As a member of an Advisory Board that was set up recently, I have gathered the information that it is not the intention to run the industry of Inland Fisheries as a State concern. I do not blame the Minister for Fisheries for that. I understand that the preservation and the control of the Inland Fisheries are still to be left to boards known as Conservators. Some of these Boards of Conservators may have done their work well. It is said so, and I am not in a position to question it, but these boards that I do know, and have an intimate knowledge of, did not do their business well or anything approaching well.

If the Ministry of Fisheries is going to be a Ministry at all worthy of the name, it should, in my opinion, be a State Department. I think the Inland Fisheries should be the property of the State.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. Hogan): They are.

Mr. GOREY: Then if they are the property of the State, why are they left in the hands of private individuals who own and control huge stretches of rivers, in some instances ranging from a distance of from 15 to 20 miles, of our tidal and fresh water? If we are going to develop the fishing industry by State funds, or by State aid in any form, we are I assume going to develop it for the State and not for the private individual. The Minister for Agriculture says that these fisheries are the property of the State, but if there are any interests connected with them which require to be bought out, I think they should be bought out and let the State own the fisheries completely and develop them as a State service. It is only by State ownership that the fisheries can be properly extended and developed.

During the past week I have received several reports, some from Clonmel and some from the Midlands, as far inland as Portarlinton, where fish is being destroyed wholesale. During my time I never knew of any protection being afforded for any of the rivers in the Waterford district during the close season. Over hundreds of miles of these rivers there was never any person seen doing any sort of protection duty. Once the open season is finished, the few pounds that remain in the possession of the several little petty Boards, with control over these rivers, are exhausted, and in some districts only one man is retained to do duty during the spawning season. That man is scarcely ever on the rivers. He might go there occasionally to show himself—to show cause, as it were. In my own district the head water bailiff is an old man, 85 years of age. He is a helpless old man, and is not able to do very much, but a case like that gives you an idea of how things are done in the country, and as to the ideas that prevail for developing the fishing industry in the country. Is that, I ask, the idea of the Executive Council of developing one of the most important industries in the country? In my opinion, if the fishing industry were properly developed it would be almost as valuable as the land of Ireland. We have no pollution in our streams or in our rivers. They are the best in the world for rearing and propagating fish, and still they are left in the hands, practically speaking, of a few individuals who have no funds, except what they get from the licenses that are given to fishermen.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

It would be better, I think, that the Deputy did not discuss the fishing industry on the Ministers' Bill.

Mr. GOREY: Under the provisions in the Ministers' Bill, I think I am entitled to speak about the fishing industry. It is not proposed to alter the system as regards the development of the fishing industry under the Ministers' Bill; it is only a question of protection and of imposing fines. I do not know whether I am in order or not.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

The Deputy is not in order in discussing the fisheries.

Mr. GOREY: Am I in order in discussing the justification for a Minister for Fisheries?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

Yes, but you have gone outside that.

Mr. GOREY: I do not think I have, with all due respect. If it is not the intention of the State to make fisheries a State concern and protect them by river police I think the Ministry of Fisheries should be struck out of the Bill. If a Minister for Fisheries has nothing to do there is no necessity for a Minister. It has been suggested that the Ministry of Fisheries should be dispensed with. We all know, whatever Ministry this Department of Fisheries is going to be attached to, it will need a staff. It has always needed a staff. The Department of Fisheries will have to have Inspectors and a head to control it. Surely if fisheries are worth anything they will need a Department? There was a Department always for handling such affairs. Whether the head of the Department is known as a Minister or as a clerk makes no difference if he gives value for the money. If the development and protection of fisheries is left to licensed holders and private holders the development of inland fisheries will never take place. This is a matter to which the Executive Council should give some attention. If properly developed, fisheries would provide a means of subsistence not only for the few people at present living by inland fisheries, but for probably half a million persons.

The Ministry of External Affairs has been referred to—Foreign Affairs, I believe Mr. Gavan Duffy called it. That was a phrase he used to revel in. I do not see why we want a Minister for External or Foreign Affairs. We are concerned with no foreign affairs. We have no colonies and have no interests to clash with any other nation. I think it is ridiculous to be playing with theatricals like this. This Ministry of Foreign Affairs ought to be scrapped and let the Executive Council deal with any foreign matters that have to be dealt with. To my mind, and to the mind of the average man in the country, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs or External Affairs, or whatever you like to call it, will be known as a Ministry for finding a job for somebody. Every Deputy in the Dáil wants to be plain and to state what the people think. I will not go into the provisions referring to the Army Council now. We can deal with them in Committee when, perhaps, they might be amended and brought down to something like what we think they should be. What I have said is, I think, the considered opinion of the members of the Party I represent, and I hope the Executive Council will take some notice of it.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I should like to express my opinion on certain features of the Bill. There are very valuable features in the Bill, and I have no doubt the Dáil will give it a Second Reading. While one is naturally disposed to say that Ministers should have the machinery which they require to carry on their functions and to do the work of the State there are one or two features that are open to criticism. The President referred to the fact that the most constructive criticism that he had seen in the Press came from the "Freeman's Journal." I wish that the President in his speech had dealt with some of that criticism. He passed over it to a considerable extent on Section 8 as regards the Defence Council. He passed over entirely the very forcible criticism, I think, of that newspaper, against the nebulous character of the functions laid down for the President in Section 1. According to that Section the President is to be a sort of liaison officer and is to look after any documents that no one else may be particularly using and that is really all his functions. There is no exact definition of his position as head of the State. I have no doubt, however, that the personality of the present President would ride over any difficulty in this particular Bill, but we must think of the future, of other Governments, and other Presidents.

I think it might possibly be desirable to bring in an amendment that would strengthen, and make more emphatic the rights of the President which exist under the Constitution, but which might be made somewhat clearer in this Bill. The bulk of the criticism I have heard, and certainly the bulk of the criticism outside the Dáil, has been directed against Section 7. Section 7 is an interesting Section, but the real burden of the criticism is, that this Bill provides for twelve Ministers and seven Secretaries to carry on the work of the State; in all nineteen paid officials, paid members of the Dáil or Seanad. The justification that the President gave—I hope I am quoting him fairly—for adding the Secretaries is this: he said he did not think seven were needed. If so, why take power to create seven? Why not bring in an amending Bill? We are frequently promised amending Bills on other subjects. If it is found that more than three are needed it would be possible to bring in an amending Bill if only as a tribute to psychology. Public psychology is such that if you say you take power to create seven they instantly think you are going to create seven. The one serious criticism I have to make of the Government is that they have ignored the public point of view too much. They have nearly always done the right thing, but very often they have done it in the wrong way and caused unnecessary criticism and friction. The justification for these salaries is in order, I gather, that the proceedings of the Seanad may be attended more frequently by Ministers, or by Secretaries.

Mr. JOHNSON: No.

Major COOPER: I think as far as the proceedings of the Seanad this session have gone the fact that no Minister has been able to attend has not been of very great importance. They have voted a reply to the Governor-General's address. They have passed their own Standing Orders and they have suggested the offering of a reward for some form of alcohol that can be used to develop power. I do not know that the attendance of a Minister was necessary on any of these occasions. As far as I can see in the Bill these Ministers' Secretaries that are to be created to keep in touch with the Seanad will not be able to go to the Seanad at all unless they are members of the Seanad, because the Constitution is perfectly clear on the point. Article 57 says that every Minister shall have the right to attend and be heard in Seanad Éireann, but these Secretaries are not Ministers. The Bill is expressly called the "Ministers and Secretaries Bill." I, therefore, urge the President, if he wishes these Secretaries to go to the Seanad and explain the policy of the Government, to add a sub-section to Section 7 saying that these Secretaries shall be Ministers within the meaning of Article 57 of the Constitution. I think that is a very desirable addition to the Bill. Secretaries to Ministers are almost entirely a British invention. They came about as a result of one of the anomalies of the British Constitution. The British legislature consists of two water-tight compartments, the House of Commons and the House of Lords. No member of the House of Commons can sit in the House of Lords, and no member of the House of Lords can sit in the House of Commons. It was absolutely necessary therefore to have the more important Government Departments represented in both Houses so that where a Minister was in the House of Lords he was represented by a Secretary in the Commons and vice versa. That does not exist here, thanks to that wise provision in the Constitution that Ministers can attend the Seanad, and clearly the necessity for Secretaries is very much less.

I have been looking about for precedents for this Bill. I have gone beyond the resplendent figure of the Lord Mayor of Dublin and tried to find precedents in various foreign countries and in the other Dominions. I find that in only one Dominion is there any precedent for having both a Minister for Justice and an Attorney-General. I do not altogether like the provision for a Minister for Justice rather than a Minister for Home Affairs. If you call him a Minister for Justice I am afraid the tendency will arise to call the Attorney-General a Minister for Injustice—an extremely undesirable thing. In every other Dominion except New Zealand there is either an Attorney-General or a Minister of Justice, but none of them possesses both, and in New Zealand the Minister of Justice is also Minister of Industry, Commerce and Health, so that he performs a great many functions and does not confine himself to justice. The fact has been touched on by Deputies Figgis and Gorey that the President has no other portfolio. He was perfectly right to abandon the portfolio of Finance. That is such a responsible portfolio that he was right in doing so. I do think there was precedent for his taking some other office besides the office of President, and the natural office indicated in that direction is that of External Affairs. The Prime Minister of Canada is able to be Prime Minister of a Dominion double our population and more, and also Minister of External Affairs. Monsieur Poincaré is able to perform the duties of Prime Minister of France and also to act as Minister of Foreign Affairs, and the foreign affairs of France are at least as involved and intricate as those concerning the Saorstát. France has a Cabinet of fourteen, that is two more than us. Two of the Ministers, the Minister for the Colonies and the Minister for the Liberated Regions, deal with problems we are mercifully not confronted with. We may have them later, when the Boundary Commission has sat. Until then we are free.

Germany has a Cabinet of twelve, including a Minister of Railways, which we have been spared. As to the smaller countries—I look to the smaller countries rather than to the larger countries like France and Germany—Denmark has a Cabinet of ten, including a Minister of Railways, and the Prime Minister there has another portfolio, that is, of Finance. Norway gets on with a Cabinet of nine, and there the Premier is also Minister of Finance. In Sweden the Premier, Monsieur Branting, is Minister of Foreign Affairs as well and has a Cabinet of twelve, without, as far as I can discover, any Under-Secretary. Switzerland, which is perhaps the closest parallel of all, has a Federal Council of seven Ministers and a President and Vice-President, and these Ministers get £1,000 per annum each, or £200 less than the Secretaries are to have under this Bill.

I am not, as a matter of fact, attacking the Government on the plea that the salaries in the Bill are excessive. There is one omission I notice. The salary of every other Minister is laid down in the Bill, but the salary of the Attorney-General is not laid down. I do not know if he proposes to do anything so grossly unprofessional as to work for nothing, but I think it would be desirable to indicate what the Attorney-General is to receive. He belongs to a highly-paid profession. I am not suggesting that he should receive a small salary. I think he should receive a salary at least as high, if not higher, than that of the Ministers. I should be prepared to give him the same salary as the President. Perhaps the President could answer what the salary proposed to be given is. We will leave it for the Committee Stage.

I turn from Europe—where Cabinets, on the whole, as I have shown, are not larger and, in some cases are smaller than our own—to the various British Dominions which form a certain parallel with ourselves. I take Canada first. It must be admitted that Canada, which is our exemplar under the Treaty, has set us a very bad example. The Canadian Cabinet is large, unquestionably, but Canada has two particular problems to deal with. In the first place, the Canadian Constitution is a Federal Constitution, and every State in Canada—at least every large and important State—feels entitled to a Minister in the Cabinet. Secondly, they have the bi-lingual problem of the French-Canadians, particularly in Quebec, who also insist on a large representation. Therefore, the Canadian Cabinet consists of sixteen members as against our twelve. That includes a Minister for Railways, a Minister for Immigration—immigration is not one of our problems at the present time, though emigration may be—a Minister for the re-establishment of soldiers in civil life (while I should not be sorry to see such a Minister here whose duty it would be to see ex-soldiers are resettled, we have not got one)—a Minister without Portfolio, and a Minister of Marine. So that, taking away these five, the Canadian is eleven against our twelve. They have got three Under-Secretaries instead of the seven proposed here. One of these three Under-Secretaries is for the re-settlement of soldiers in civil life. To come to South Africa. South Africa is a wealthier country, I think, than we are. Our gold and diamonds have yet to be discovered. South Africa is able to manage with a Cabinet of ten, including a Minister for Railways and a Minister for Lands—the lands in the Government hands—so that, properly speaking, they have eight as against our twelve—Interior, Health and Education are all combined there. Australia again gets on with a Ministry of eight, and it has two Assistant Ministers, who may be taken as Under-Secretaries, I think.

There are also three other Ministries—Repatriation, Works and Railways—so that they have eleven Ministers all told. But they have eight as compared with our twelve doing the same functions, and they have only two Assistant Ministers. There is a provision in Australia, which I venture to think is a very desirable one, that the total salaries of Ministers and Assistant Ministers is not to exceed £15,300 a year. As far as I can make out, under this Bill, our expenditure is going to be about double that, assuming that all the provisions of the Bill are going to be carried out and assuming that the Attorney-General is paid commensurately with his merits. Assuming that he receives a salary equal to that of the President, we shall be spending £30,400, and Australia spends £15,300. What is more remarkable still, the United States gets its Government for £30,000, or £400 less than we are proposing to spend under this measure. There really seems a slight lack of proportion there. The one Dominion I have not dealt with is New Zealand. New Zealand has a Cabinet of nine; there Justice and Industry and Commerce are combined. We have to add Railways, without portfolio. They have in all nine Ministries, as compared with our twelve. The salaries of these Ministers, with the exception of the Prime Minister, is £1,170, or £30 less than we are proposing to give our Secretaries. It is a better-paid business to be a Secretary in this Dáil than to be a Cabinet Minister in New Zealand.

I have gone into these points, because I do think when we are laying down the scaffolding on which the fabric of the State is to be built up we should take the widest possible view and consider every possible method by which expenditure can be reduced and by which the thing can be put on a good and secure footing. I would like to make an alternative suggestion. I am not opposed to the appointment of Secretaries, but I think the salary is too high. I believe we would have done better if we had had more work done by Secretaries and less by Ministers. It is easy to elevate a Secretary to a Minister, but it is not so easy to change a Minister into a Secretary. I should like to see in the Executive a President who would be responsible for External Affairs, and who would have a Secretary to deal with External Affairs. I may say that my suggestions are not intended to affect any individual. I should be quite willing to see existing Ministers continuing, but vacancies when they occur should be filled by Secretaries. Then I would have the Department of Justice and the Department of Internal Affairs put under a Minister for Internal Affairs, and have

[Major Cooper.]

Secretaries for Local Government, Commerce and Industry and Posts and Telegraphs. I believe the Minister for Internal Affairs could exercise a general supervision over these Departments as well as doing the work of his own Department. I would give the Minister for Defence a Financial Under-Secretary because of the commitments of that Department for the last year or two. The claims against the Department are enormous, and it might, as a temporary measure, be desirable to have special provision there. The Minister for Finance, I think, could not subdivide his functions. The Minister for Agriculture might have a Secretary who would specialise in Fisheries. Also, you would have the Minister for Education in the Council and the Attorney-General, and it might reasonably be said, with a view to co-ordination, that there should be a Parliamentary Under-Secretary to the whole Council. That would give you seven Ministers and seven Under-Secretaries, and it would mean a very considerable saving. One point occurs to me. Assuming that only a small proportion of these Secretaries are to be found in the Seanad—the average Senator is not the kind of person who would desire office, as he has got business affairs of his own that would make it impossible for him to take up this work—you are going to take 19 salaried Ministers out of an Assembly that is only 100 strong, and if we anticipate, as we may, that the dominant party will naturally and rightly appoint these Ministers, from their own party, you are going to take 19 paid officials out of a party of little more than 60. It does seem wrong. I remember criticisms being directed against the British Cabinet during the European war because of the number of Parliamentary Private Secretaries. They had something like 50 out of 350 members holding office and in receipt of pay in the House of Commons: that is one-seventh. By this Bill it is proposed to have one-third of the dominant party in receipt of salaries or holding office. I hope I am misreading it, but that is how I read it. I do not dispute for a moment what the President asserts when he says the Ministers are overworked. I have every sympathy with the Ministers. They have been through a hard time, and they are, I think, overworked; but the reason, I think, is not that there are not enough Ministers, but that their offices are not properly organised. Again and again we find—I certainly find it—that in order to get anything out of a Government office it is necessary to go to the Minister. If you go to the Minister you get a thing done. In order to get every 2½d. thing attended to and every small claim of a constituent dealt with, you must go to a Minister. You will write letters, and you will receive postcards of acknowledgment, but unless you put a question definitely to a Minister you cannot get anything done. That is wrong; it is a symptom that there is something wrong in the whole organisation of the offices. It is not fair to Deputies to be continually dragged into these affairs by their constituents. It is not fair to Ministers themselves. Their attention is being dragged away from things that are of real importance to attend to matters of departmental detail. If their Departments were properly organised, if the Heads of them—the responsible Civil Servants—were properly organised and we had the thing running smoothly, it would not be necessary. I believe the remedy for this excessive burden that rests on the shoulders of Ministers is to be found, not in the creation of more Ministries and more Secretaries—remember that every one of these Secretaries will have a staff of his own and will have a Private Secretary and a number of people to keep him in touch with the affairs of Government—but in the re-organisation of the offices. I should be very glad if it were found possible to give us a rest from legislation of every kind next year. Let the Ministers organise their offices and let us concentrate on the Estimates and cutting down of expenditure. I believe in that way we shall do far more good than by creating these extra Ministries.

Captain REDMOND: Owing to the very short time at my disposal for going through this Bill, I 3 o'clock. have not had an opportunity of carefully studying it. I, for one, regret it was not possible to postpone the Second Reading of this Bill until some time next week. I am afraid the habit is rather growing in this Chamber of regarding the Second Reading of Bills as merely a formal process, whereas, so far as I understand our procedure, it is not to be looked upon in that light. When a Bill is introduced the first time, true enough, it receives a general assent. But upon the Second Reading, Deputies generally should have an opportunity of going into any details they may desire by way of criticism. Personally, I should have favoured disposing of the Governor-General's Address before proceeding with any legislation. I consider that it now being two months since we listened to the Governor-General making his Address, which should be—and, I presume, was—the then considered policy and programme of the Government, that it is not right that that Address and that policy and that programme should be spread over such a length of time and so much of a Session that at any moment, as has actually occurred in this instance, the Government may by subsequent statements enlarge upon or otherwise alter their original programme. However, the Dáil has thought fit, through the Government, to deal out the Governor-General's Address piecemeal and interlace it with various forms of legislation. I, for one, certainly do not complain of delay in the introduction of the measure at present before us. During the last year, true enough, owing to very many reasons and through no fault of their own, the Government had to introduce in a rather hasty fashion many legislative proposals. But I say that that time has now gone; the time for hasty legislation has ceased. In future the policy of the Government should be rather Festina lente in regard to legislation. The Bill that we are now considering is of the utmost gravity and importance. I think that it is really a corollary to our Constitution, and while that necessitates its introduction without any unnecessary delay, I think that it further necessitates every possible scrutiny and care.

It is proposed to set up certain Departments of State. That, of course, cannot be quarrelled with. Amongst those Departments we find various designations, and in the Schedule we find the various items that will be attended to by different Ministers. A Department of Justice is to be created. With that also I am in complete accord, but, like the previous speakers, Deputy Johnson in particular, I fail to see—and I think we deserve an explanation on this point—why the Attorney-General is set down in this Bill, or in what capacity he is set down. Is he to be a Department, is he to be a Minister, or is he to be the Legal Adviser of the Crown? In other Dominions, and also in Great Britain, the Attorney-General is the Legal Adviser of the Crown. The complete executive authority in this country, by the terms of the Constitution, is expressly vested in the King, and I would like to have explained what is the nature of the Ministry, if any, which the Attorney-General will represent and speak for in the Dáil. Why is he not included in the Ministry of Justice? Is it because—I do not for a moment suggest that it is, but it might possibly be—that the present Minister for Home Affairs, who is to be the new Minister for Justice, and the present Attorney-General might find it rather difficult to know, if they were both in the same Ministry, who should be on top?

I do not know any other reason, and I think we are entitled to an explanation. The Attorney-General in other Parliaments—apart from his position as representative in those Parliaments—is there merely as a Legal Adviser. What I want to know now is: Is our Attorney-General in the future, leaving aside questions of present personnel, to sit in the Dáil as a Minister for a department, and what salary he is to draw—there is no mention, by the way, of the salary of the Attorney-General. In what capacity is he to sit in this Chamber?

So far as the Department of Local Government is concerned, I am in no disagreement with the proposals to place matters other than those strictly applicable to Local Government within its purview, because, in my opinion, our object should be to curtail Ministries and have as few as possible, instead of creating separate Ministries for every item of administration. It is true that it would be very desirable to have a Ministry for Health, but I contend that we are not yet in a position when we can afford to create these entirely separate Departments. Because it is not only creating one Minister; possibly the salary of the head of the Department is only a very, very small item in the final expenditure on that department. It is not merely creating an extra salary, but it means the setting up of separate staffs and separate administrative bodies. Therefore, I have no objection to the inclusion in the purview of the Minister for Local Government of questions affecting health.

There are two departments which, in view of the pronounced policy of the Government in regard to retrenchment, I think should be scrapped, and scrapped without delay. The Dáil is already aware that I am in favour of the scrapping of the Ministry of Fisheries. The subject matter of that Ministry is of the utmost importance to this country. But, again, let me impress upon Deputies that if a country with more than ten times our population, and I am afraid a good deal more than ten times our wealth, does not run a separate Ministry of Fisheries but is satisfied to have matters affecting its fisheries controlled by its Minister for Agriculture, surely we, in this infant State, might be able to adopt a like course. The other Department that I refer to is what is styled "The Department of External Affairs." Really, I think everyone must admit that we have heard very little of or from the Department of External Affairs. I entirely agree with Deputy Figgis' remark that all inter-State matters should be dealt with in this Chamber by the President of the Executive Council. The Minister for External Affairs, it appears—though, mark you, there is nothing in the Schedule about this Department, which is rather striking—also looks after what is known as the Publicity Department.

Well, now, I take the greatest objection to this Publicity Department. I take objection to it on strictly constitutional grounds. I say that no Government should have at its back a publicly paid Department, which they can use, and which I am afraid has been used in this case for nothing but purely party propaganda. It is just the same thing as, during election time, Ministers utilising Government machines for electioneering purposes. I say that the Government should abolish this Publicity Department. It is not a Department of Publicity. I know so little about it that I think it is a Department of hush. However, be that as it may, I say that it serves no useful purpose, and in the future, as I am afraid somewhat happened in the past, it may serve a very dangerous and unconstitutional purpose. Therefore, from the point of view of economy alone, and for the reasons which I have also roughly outlined, there is no reason, I contend, why these two Departments could not and should not be immediately done away with.

Coming to the text of this measure, especially in regard to Section 7—and here I may say that in my opinion Sections 7 & 8 are the two most important and probably the two most controversial Sections of the Bill—I would like, if I may, in a very short time, to give my impression to the Dáil as to the establishment of what are called here Parliamentary Secretaries. What are meant by Parliamentary Secretaries? In other Parliaments there are Parliamentary Secretaries paid and unpaid. The paid Parliamentary Secretaries are usually styled Under-Secretaries for the various Departments. From the nature of these proposals in this Section it is obvious that what the Government proposes to do is not to create Parliamentary Secretaries, but to create Under-Secretaries who shall act as Ministers and share the Ministerial responsibility of the Government. It has been stated that for some time Parliamentary Secretaries—I do not know what they were called—rendered very useful services in administering Departments. Well, I grant all that. But why call them Parliamentary Secretaries? Why raise them to the status of Under-Secretaries, and treat them as Ministers? Why not have them paid Secretaries of those individual Ministries for the purpose of administering the Departments, and not, as is suggested here, for the purpose of taking the Ministers' places in the Dáil? There is great need for national economy as has been especially shown during the course of the debate during the last couple of days. I think that it is really asking too much of the Irish people to swallow the suggestion that the Government—who yesterday cut down old age pensions and teachers' salaries and who to-day propose extra Ministers, because that is what the proposal is—is embarking seriously and sincerely upon a policy of retrenchment.

Now this matter will not rest here. It will be debated in Committee. So I will leave it for the moment. Coming to Section 8 I notice that a Council of Defence is to be set up, and that that Council shall have for its Chairman a Commander-in-Chief; and that Commander-in-chief is to be the same person as the Minister for Defence who has a seat in this Dáil and is to be responsible to this Dáil and to this country for the conduct of the Army. In the first place let me say that this proposal seems to pre-suppose that we are always going to have a Standing Army in this country; a Standing Army in its strict and literal sense and not a Militia Force. That is a conclusion which, I venture to say, should not have been come to without careful discussion and deliberation and decision by this Dáil.

In the second place, it is a proposal which, to my mind, undermines the Constitution. For if there is one thing apparent in our Constitution, which I am glad to say is very largely a borrowed one, it is that the Military Force, whatever it may be in this country at present and in the future, shall be subordinate and subservient to the Civil Authorities. I think it is an exceedingly bad precedent, and I think it is an uncalled-for departure from previous customs, to have a Minister in this Dáil part and parcel of the Armed Forces outside this Dáil. It has been recognised in all Parliaments throughout the world that no Military Officer as such shall sit in that Parliament. That principle has been departed from in time of war. But we are not at war now, so we are told. Neither are we, I hope, preparing for a time of war. Therefore, I think that it is a bad thing for the future Constitutional position of this country, as a constitutional democratic State, to have a person specifically styled by Act of Parliament Commander-in-Chief sitting as a member in this Dáil. But I do not really know what is the purpose of this proposal.

I am certain of this; there is more in this than meets the eye. An ordinary person reading this Section would not be able to understand why there is this anxiety to have a Minister for Defence styled Commander-in-Chief. As far as I am aware, and I have had a little Army experience, there is only one Commander-in-Chief in this country, according to our Constitution, and that is the King, because this Army is the King's Army. That may not be palatable to some of us, but it is the fact. That being so, I do not see why there is the necessity of having this Minister here being styled, I will not say styling himself, Commander-in-Chief and this outside Council to assist him. There should be one authority and one authority alone to deal with all Departments in this State, whether Civil or Military, and that is the Civil authority of Constitutional Government. I could go through very many more of these Sections if I so desired. But as I said in the beginning, I have not had the time to study carefully every aspect of this Bill, and I very much deprecate, therefore, the very hasty manner in which it has been brought forward. I think it would have been much preferable and more in the interests of all concerned if a little more time could have been given to its perusal before we took the Second Reading. There are many things that I disagree with in this Bill, but there are many things also that I agree with. The latter decidedly outweigh the former. There is a necessity for the introduction of this Bill. I hope considerable time will be given to its careful scrutiny and discussion in Committee, and that when it emerges from that stage it will be truly the expressed will of the members of the Dáil who want to see a constitutionally governed country in the future.

General MULCAHY: Dealing simply with Clause 8, the first portion of the Clause states very distinctly and definitely "There shall be and there is hereby constituted a Council of Defence to assist the Minister for Defence in the administration of the business of the Department of Defence, but without derogating from the responsibility of the Minister for Defence to the Executive Council, and to the Oireachtas, respectively, for all the administration and business of the Department for Defence and for the exercise and performance of all the powers, duties and functions connected therewith." It will be quite clear from that Clause that there is no portion of the work of any person, in the Army or in the Ministry of Defence, that is not delegated to that particular person by the authority of the Minister and the authority received by the Minister from the Oireachtas. I hope that before we are through with this Bill it will be quite clear to everybody in the Oireachtas that there is not any proposal here to have a serving Military Officer taking part in the deliberations of this Dáil or a member of it; that the Minister who will be in charge of the Department of Defence will be a civilian pure and simple; and that in vesting in him the title of Commander-in-Chief, which title and position has actually existed here and may exist again in time of national emergency and warfare, you are simply vesting in him a title which in peace times must lapse.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE resumed the chair at this stage.

General MULCAHY: You are vesting it in the responsible member of the Executive Council, simply for the purpose of vesting the title in a body in whom the Command-in-Chief of the Army is vested and must always be vested. In speaking no doubt we use words and adjectives, perhaps possessive pronouns, that we are accustomed one way or the other to use, and when I speak of the Army here, and when I think of it, I think of it as the Army of the Oireachtas which it is by the Constitution. The proposal definitely naming this Council of Defence in this Bill is I think a wise one. The Ministry of Defence is a peculiar Ministry.

Its organisation is very intricate. It has to fulfil peculiar functions. Now, the persons who are named here are the Chief of Staff, the Adjutant General, the Quartermaster-General and, what is proposed here, a finance member, because this Parliamentary Secretary, who shall be responsible to the Minister for Defence for finance, might more properly be called the finance member of the Defence Council. Those four persons are heads of Administrative Departments that go to make up what is called a Ministry of Defence. The Minister, as Chairman of that body, is a civil member of it. He is the person on whom rests complete responsibility for the Ministry. The other members of the Council, as individual heads of Administrative Departments, will have certain very clearly defined duties. Roughly, the Chief of Staff will be responsible for military policy and for the training of his Army. The Adjutant General will be responsible for providing him with his Army, disciplining it and setting out necessary rules of conduct. The Quartermaster General will be responsible for provisioning the Army, whether with accommodation, with clothing, or with food, and the finance member of the Defence Council will be the head of an Administrative Department charged with control of finance. I think it will be appreciated, when we go more deeply into the matter, that there are very many grounds why the person responsible for the administration of the department of Army Finance, should be an elected member of this Dáil.

It would certainly give you greater security that Finance problems are properly thought out, and that the whole scheme of Finance of the Army receives due consideration, and receives it at the hands of a person who is not a mere official. The Minister himself must of necessity be relieved of the mere detail needed in that particular work while not being relieved in any way of the ultimate responsibility for it, because, first, he will, no doubt, give his primary consideration to secure that the Army machine is efficient, and when an Inspector-General's Department will be set up, when inspection is not half inspection and half organisation, you will come to the time when the Inspector-General will be responsible to the Minister for Defence also.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Will the Minister for Defence explain whether the Minister for Finance is to be responsible to this House for the Finance of the Army, or is it the Financial Secretary to the Army who is to be responsible to this House for Army Finance?

General MULCAHY: That is not so. The Minister for Finance will be responsible for the whole finances of the country.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I am talking of the finances of the Army?

General MULCAHY: The financial member of the Defence Council will be responsible through the Minister for Defence for the finances of the Army.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: That is a very grave statement, indeed.

General MULCAHY: In their individual capacities, I say that they are heads of Administrative Departments. I fail to see the Deputy's point that because the financial member of the Defence Council is responsible for the finances of the Army through the Minister for Defence, that that relieves the Minister for Defence of his responsibility to the Minister for Finance in Army matters.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: My point is, that in respect of Finance for all the services the Minister for Finance is responsible to this House, and that no service is separately responsible for its finances except through the Minister for Finance.

Captain REDMOND: May I ask the Minister for Defence if this is what he means, viz.: that in Council the Minister for Defence shall have the Financial Secretary to the Council responsible to him for the amount that is allowed to him by the Minister for Finance?

General MULCAHY: Yes, as well as being the Head of an Administrative Department, each man is responsible directly to the Minister for his own particular Department. As a group they form a Council of Defence to advise the Minister—a Council analagous to the Army Council in Great Britain. As well as that, the organisation of the Defence Department on top has to be in a position to provide you from the three Military Members, viz.: the Chief of Staff, the Adjutant-General and the Quartermaster-General, with what would be called a General Headquarters, actually there in existence and ready for any national emergency, and over which the Commander-in-Chief could be appointed. They would have particular sides to their minds that would enable them to discharge efficiently and with economy their duties from the general administration point of view of the Ministry of Defence; they would be able to turn around and act as Chief of Staff, Adjutant-General and Quartermaster-General to a Commander-in-Chief actually appointed in the field.

It is very unfair, I think, to those people who have shouldered the responsibility during the last five or six or ten years in Ireland to charge them in any way with a tendency to be possessed of or to develop a spirit that ordinary persons working on the civil side do not count. It is a fact that to a very large extent, the responsibility did rest with persons who held military positions in pre-Truce days, and not only did peculiar military responsibilities rest with certain persons then, but very peculiar civil responsibility rested with them. I think I have on more than one occasion here drawn attention to the fact that there was no group of persons in the country in the two or three years preceding the Truce who had a greater respect or a greater appreciation of the duties and positions of persons who held purely civil authority than those who were at the head of the Army. I might also say of the more junior commanders here and there through the country that there is plenty of documentary evidence available in correspondence and memoranda that will show that in time. As I say, it is not fair and only prejudices an understanding of things when statements like that are made here. The actual position is, that you will have a civil Minister. It is perhaps as well to have a Council of Defence. You must have it, and it is not a vocational Council. It is perhaps as well to have a second civil member in that Council who will be a representative in this House and who will be charged with the peculiar responsibility of Finance. As well as that, you will have three military members, and because that particular Council is mentioned in the Ministers Bill here I do not think that that vests the Minister for Defence with any special authority not equally held by any other Executive Minister—in view of the understanding in the law laid down that there is general responsibility in the Executive Council which does not vest the Minister with any special authority and which does not raise the Army to any special pinnacle of pomp that in the ordinary way it is not entitled to. It is mentioned here in order to indicate in the Ministers Bill the essential parts of the Ministry of Defence as distinct from Army organisation pure and simple which will be dealt with in the Defence Force Bill.

Mr. HEWAT: I rise with a growing sense of my own importance. I listened yesterday to the Minister for Agriculture when he very kindly described me, in contrast to my friend, Deputy Johnson, as being the leader of the employers. I was not aware that I had a large following behind me on these benches, but I fully appreciate the importance of his remark, and, after all, if there is one man in the Dáil that ought to know the lie of the land, it is the Minister for Agriculture. Now, in my new capacity, I think I see behind the Government benches quite a few men that I could ask to change over and range themselves behind me. That, I think, has a quite important bearing on the position that I take up on this matter. But when I add to that and say to this august assembly that I am largely in agreement for once in a way with the remarks that I have heard falling from the lips of Deputy Johnson, the Leader of the Labour Party, I think the Government must, of necessity, take cognisance of the seriousness of the position on this matter that has been very fully discussed to-day. Speaking in my new capacity, I would venture to suggest to the Government that the passage of this Bill would be facilitated enormously by the deletion of Sections 7 and 8. These two Sections embody principles that, I think, in this particular case of emergency, should be left out or dealt with in some other way. This Bill probably has had an exceptional experience in having such a prolonged debate on the Second Reading. This Bill, that is essentially important, should go through with as little controversy as possible. Therefore, I would respectfully suggest that, at all events, between this and the Committee Stage, the Government should seriously consider if they cannot fall in, in some way, with the express desire of a large number of Deputies in this Dáil. This question of Parliamentary Secretaries comes up at a very unfortunate time. I am not going to criticise and say whether it is right or wrong, but I think it comes up at a singularly inopportune time, and I think the Government must recognise that. Section 8 covers a matter about which, to say the least of it, there will be a considerable difference of opinion, and I think no good purpose could be served at this stage by forcing through a Section of that kind in a Bill designed for the purpose of fixing Ministries. The only other thing I would like to say, in emphasis of this, is that when I find myself in agreement with Deputy Johnson, and when "him and me is friends," I carry behind me all the employers and he carry behind him all labour, well, I think nothing else matters, because we will have settled everything.

Mr. O'CONNELL: There was just one point arising out of an interruption by Deputy Figgis during the speech by the Minister for Defence, that I would like to see definitely cleared up, and that is the position which this financial member of the Army Council will occupy. I wish to know if there is to be any differentiation as between the Ministry of Defence and other Ministries in this connection. The reply given by the Minister for Defence seemed to imply that, assuming two or three millions, or whatever the sum may be, were voted or provided by the Minister for Finance for the Army, that then it will be the business of this new financial member to be responsible to the Dáil for the administration of that sum. If that is to be the case, I think that it is introducing a new principle, a principle which, in any case up to the present, has not been introduced, although it is possible it might be a good principle. Take, for instance, the Ministry of Agriculture or of Education. The Minister is not allowed by the Minister for Finance, to spend the sums voted to the Ministry he is in charge of in any way he pleases. The Ministry of Finance is continually supervising the actions of particular Departments of particular Ministers. Is that, I ask, to be the case in this particular instance? I think it would be well if that point were definitely cleared up.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. Blythe): It really does not interfere with the functions of the Minister for Finance in any particular. All expenses will have to be sanctioned, as well as all new expenditure. No expenditure under any sub-head of a Vote can be taken out of that particular Vote, and the other precautions that exist to check expenditure will continue to exist in the case of the Army.

Mr. JOHNSON: Are the same functions exercised by the Minister for Finance with regard to other Departments to be exercised by the Minister for Finance as regards Army expenditure?

Mr. BLYTHE: Yes, exactly the same. The proposals will have to be put up and sanctioned by the Minister for Finance.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is it proposed to have Financial Secretaries to answer for every Department in the Dáil?

Mr. BLYTHE: No.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Do we understand that it is the Executive Minister that is responsible to the Dáil in respect of the monies voted by the Dáil, and therefore that it is the Minister who is responsible and not any member of the Finance Council?

Vol. 5.

Mr. BLYTHE:

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: That entirely conflicts with what the Minister for Defence said in regard to the Army Finance Secretary.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. Hogan): It must be a great consolation to Deputies in the Dáil, and in fact to the Press and critics outside, to have something to talk about which they can misunderstand and misinterpret, and generally spread themselves with a formal show at least of plausibility and without any thought. The Ministry of Fisheries has not been treated fairly. Deputies have got up and deliberately made statements which are not in accordance with anything that we have proposed in regard to that Ministry, or in accordance with any policy in regard to that Ministry that is in any document before the Dáil. We are told it is a terrible thing to constitute a Department of Fisheries. The Department of Fisheries always existed, and I hope the Press will take a note of that; and I also hope that Deputies will not repeat that charge again. We are not setting up a new Department, because the Department of Fisheries always existed.

Captain REDMOND: Are you not setting up a new Ministry?

Mr. HOGAN: We are making it possible to have a Minister at the head of the Department of Fisheries.

Captain REDMOND: That is very much the same as setting up a new Ministry.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Perhaps the Deputy would allow the Minister to continue his speech?

Mr. HOGAN: I would also suggest that Deputy Redmond would make his meaning clear when speaking, and not attempt to make his meaning clear when somebody else is speaking.

Captain REDMOND: I have made my meaning clear, but somebody else is referring to a thing I did not suggest or say

Mr. HOGAN: Is it suggested that there should not be a Department of Fisheries?

[Mr. Hogan.]

Captain REDMOND: No, a Ministry of Fisheries.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Perhaps Deputy Redmond will remain silent.

Mr. HOGAN: Deputies have got up one after another and talked about the setting up of a Department of Fisheries. Is it suggested that there should not be a Department of Fisheries? Does Deputy Figgis, who takes a great interest in fisheries and fishing, suggest that there should not be a Department of Fisheries?

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: When that question is put to me, even though it is only a rhetorical question, I am entitled to reply. I have been asked a question by the Minister, and my answer is that in a Ministries Bill the Department of Fisheries should be allocated to some existing Minister, rather than create a new Minister for it.

Mr. HOGAN: Deputy Figgis, like Deputy Redmond, should have stated that while he was making his speech; he did not state it. I listened to him for a quarter of an hour, and his speech was simply a railing at this Department of Fisheries, as he used the word, and, of course, the implication is that we are setting up a new Department with new officials, new Executive officers, and new clerical officers, all at the public expense. Deputy Figgis knows perfectly well that that is not so. Every Deputy knows that there was always a Department of Fisheries attached to the Congested Districts Board. An arrangement is now being made by which a Minister will be responsible for that Department. We can afford to disagree about the wisdom of that course, but let us agree to differ on the real issue. The real issue is whether it is worth while putting one man in charge of what Deputy Gorey said was a most important service in this country and, what no one can deny, is a most important service; whether a man should be individually responsible for that, giving all his time exclusively to it, and not having his time taken up with questions of agriculture, questions which really are quite enough for any one man; with industrial and commercial questions, which are also quite enough for one man; giving his whole time to what is equally the work of any one man, no matter how competent he is—the development of the fisheries of the country. That is the issue, and not whether a Department of Fisheries should be set up. Everyone knows it; there is no use in repeating it again. Let us have the facts anyway. Deputy Gorey said truly that it is a most important service. It is a most important service. The point which Deputy Redmond made, that England is ten times as wealthy and has ten times the population is a point, like the flowers that bloom in the spring, that has nothing to do with the case. The importance of fisheries to a country like this cannot be judged by the importance of fisheries to a huge industrial country like England. I would like to hear any Deputy of any party—he would be brave—alleging that the fisheries of this country are not such an important service as to justify the attention of any single Minister.

Captain REDMOND: Certainly they would not; we cannot afford it.

Mr. JOHNSON: I accept the challenge, that it does not justify the appointment of a special Minister.

Captain REDMOND: At the present time.

Mr. HOGAN: We have something clear anyhow. We have the issue knit as to whether one man is to be appointed to look after fisheries. That is the whole issue.

Mr. JOHNSON: As Minister.

Mr. HOGAN: As Minister—and come here to the Dáil and speak for it, take full responsibility, and have no excuse for negligence. We have at least the issue knit. I hope that is understood. It is not a question now of setting up a Department, but it is a question of putting one man in charge of fisheries, who shall speak for that service in the Dáil and be responsible for it.

Mr. JOHNSON: As Minister.

Mr. HOGAN: I think that is worth whatever salary will be paid the Minister. I agree with Deputy Gorey that fisheries have been neglected. I do not care how much or how little money the State is able to put into fisheries at the moment. The efficiency of that Department can be increased, and any man at the head of that Department who gives his whole time to it will give returns to the State which will be well worth his salary. That is our case in this matter. I want to point out, further, that under this Bill any Department can be amalgamated with any other Department without extra legislation and put under one Minister. I do not think anything could be fairer than that. I do not think the question arises here as to whether there should be a Ministry of Fisheries if once Deputies admit that in the near future a Ministry of Fisheries might be necessary. This Minister's Bill does not propose to make mere temporary arrangements. It proposes to make fairly elastic arrangements in regard to the organisation of the services of the State, not temporary arrangements, but arrangements which will last for a long period, and which, I take it, will be only changed gradually by Acts of Parliament which will be passed with reference to specific problems. We say there is a necessity now for a Minister who will take sole charge of fisheries. We are certain, and I would like to hear Deputy Johnson on the question, that in the near future when more money can be spent on it, a Ministry of Fisheries will be necessary, and can be justified. We think so, and there is very little between us. It is not a question of a Department of State and of money being thrown away. Is it suggested that the fishery service should be given in charge to the Minister for Agriculture? If so, why? What has Agriculture to do with it? It is another example of the fact that it is easier to take what you hear than do a little thinking for yourself. Fisheries were administered by the Department of Agriculture before the Treaty was signed. So was technical education, including the teaching of French, Irish, shorthand, book-keeping, plumbing and carpentry. So was the School of Art.

The head of the Department of Agriculture was supposed to run the School of Art and look after the teaching of painting, the National Museum and the National Library. No one suggests that the School of Art should be left to the Department.

Mr. JOHNSON: No one suggested that they should appoint a new Minister.

Mr. HOGAN: Deputy Johnson returns to that point. I have gone a little further now. We have dealt with that. No one suggested that the School of Art should be left to the Minister for Agriculture, and yet the only reason advanced for leaving fisheries to the Department of Agriculture is that the service was always there. That is what it comes to. If Deputies want to be helpful I would suggest that they should address themselves to the question:—(1) Is a Ministry of Fisheries justified? (2) if not, to what Department should fisheries go? Let them give us their reasons and then we will get at things much more quickly and may get results. There is no question about it, the Department of Agriculture should not control technical education. Education should control education. Deputy Johnson mentioned the appointment of Parliamentary Secretaries and its bearing on the Extern Ministries. The Section reads:—

“The Executive Council may from time to time, on the nomination of the President of the Council, appoint so many persons, being members of the Oireachtas and not exceeding seven in number, as the Executive Council shall consider necessary, to be Parliamentary Secretaries to the Executive Council or to Executive Ministers.”

The Deputy pointed out that that was leaving out Extern Ministers and that was a thing he did not approve of. He thought that the Extern Ministers were entitled to the same assistance in that respect as anyone else. I think that paragraph is quite sound. I do not think the Executive Council would be entitled to appoint Parliamentary Secretaries for Extern Ministers. It may be that later on Parliamentary Secretaries will be required by Extern

[Mr. Hogan.]

Ministers. If so the machinery will have to be provided. I do not think it would be in the spirit of the Constitution that the Executive Council should be entitled to appoint Parliamentary Secretaries to Extern Ministers.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Mr. Kennedy): There are a few observations that I want to make on this Bill but they will not occupy the Dáil very long. Before coming to the matter that perhaps I would be expected to address myself to more particularly, there are some other topics I wish to touch upon, even though it may keep at least one learned and gallant Deputy in suspense as to particulars of a certain office. There is one thing that will have struck everybody since the Treaty was endorsed by the people, and that is the fact that certain persons take a peculiar delight in trying to detract from the national status which has been attained by this country by virtue of that international Treaty. Persons who have not contributed in any way to attaining that very large measure of independent national status seem to think something is to be gained—I do not know what—in contracting, or seeking to contract, the position that this nation now holds. I understand this Constitution which has been enacted by the Dáil has been described as a borrowed Constitution. I did not catch whether it was stated to have been borrowed from any constitutional enactment of the year 1914 or subsequently, but it is, at any rate, the work of the people's Parliament here, and whatever aspersions may be cast upon it, it was thought out, thrashed out and discussed here by the people's representatives. When I heard Deputy Figgis commence by saying that the principle of this Bill might be taken to be admitted, because its principle was the establishment of Ministries, I was somewhat surprised, because I thought that that Deputy, of all others, would have remembered the Constitution.

The number of Ministers, the Ministers themselves, and their executive authority are contained in the Constitution. You could appoint twelve Ministers under the Constitution, certain of them within the Executive group with joint responsibility, and certain of them outside that group with individual responsibility to the Dáil.

What does this Bill do? It performs the complementary function of taking the whole field of administration in this country and dividing it into its natural departments, or as near as we believe we have been able to reach. Valuable suggestions have been made for better organising these matters, but this Bill takes the field of administration of the country, divides it into its natural compartments, and enables these compartments of administration to be assigned either singly or in groups to the Ministers whose Executive authority and whose duty to execute the laws of the country is derived from the Constitution.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Is that not established?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: No. The Ministers as Ministers, and the Executive as an Executive, rest upon the Constitution. Assigning to them particular branches of administration is the matter that is facilitated by this particular measure. It is not quite correct to assume that Schedules are the matters of importance to look to. In Section 1 the various administrative functions are set out by general description. The Schedules are not exalted Schedules. They merely take existing units of administration and assign them to the heads or divisions which have been described in general and comprehensive terms in Section 1 of the Bill. It occurs to me that some of the references that were made to the office of the President arose from a misunderstanding of that position. The President is, under the Constitution, the head of the Executive Government. He nominates the Executive Ministers. He will choose what Departments he will bring into his Executive, and usually they will be Departments with which policy will be largely concerned. He is the co-ordinating Minister and head of the Executive under the Constitution. As President, he does not necessarily take one of the Administrative Departments save in so far as some branch or unit of administration, responsible to the Executive Council as a whole, may have that responsibility expressed to the Dáil through his voice as head of the Executive.

As regards the office of Attorney-General, that office is not the office of a mere legal adviser. As it has existed in this country, as it exists in Great Britain, and in each of the Dominions, it is an office that represents the Executive and the State in various legal proceedings. It is the business of the Attorney-General to defend public rights, for instance in connection with public rights-of-way, if they are invaded. The matter of charities has been mentioned by Deputy Johnson, and it is as representing the public as a whole that the Attorney-General has always appeared in proceedings relating to charities, it being his duty to see, on behalf of the State, that the public get the full benefit of charitable provisions and charitable benefits.

Captain REDMOND: Is he not instructed by a State Department?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: He is not instructed by a State Department. He is the person who represents the Executive in Court. He advises the Executive in Chamber. He does not hold one of the Administrative Departments, and he is not one of the 12 Ministers under the Constitution. Though the office is usually described as a Ministerial office, it is essentially different from the office of Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice is responsible for providing the machinery of the Courts, the police and the rest of the machinery which ensures the administration of law and the maintenance of public order. It is a fact, as Deputy Cooper has mentioned, but it is only an accidental fact, that in the various Dominions the office of Attorney-General is combined with other offices in a particular individual. It frequently happens in some of the Dominions that the Prime Minister himself holds the office of Attorney-General, and that elsewhere the Minister of Justice holds the office. It might be that the Postmaster-General would hold the office, but if he held the office, he would in relation to that particular office, act in a separate and independent capacity, performing quite independent duties. Under this measure it is quite possible that while two or three Ministries may be united in a particular person who may be capable of answering to the House for them, when another and more learned and certainly more gallant Deputy perhaps reaches Ministerial rank his more extensive administrative capacities will be utilised in the combination of this and other offices. But a Minister of Justice, as Minister of Justice, is responsible to Parliament for providing the machinery of the administration of justice and the machinery of maintenance of public order. If he also holds the office of Attorney-General he is responsible to the Executive and he represents the Executive in a wholly different capacity.

I remember in the last Dáil Deputy Gavan Duffy had some notion that the Attorney-General would be answerable to the Dáil for everything, including outside Ministries. That is not so. His office is purely associated with the Executive Government. On the acute question that the learned and gallant Deputy has referred to, I would refer him to the Estimates of last year, when his eager curiosity will be satisfied. I only want to say one or two other words on the other provisions of this measure. As regards the question of Parliamentary Secretaries, Deputy Johnson will realise—we certainly realise it—that this House does not contain, as other Houses do, scions of the great capitalistic houses who eagerly assume the office of Parliamentary Secretary, as a method of displaying their political figures in the public eye. If Parliamentary Secretaries are created here, they will be created for the purpose of doing certain work and of performing certain services. As I think everybody here is a worker for his ordinary living, if certain Deputies are required to discharge these duties, which will absorb their time, the circumstances require that they should receive some stipend. But that remuneration is not as Deputy Gorey said to be no less than £1,200. It is that it is not to exceed £1,200. When you read that in the light that the salary so to be provided, not exceeding a sum which [Attorney-General.] may be sanctioned, will come up annually in the Estimates in the manner in which it is provided in the Bill, there will be an annual opportunity for discussing it, and the position will be very uncomfortable if an unreasonable arrangement has been made.

As regards another matter of detail that was mentioned, the Conservators of Fisheries have been grouped in the Department of Fisheries. The Bill contains provisions which will enable statutory bodies which now exercise administrative functions to be dissolved and merged in the administration by the head of the department. There are great difficulties in the matter of Conservators of Fisheries at the present moment, particularly in the North. It may turn out that it will be more desirable in this country to merge the administration by Conservators into administration by the Minister.

I might perhaps at this stage move the adjournment of the debate.

Debate adjourned.

The PRESIDENT: I move the adjournment of the Dáil until Wednesday.

COMMITTEE ON PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There is a matter I want to announce in connection with the Report of the Joint Committee on Private Bill Procedure which was set down for to-day, in accordance with an order made on Wednesday. A question was raised as to the matter being a joint one with the Seanad and that we ought to pursue the same procedure as the Seanad. In the Seanad, owing to a similar feeling, it was decided that the Joint Committee would be asked to meet again and consider any amendments which Senators might propose. I would suggest to Deputies, therefore, if they have any amendments to the proposed Standing Orders, that they should send them in, if possible, before Monday evening, to the Clerk, and these amendments will be submitted to the meeting of the Joint Committee on Private Bill Procedure, which we propose to have on Wednesday next. I would also like to add, if Deputies are very interested in particular amendments, that they might, if they think fit, appear before the Committee and put the case for their amendments before it. The time and place for the meeting of the Joint Committee will be communicated to Deputies who send in amendments, if the amendments are sent in sufficient time. In that way we may have an amended report which would meet with general approval.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Arising out of your statement, I notice that the Seanad fixed Monday. This being Friday, Monday would be rather short notice for members of the Dáil. Would it be possible to receive amendments until Tuesday mid-day, leaving the whole of the afternoon for preparation?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes, if Deputies will take it as notice now that the Committee is meeting on Wednesday, at 11.30, here. The orders have been in possession of Deputies all this week.

Deputy Baxter has given notice that he will raise on the adjournment the question of political prisoners on hunger-strike.

PRISONERS ON HUNGER-STRIKE.

Mr. BAXTER: I wish to make it plain that in rising to speak on this matter I am doing so in an individual capacity. I rise not with that feeling of hate that I am afraid we have too much evidence of now and again in many of the people who enter into discussion of this matter. I brought this question forward because it seems to me that it is of such serious moment to the people of Ireland to-day that the Dáil would be very ill-advised not to take notice of it. It may be true that perhaps all the Deputies in this House are on one side. Twenty-five per cent. of the Deputies who were elected to represent the people of the Saorstát are not here. But I think that despite the fact that they are not present here, they do represent the twenty-five per cent. of the Irish people who selected and elected them, and their point of view and their position in the Ireland of to-day and the Ireland of to-morrow must be taken into account by everybody who looks to any future for this country at all. That is the point of view I had when I gave notice to raise this question. Now what is the position to-day? We have anywhere around ten or twelve thousand men in prison——

The PRESIDENT: Might I ask if the Deputy has that from any reliable source?

Mr. BAXTER: I am open to correction. Of these somewhere around four hundred are on hunger strike for any number of days up to 30. Some of these—many of them—are men who have bled for Ireland more than once, and are some of the bravest men this country has had in our time, and it seems to me that there are many of those who must be to-day on the point of death. The Dáil has remained silent on this matter up to the present. Is it advisable that it should remain silent until some of these men pass to another world, until, perhaps, some of their remains are taken home to be buried in their native districts in the countryside, until we see a repetition of the big funerals we had when Terence MacSwiney and others gave up their lives? I do not think that that is good for the future of this country. I am afraid it will not be good for its future peace or for its future prosperity. I may be asked: "Why are these men on hunger strike?" It may be said, "No one wants them to die, and why don't they give up the hunger strike?" Well, I do not want them to die, and I hope, and am sure, that Deputies in this House do not wish for their deaths. I think we want every man and woman to live for Ireland, and I think that everything that the Ministry responsible to the Dáil and the Deputies here can do ought to be done to preserve the life of every man and woman for Ireland.

We read in the Press and in the literature and papers distributed that the prisoners in the camps and in the jails have been severely maltreated. We are told by the Republican Party that it is because of this maltreatment that these men have gone on hunger strike. My experience is that when you are in prison or camp for a certain length of time, no matter how pleasing the conditions are, you are prepared to face almost anything to get out. When prisoners are kept in very long and the period is so indefinite that they do not know when release is to come, it is not any wonder that men or women will take the last desperate step. But the question is: Is there anything in the statements that are being made as to the maltreatment of the prisoners in the prisons and camps? Some days ago Deputy Byrne put a question to the Minister for Defence with regard to the treatment of a Deputy to the Dáil—Charles Murphy. If my memory serves me right, the Minister's reply was that the statements regarding Charles Murphy's ill-treatment were not true. The question was if Charles Murphy had been strung up by the wrists in some of the prisons or camps down in Tintown. I think the Minister's answer was a denial of that statement. I met two men in the street the other night who are released prisoners, and who informed me that they are two of the men who were strung up with their wrists over their heads for four and a half hours. They were only two of them and they are released now. I must say I believe the story those men told me. I assume, if I were to put the question to the Minister for Defence if it were true, the Minister's answer would be similar to the answer he gave Deputy Byrne. But then the Minister, I am sure, has to rely for his answers on the statements that are made to him by subordinate officers.

I do not think, however, that that is satisfactory enough for the Deputies here. I must say the answer that was given Deputy Byrne would not be satisfactory to me, after what I heard. And I say again I believe what I was told. Furthermore, these men have gone so far, they informed me, as to have affidavits sworn as to their treatment. That will take some clearing up. And now we are told of the conditions in Mountjoy and Kilmainham. We are told that prisoners in Mountjoy have not had clean clothing for a month, and we are told about the sanitary conditions in those places—particularly in Kilmainham. In the best of days the sanitary conditions in Kilmainham were bad. If they are anything worse to-day than they were two years ago, they must really be intolerable.

[Mr. Baxter.]

These men and women are those who have taken part in the civil conflict in this country. As far as I can see—and I think there are Deputies here who will agree with me—that civil war has terminated and the Republican Party, in all their statements, and judging by the attitude of Frank Aiken and other leaders, have declared that the civil war has come to an end and will not be resumed. It has come to an end—we know that—and there is not any evidence that there will be a resumption of it. We were told by some of the Ministers yesterday that destruction has come to an end, so that apparently even the Ministry itself must be satisfied on that point. I take it that these prisoners are being detained because of the fear of a resumption of the civil war.

The PRESIDENT: Oh, not at

Mr. BAXTER: That may not be so. Perhaps it is that there is a feeling that they should be more severely punished? I am afraid if that is the spirit that is animating the Ministry, we need not be surprised that there is on the other side a similar spirit being exhibited. I think that is bad for Ireland. I think until we can get a better spirit on the two sides that have been party to this conflict, the people who come in between are really going to suffer. Now, the matter I have tried to bring under notice is the fact that 400 individuals, approximately, may be to-day very near their graves because of this hunger strike, by reason of the intolerable conditions they say they are being forced to live under in the prisons and in the camps. I would like to hear what the Minister's attitude is, or what the attitude of the Ministry is, regarding those prisoners. I would like to know from the Minister for Defence if, under the Public Safety Act, he has not power or authority to have doctors and nurses attend the prisoners, and I would like to know if such care is being given to prisoners who are at present in their cells unable to rise and who receive no attention.

What has the Minister to say if he is asked to permit an independent Committee set up by the Dáil to enter the prisons and see what are the conditions there? I do not think that is too much to ask, and I do not think it would be too much for the Minister to concede. If everything is all right from the point of view of the Government, and if the conditions are satisfactory, I think the Government have nothing to fear by appointing a Committee of the Dáil to enter the prisons and make a report on the conditions there. The Government are perfectly satisfied as to what is the point of view of the Deputies, and they know the Committee would be as favourable to the Ministry as to the other side. If everything is all right from the Ministry's point of view, there can be no harm in setting up this Committee and giving it power to visit the prisons. If everything is not all right, that would be looked upon as being the reason why the Minister will not set up this Committee. It seems to me that there is a great responsibility on the Minister for Defence to explain what his attitude is with regard to the treatment of the prisoners in the camps and prisons.

I think it is his duty, and I think it is also the duty of the Dáil, to see that if prisoners are kept they are to be treated at least as human beings. I say more: if you want to drive people back to the savage state, treat them as if they were not human beings and then you will succeed. I know I will be told of the destruction that has been brought on the country by these prisoners. I have taken some trouble to discover what the point of view of these people is and whether there is to be a resumption of civil war and what the prisoners will do if they were free to-morrow. I have been told by responsible individuals that the civil war has come to an end, and that they are prepared to go out and conduct the campaign on constitutional lines, on the platform, through the Press, and by other means. If they are prepared to take up that attitude in the light of changed conditions, the Ministry should be prepared to change their attitude. I will be very glad to learn from the Minister responsible that they intend to do so.

The PRESIDENT: This question was before the Dáil on May 2nd last.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Before the President speaks, let me mention that three Deputies have risen. We have only until half past four to discuss this matter, and it seems to me that the Deputy's statement calls for reply.

The PRESIDENT: My statement will take only one minute. This question was before the Dáil on the 2nd May last, and a resolution was adopted to the effect that in the opinion of the Dáil the fact of any particular person being on hunger-strike should not affect the question of detention or release. That resolution was put and agreed to. There was a sort of bargain come to at that time and that question is settled. Hunger-strike will not effect the release of any prisoner either now or in the future, and I would like to tell the Deputy who has just spoken that my view of his responsibility in this business is very great indeed. If a single prisoner on hunger-strike dies, the attitude of the Deputy who has spoken, and of other people who, by their acts or resolutions or their talk about this gigantic failure, the most gigantic failure that these people who threatened the State ever entered into—this failure of the hunger-strike—must not be overlooked. About 300 out of 7,400 are on strike, and there are people in this country waiting to see who is going to die, some thinking it will mean the release of the remainder, and others thinking it will afford an opportunity to the face-savers to call off this hunger-strike. They are held according to law, sir, everyone of them. The law of this country, as passed in this Parliament, is not going to be repealed by speeches and appeals to sentiment. We are a free people now, entirely independent, and we are responsible for the conduct of this country. We are taking that responsibility and no appeal to sentiment is going to detract us from it.

Mr. BAXTER: I think you might—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy Baxter cannot speak again.

Mr. HOGAN (Labour): I will not detain you very long. Even at the risk of repeating myself, I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without registering my appreciation of the action of Deputy Baxter in raising the question of the prisoners. We have been told here and elsewhere that there is little heed given to the acts of this Parliament by certain people outside. I would suggest to the Ministry that the little heed they give to the voice of public opinion, as expressed by public bodies and by public plebiscites, would explain the little heed that has been given to this Parliament in certain quarters. I have now a signed memorial from 30,000 people from Co. Clare, a county represented in one part by a Minister. Those people demand the release of the prisoners. Yesterday I put that demand forward as a means of retrenchment and said that the Government would save thousands by the release of the prisoners. The President has told us that there is no fear of civil war, and we have been told in other quarters that there is no such fear. Then, where is the need to keep the prisoners? What authority has any Government to say to any citizens taken off the streets that they will hold them until they sign a statement that they will not commit again any offence which has not been proved against them?

Mr. A. BYRNE: I join in this debate purely from humanitarian motives. It has been stated by a deputation at another public board with which I am connected, that the conditions in the prisons are a disgrace to any civilised country.

The PRESIDENT: Might I intervene to mention that I understood the question was the release of hunger-strikers? Deputy Byrne raises another question. Deputy Baxter, in introducing this matter, brought one thing across the other. I submit what he was going to raise was the question of the hunger-strikers.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is correct, and I spoke to Deputy Baxter on the matter and made that clear to him. I think if Deputy Byrne had something to say about the hunger-strike he would be in order.

Mr. BYRNE: I will take the earliest

[Mr. Byrne.] opportunity of raising the question of the prisoners, and the treatment of the prisoners. I would say in connection with the Charlie Murphy case—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Now the Deputy is speaking on the same point again. The Deputy cannot evade the rules.

Mr. BYRNE: Then I will raise it again.

General MULCAHY: Deputy Baxter has made a statement that the prisoners on whose behalf he speaks are prepared to go back to what he calls constitutional action. Now, it is very important that the public generally should know whether Deputy Baxter has any authority, and can show any case for making a statement like that. Because while he speaks of twenty-five per cent. of the representatives of this country being supporters of the present hunger-strike, and being supporters of the position taken up by the prisoners who are on hunger-strike, there is also the point to be borne in mind that this twenty-five per cent. of the representatives of the people have been returned on a policy of peace and going back to constitutional lines of action, whereas their actual policy and the policy that they are proceeding on is a policy by which twenty-five per cent. of the representatives of the people can set up a Government, can maintain an army, and can operate one or the other in whatever way they wish themselves. Now that is a matter upon which we have got to be definitely clear. We have got to be definitely clear on that point, too, when the spokesman of the prisoners says that they went on hunger-strike because of the treatment meted out to them in the prison, and when the chief spokesman of theirs makes a statement for the information of all that the prisoners "Went on hunger-strike to obtain unconditional release in the defence of the Irish citizens' right to be free to set up their own Government and live their own lives without yielding voluntary allegiance to any power or authority hostile or inimical to the Republic of Ireland." That is an implication that this Government set up by the majority of the people of this country is a Government inimical and hostile to what they call the Republic of Ireland. We have got to be very definitely clear that men who are brave and men who have bled have not inherent in them the right to test in that way whether other people are as brave, and whether other people can bleed. You have also this statement of the 12th October, 1923, and you have in documents that come day by day into our hands, a statement of determination on the part of these people to maintain what they call the army, and you have one of their agents writing on the 12th October, 1923, from America and saying "Funds must be raised and a whole lot of things before we can go into the field again." You have the general assertion that ill-treatment in the camps has been at the root of this, and you have a prisoner from one of the camps writing out on the 6th November: "I wish and pray to God that we were all home again, and I do not want to hear any more about the great things they done in Cork and Kerry, for God knows I have the bitter experience of knowing what some of them are like, as the majority of the fellows here come from there, but I must say in justice to some of them, that they stuck to me through thick and thin, even some of my own staff, after urging me to call the strike off, resigned and left me to bear the lot myself. I must say in justice to the Staters that they were even kind to me. So you see all the good men are not on our side." Then he goes on to say that he was the camp leader, and when he saw that his men had been put up against a test, that it was not fair for men to be put up against, he called off the strike, and he said of others: "There are about sixty on strike here still, but they are not honest as the majority of them have dirtied their bibs, and now they are trying to save their faces by staying on strike."

The prisoners who have been in the camps are getting all the medical treatment that they want. The conditions in the camps are not the conditions that are painted by certain spokesmen of the prisoners and by certain publicity machines. The prisoners are taking up their present attitude against the Government in order that they may be free with impunity to go out and run a Government, or run an army, and go into the field again when they have money or materials, or when some mad head or two or three among them would lead any section of them into the field, and restart again the destruction that we have been used to. We must, bearing the responsibilities that we do, be very clear what is the position with regard to any group of men like these. Before they can be released from the prisons in which they are, we cannot allow any action on their part of mutiny of any kind inside, to force us to release people whom our whole intelligence, and our appreciation of responsibility, dictate that we should keep inside.

The Dáil adjourned at 4.30 p.m. to 3 o'clock on Wednesday, 21st November, 1923.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.

ORAL ANSWERS.

MANAGEMENT OF THE CURRAGH.

Mr. D. J. GOREY (for Mr. John Conlan) asked the Minister for Finance if he will state in what Department the management of the Curragh of Kildare is vested, and if he will order a return showing the annual expenditure in the way of administration and the payment of salaries to Rangers and others; the number of persons employed and with whom their appointment lies; also the amount of revenue derived from the Turf Club and other sources.

MINISTER for EXTERNAL AFFAIRS (Mr. D. Fitzgerald) (for Minister for Finance): The management of the Curragh is vested by Statute in the Ranger, whose appointment lies with the Minister for Finance and who is an unpaid officer. Certain functions in connection with the management are discharged by a paid Deputy Ranger and Bailiffs, who have such powers and duties as the Government, with the advice of the Ranger, from time to time, think fit to direct. The Bailiffs are appointed by the Ranger or Deputy Ranger.

The expenditure, which includes the salaries of the Deputy Ranger and four Bailiffs, amounts to approximately £715 a year. The annual rents receivable are £530, of which the Turf Club pays £47. The rent of the Stand House, etc., is £1 a year, increasing to £50 at the 25th March, 1925.

OIREACHTAS MEMBERS AND INCOME TAX.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for Finance whether, in view of the financial situation, he will consider the desirability of deducting Income Tax (and Super-Tax where liability exists) from the salaries of Deputies and Senators before payment.

Mr. FITZGERALD (for Mr. Blythe): The sums payable to Deputies and Senators are allowances towards expenses, and are not chargeable to Income Tax.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Arising out of that answer, is the Minister aware that it is a matter of the deepest possible sorrow to Deputies that they are not in a position to pay super-tax?

Mr. FITZGERALD: I can well believe that.

SAORSTAT OFFICIALS' SALARIES.

SEAN MAC GIOBUIN asked the Minister for Finance whether there are at present any officials employed by the Saorstát (Government who are in receipt of official salaries from the British Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD (for Mr. Blythe): There are some 90 Civil Servants on loan from British Departments to Departments of the Saorstát, of whom three are employed in the Ministry of Finance and the remainder in the Revenue Commissioners' Department.

REPRESENTATION ON WAR GRAVES COMMISSION.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for External Affairs whether, in view of the fact that nearly 50,000 Irishmen were killed in the European War, he will make representations to the British Government that a representative of the Saorstát should be appointed to the Imperial War Graves Commission.

Mr. D. FITZGERALD: The question of appointing a representative to the War Graves Commission is under consideration, and it is hoped that a final decision will soon be reached.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Arising out of that answer, is the Minister aware that Canada, Australia, South Africa, and New Zealand are represented by their High Commissioners on this Commission?

Mr. FITZGERALD: I am aware of that.

PROCLAIMED MEETING.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Home Affairs what were the reasons for proclaiming the public meeting in Droichead Nua on the 4th inst.; why citizens travelling on business were prevented from entering the town on that day; whether he will in future refrain from using the Gárda Síochána for such purposes.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. K. O'Higgins): As regards the first part of the question, the Deputy's attention is invited to the terms of the public notice which appeared in the Press on the 3rd instant. Persons desiring to enter Droichead Nua on the 4th instant for legitimate purposes were allowed to do so. I cannot give any undertaking that the Gárda Síochána will not be called on to take similar action in future should a similar emergency arise.

ILLEGAL SEIZURE OF LAND.

Mr. DENIS J. GOREY (for Mr. John Conlan) asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether he is aware that a farm, belonging to Mr. I. C. Gibson, Rathwalkin, Kildare, situate at Ballykin, Geashill, Offaly, consisting of 120 Irish acres, and which has been in possession of the Gibson family for 70 years, was forcibly seized by a number of persons from the locality in the months of July and August, 1922; whether they drove off his stock, removed gates, threw down fences, and dismantled the two-storied dwelling house, unroofing it, and carrying away doors, windows, etc.; whether these persons drove in their own cattle, which are still grazing on the lands; whether Mr. Gibson's claim for compensation is still in abeyance, although he has had to pay all rates and charges without having derived any income whatever from the farm from the time of the seizure; whether the Land Commission will forego payment of arrears until the claim for compensation is heard, and if said arrears will be included in the amount awarded; whether the Minister can explain the failure of the local police authorities to deal with a case of this kind.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The trespass of cattle on the lands belonging to Mr. I. C. Gibson was brought to notice last June. It transpired that no fences existed and that neighbouring farmers could not be blamed for accidental trespass. Mr. Gibson was, therefore, advised to fence his lands when police support would be afforded to him to prevent any further trespass, but he took no action in this direction. He subsequently complained that a number of his gates had been stolen. Inquiries were instituted by the Gárda Síochána with the result that one of the gates was traced. Proceedings were instituted against persons in whose premises it was found, but before the hearing of the case Mr. Gibson wrote to the sergeant stating that he was not anxious to proceed with the matter and requesting that no further action should be taken. In the circumstances the Gárda Síochána withdrew the charge. The task of the Civil Authorities in such cases is rendered exceedingly difficult by the unwillingness of such persons as Mr. Gibson to render any assistance. It is open to him to take proceedings against any person whom he finds trespassing, when the forces of the State will be used to carry out any order made by Court.

Questions regarding the payment of compensation and the remission of Land Commission arrears should be addressed to the Ministers for Finance and Agriculture, respectively.

MEATH MEN'S DETENTION.

Mr. DAVID HALL asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether he is aware that Richard Healy, John Healy, and John McCormack, of Derrylangan, Athboy, Co. Meath, were arrested on 6th July, and are at present detained in Mountjoy Jail; whether any charge has been preferred against them, and whether the Minister intends to bring them to trial.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Richard Healy, John Healy, and John McCormack were arrested as stated on the 6th July and are detained in Mountjoy Prison.

The answers to the other two questions are in the affirmative.

BALLINALEE NATIONAL SCHOOL.

Mr. PATRICK W. SHAW asked the Minister for Education whether he is aware that the Black and Tans, whilst in occupation of the Boys' and Girls' School at Ballinalee, Co. Longford, burned the furniture and destroyed the fittings of those schools; whether the schools had but two years previously been re-furnished by Grant from the Education Board, along with local aid; whether the Shaw Commission had refused to consider the case as one for compensation for damage; whether the present building used as a school has been reported on as "insanitary and unsafe;" whether he will urge the Minister for Finance to make an immediate grant for the repairing and re-opening of the schools.

MINISTER for EDUCATION (Prof. MacNeill): (1) The British Military Forces occupied the Ballinalee Schoolhouse from November, 1920, to May, 1921. They injured the building and did considerable injury to the school furniture.

(2) Forty-two dual desks and six long seats were supplied in 1917 with the aid of a State grant of two-thirds of the cost.

(3) This Department is aware that application was made by the Manager to the Shaw Commission for compensation, but no official intimation has been received as to the result.

(4) The temporary premises (Teacher's residence) in which the school is being conducted is not regarded as suitable for school work. The ventilation is defective, but the building has not otherwise been reported to be "insanitary and unsafe."

(5) The question of repairing and remodelling the Ballinalee Schoolhouse has already received attention in this Department. The cost of the works regarded as necessary is estimated at £425, but the Manager is not prepared to provide the local quota of the cost, viz., one-third, in view of his claim for compensation in respect of damage done to the building, and this Department is not, therefore, in a position to sanction a grant in the case.

It is understood that representations in regard to the non-settlement by the British Government of the claim for damages to the Schoolhouse and equipment have been made by the Manager to the Minister of Finance, and that the matter is under the consideration of the Minister.

KILLESTER SCHOOL REQUIREMENTS.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for Education whether he is aware that in the ex-soldiers' settlement at Killester, Co. Dublin, there are upwards of 500 children, who are nearly two miles from the nearest school, and whether he will take steps to provide a school for these children.

Professor MacNEILL: It appears that there are nearly 500 children of school-going age in the Killester area, of whom nearly 300 are at present attending the neighbouring schools at Clontarf, Artane, Raheny, Green Lanes, Howth Road, Marino, and various schools in the city.

Apart from Green Lanes and Howth Road National Schools, the attendance of these children at the neighbouring National Schools has had the effect of considerably overcrowding these schools, whilst a large number of children from this area are not, so far, attending any school. There is undoubtedly necessity for the erection of a suitable school in the Killester neighbourhood.

Such a school, if built for, say, 500 children, would, under present conditions, cost £12,000 or upwards, one-third of which, say, £4,000, would, under the regulations, have normally to be borne by the locality, the balance, £8,000, being provided by the State.

The difficulty in the matter will be understood when it is considered that this balance of £8,000 represents one-third of the total grants which the Ministry of Finance consider could be allowed for the current financial year for the erection of schools under the jurisdiction of the Free State. The question, however, as to what can be done for the school children in this growing area is at present under consideration.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Arising out of that answer, may I ask the Minister if he is aware that there is a free site available for a school in this village? No land would be required.

Professor MacNEILL: I am very glad to hear that.

POSTAL DELIVERIES IN CLONMEL

Mr. LOUIS D'ALTON asked the Postmaster-General whether a second postal delivery in the Borough and Old Bridge District of Clonmel could not be arranged, as at present there is only one delivery per day for a population of 4,000.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. J. J. Walsh): There are at present two deliveries of letters at Clonmel—one commencing at 8 a.m. and the other at 12.15 p.m. The second delivery is, however, restricted to the town proper. The question of extending it so as to include outside districts has already been carefully considered, but as the number of letters which would be benefited is so small it is not considered that the additional expense involved would be justified.

TRANSFER OF KILDARE POSTWOMAN.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Postmaster-General if he is aware that Miss Lucy Dunne, Postwoman, Kilmeague, Co. Kildare, has been transferred from the route she was travelling for the last seven years, and where she gave every satisfaction to the public, as can be testified by the Memorials sent to him by the residents and the Parish Priest; further, that her salary has been reduced from £1 1s. 9d. per week as a whole time officer to 9s. 3d. as a half time officer; and, further, that the Department has ceased to stamp her National Health and Unemployment Insurance cards, thereby depriving her of the benefits conferred by those Acts, and whether the Minister will give instructions to have this woman restored to her former route and salary, as she is the sole support of a widowed mother.

Mr. WALSH: It was recently found necessary to reduce the frequency of an unremunerative rural post at Kilmeague from six to three days a week, and in order that the wages of the Auxiliary Postman, who performed the duty, might not be correspondingly reduced, he was transferred to the walk on which Miss Dunne had been employed.

Miss Dunne, who has been acting in a temporary capacity as an Auxiliary Postwoman, has no claim to employment as an Auxiliary or to any particular route, and she was given the three day walk with the reduced wages attaching to it.

Since the change of her duties Miss Dunne ceased to be insurable under the National Health Insurance Acts, as persons paid under an allowance who are employed for not more than eighteen hours a week on the delivery or collection of letters are exempt from Insurance.

VACCINATION ACTS ENFORCEMENT.

MICHEAL O HAONGHUSA asked the Minister for Local Government, whether, in view of the recent outbreak of smallpox in England, and the arrival from there at the Port of Cobh last week, of a person so affected, he will consider the necessity of enforcing the provisions of the Vaccination Acts.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Seumas de Burca): The necessity of enforcing the provisions of the Vaccination Acts in this country has never been overlooked. The duty of enforcing these Acts is one, in the first instance, for the Board of Guardians in counties in which amalgamation of Unions has not been carried out, and for the Rural District Councils in other counties. During the recent troubles vaccination was somewhat neglected in certain districts of An Saorstát, but with the return of more settled conditions the duty and necessity of securing compliance with the existing Acts [Minister for Local Government.] has been consistently urged on the authorities, in most instances successfully.

It became clear last autumn, with the increasing prevalence of small-pox in England, that this country must be prepared to face a possible invasion of the disease. Warning was accordingly given to the Medical Officers of the ports and of the other principal districts having cross-channel lines of communication. These officers are also supplied week by week with summarised details of the known incidence of small-pox. The vaccination authorities throughout Saorstát Eireann were advised of the danger and were urged to activity in carrying out primary vaccination.

In one or two districts the number of vaccination defaulters is still unduly high, but the matter is being carefully watched. If the local authorities fail to take adequate measures to ensure the safety of the public health of their district, the necessary steps will be taken to compel them to do so.

On the 10th instant the Ministry was informed of a suspected case of small-pox in Cobh. On the same date a definite diagnosis was asked for and instructions as to precautions were sent. On the 12th it was reported to be a definite case. On the following day a Medical Inspector of the Ministry visited Cobh, investigated the case, and took all necessary precautionary measures.

Mr. SEARS: Arising out of that answer, may I ask the Minister if he would take note of the fact that a large body of medical opinion is opposed to vaccination altogether, and that a large number of parents are opposed to having their children vaccinated as well; and will he consider the advisability of giving to their parents the same power of avoiding this operation as English parents have?

SEAMUS de BURCA: The matter will have the attention of the Department.

CLONAKILTY DOCTORS' SALARIES.

TADHG O DONNABHAIN asked the Minister for Local Government

whether he is aware of the fact that the salaries of each of the three Medical Officers in the Clonakilty Rural District have been recently increased by approximately £40 per annum; whether such increase has the sanction of the Local Government Department; and whether, if the answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative, in view of the economic condition of the Saorstát, and the policy of retrenchment advocated by the Government, the Minister considers it desirable that local authorities should be permitted to grant such increases when the general tendency at the moment is to effect economies in all branches of the public service.

SEUMAS de BURCA: The Board of Guardians of Clonakilty Union after due notice to each member adopted a proposal to grant a scale salary of £250 a year by annual increments of £10 a year to a maximum of £350 a year to each of their three Dispensary Medical Officers, and after careful consideration a scale salary for the officers in question of £200 a year by annual increments of £10 to £300 a year was sanctioned.

Every proposal of this nature is carefully investigated before a decision is given. It was found that the existing scale salaries of the Dispensary Medical Officers in Clonakilty Union were not adequate to the responsible nature of the duties, and the area, population, and character of the districts of which they had charge.

While the economic condition of the Saorstát and the policy of retrenchment advocated by the Government are of paramount importance, the health of the community must be safeguarded. To ensure this it is essential that proper provision is made for the competent discharge of the duties of Dispensary Medical Officers.

PROVISION OF SEED POTATOES.

Mr. JOHN L. COLE asked the Minister for Agriculture whether, in view of the almost total failure of the potato crop, he will make early inquiries, with a view to the necessary steps being taken to provide supplies of seed potatoes for small farmers and labourers next Spring, as has been done in previous years when a similar failure of the potato crop occurred.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. P. Hogan): I cannot agree that there has been an almost total failure of the potato crop this season. In some districts the crop is one of the worst for a number of years, but in most districts the returns, though less than that of the exceptionally heavy crop of last year, are quite up to the average of the previous five years. Areas in which there is a shortage of seed in the spring should have no difficulty in procuring supplies from neighbouring districts. I am, however, prepared, in conjunction with the Minister for Local Government, to consider the desirability of making loans to local bodies for seed supply schemes as was done in previous years, if it is demonstrated that these loans are necessary.

LAND DIVISION IN WESTMEATH AND LONGFORD.

Mr. P. W. SHAW asked the Minister for Agriculture what steps are being taken to provide additional land for the small holders in the Counties of Westmeath and Longford; and whether, in view of the large number of ranches in those counties which would appear to come under the powers of the Land Act, 1923, he will have those powers exercised at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. P. HOGAN: A scheme for the division of some 300 acres, part of the lands of Enniscoffey, Co. Westmeath, purchased from Mr. G. Levinge, is in course of preparation. The powers of the Land Commission under the Act of 1923, for acquiring land for the purpose of relieving congestion, will be exercised in all proper cases with as little delay as possible.

DISTRIBUTION OF MAYO LANDS.

LIAM MAC SIOGHAIRED asked the Minister for Agriculture if an estimate could be made of the amount of untenanted land in Co. Mayo available for distribution, when the work of distribution will begin, and what is the earliest time the new owners may hope to get possession, and if any of the bog available for distribution can be "striped" in time to be worked next year.

Mr. HOGAN: The Land Commission cannot as yet give any accurate estimate of the amount of untenanted land in Co. Mayo.

There is vested in the Land Commission, as successors of the Congested Districts Board, some 113,000 acres of untenanted land in that County, of which 9,000 acres is arable, 10,000 bog, 90,000 mountain and rough grazing, and 4,000 water, waste, etc.

The distribution of these lands is being proceeded with as rapidly as possible. The powers conferred on the Land Commission by the Land Act, 1923, will enable the Commission to deal with the difficulties which previously existed.

With regard to land purchase in general, the preliminary work in connection with the collection of arrears and payment in lieu of rent is being completed more quickly than was expected, and a preliminary survey has already been made of some estates. We are now in a position to take the first steps towards the acquisition of land under the Land Act, 1923. In the "Iris Oifigiúil" of next Tuesday, the 27th instant, there will appear the first list of the estates which it is proposed to acquire, and we hope to be able to publish further lists in each succeeding issue for some time. Land purchase will proceed with all possible expedition.

"ARMISTICE" DAY CELEBRATIONS.

SEAN MAC GIOBUIN asked the Minister for Defence whether men wearing the uniform of the National Army participated in last Saturday's "Armistice" celebrations with official approval; and, if not, what action, if any, it is intended to take in the matter.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): The answer is in the negative.

DEPENDENT'S ALLOWANCE (BALLIVOR, CO. MEATH).

Mr. DAVID HALL asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that a claim for dependent's allowance was furnished last April by William McKeon, Robinstown, Ballivor, Co. Meath, in respect of his son, Private McKeon, A. Coy., 58th Batt., Killmainagh Court House, whether the usual form of consent was signed last April by Private McKeon and the O.C. of Barracks, when stationed in Omeath, and forwarded to the office of the Paymaster-General, Portobello Barracks; whether, in view of the fact that Private McKeon was the only support of his father, who is aged sixty years and at present destitute, the Minister will entertain the claim for dependent's allowance and expedite payment.

General MULCAHY: The application of Mr. McKeon was disallowed after due investigation on the ground that the extent of dependence which in the case of an unmarried soldier is taken to be the amount normally contributed by him to his home over and above the cost (if any) of his own maintenance therein for a reasonable period prior to enlistment was less than the minimum specified by regulations, namely, 12/- per week, before an allowance may be issued. It was, in fact, about 10/- per week. It should be stated, however, that the regulations are based on the recognition of an obligation on the part of an unmarried soldier to contribute to the support of his dependents a reasonable portion of his Army pay, this portion being calculated at 8/- per week in the case of a soldier receiving the ordinary rate of pay.

Mr. HALL: Is the Minister aware that prior to joining the National Army he subscribed 30/- altogether to the maintenance of the home of his aged father, and that since then nothing has been subscribed to the maintenance of the old man?

General MULCAHY: The matter was fully investigated, with the result stated in my answer. If there are any facts which were not before the officers investigating the matter, I will have them further considered if they are communicated to me.

GARAGE OWNER'S CLAIM.

MICHEAL O DUBHGHAILL asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that a sum of over £250 is due to Mr. Carton, garage owner, Bunclody, Co. Wexford, by the Military; whether some of the amount is over two years due, although Mr. Carton has made several applications for same; whether he can say when this debt will be paid.

General MULCAHY: A claim for £280 odd has been received from Mr. Carton, who has been asked recently to furnish some missing particulars. On their receipt consideration of the claim will be expedited.

DUNMORE BILLETING ACCOUNT.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that a billeting account, due to Mr. P. J. Flattery, Merchant, Dunmore, Co. Galway, is still unpaid, though incurred some twelve months ago; that the account has been certified by the Command Quarter-Master and items repeatedly furnished to Claims Department, Portobello; and whether he will see that payment is expedited.

General MULCAHY: Certified claims received from Mr. Flattery have been paid. A claim amounting to £57 13s 6d is in hands, and delay in payment is due to a difficulty in getting certification. I am having a special effort made to have the claim certified and it will be paid as soon as possible.

CLARE INTERNEES.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN asked the Minister for Defence whether it is proposed to retain Messrs. James MacMahon and Thomas Gallagher, both of Ennistymon, Co. Clare, still interned in Gormanstown.

General MULCAHY: James MacMahon was released yesterday, and Thomas Gallagher will be released forthwith.

VOLUNTEER POLICE DEBTS.

SEOIRSE de BHULBH asked the Minister for Defence if he will give directions that the Bills owing (for motor cars used by the Volunteer Police for duty during the truce) to George Colbeck, Patrick Grehan, William Gaul, Patrick Dowdall—particulars of which have been already furnished—will be paid forthwith.

General MULCAHY: I am unable to trace the receipt of any bills from Messrs. Colbeck and Gaul. If the Deputy will furnish me with the addresses of those persons, further enquiries will be made.

Mr. Grehan's account is under consideration with a view to an early payment.

A claim for £6 8s. 9d. made by Mr. Dowdall was settled by a payment of £3 12s. 6d. on the 3rd ultimo.

EX-SOLDIER'S CLAIM FOR PENSION.

SEOIRSE de BHULBH asked the Minister for Defence if he will consider the case of Patrick Gibbons, Fair Green, Naas, for a pension, as this man is a complete invalid, the result of Army services, particulars of which have already been furnished.

General MULCAHY: It is regretted that the case of Patrick Gibbons does not come within the scope of the Army Pensions Act, 1923.

WRITTEN ANSWER.

COMMUTING PENSIONS FOR NATIONAL LOAN.

TOMAS MAC EOIN asked the Minister for Finance if he would be prepared to give favourable consideration to a suggestion that Civil Servants and others who have retired under Article 10 of the Treaty should, if they so desire, be allowed to commute their pensions in exchange for an appropriate amount of stock of the forthcoming national loan.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. Blythe): I am afraid that this suggestion would not help towards the purpose for which the loan is raised, inasmuch as no new cash would result from the scheme.

QUESTION ON THE ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. T. J. MURPHY: I beg to give notice that I will raise, on the motion for the adjournment, the question of the refusal of the authorities to hand over to his relatives the body of Denis Barry, who died as a result of a hunger strike in Newbridge.

RETURN OF WRIT.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Tá orm a fhógairt don Dáil gur thuairisigh an Cléireach gur toghadh Pádraig Mac Giollaigáin don fholúntas do bhí in ionaduíoicht Dháileheanantar Phríomh-Scoil Náisiúnta na hEireann sa Dáil.

I have to announce to the Dáil that the Clerk has reported that Mr. Patrick McGilligan has been elected to fill the vacancy, in the representation of the Dáil, of the University Constituency for the National University of Ireland.

DUBLIN CORPORATION.—A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. A. BYRNE: Before we proceed with the Orders of the Day, may I ask, a Chinn Chomhairle, whether a request has been received by you from the Town Clerk, or from the Lord Mayor of Dublin, with a view to appearing here and presenting a petition to this Dáil, and if so, what is the result?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes, a letter has been sent to me by the Town Clerk of Dublin, enclosing a copy of a resolution passed by the Municipal Council of Dublin, asking me to make the necessary arrangements to have the Lord Mayor of Dublin appear at the Bar of the Dáil, accompanied by the Town Clerk, the Law Agent, his Lordship's officers of state, and members of the Council.

There is no procedure at present in the Dáil for allowing any person to come to the Dáil to present a petition, and I have had the Town Clerk of Dublin acquainted of that fact. The question of presenting a petition to the Dáil has not yet been considered, and while it is clear that a Deputy would have the right to present a petition himself it would require a special arrangement by the Dáil, either in general or in a particular case, to allow any person, other than a Deputy, to come and present a petition to the Dáil, on behalf of himself or of any other persons.

Mr. A. BYRNE: Owing to the urgency of this matter, I would ask your guidance on it. If I were to give notice to-day and put down a motion, similar to that which was carried in another Parliament, allowing this right to the Dublin Corporation, would it be considered on Friday? This is Wednesday, and if I were to give notice to-day would it be in time?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy Byrne consulted me about this matter yesterday, and I explained the situation to him, so that his notice is really, technically, since yesterday. I would be prepared, if the Dáil agrees, to allow the motion to go forward on the Order Paper for consideration in Private Members' time on Friday. The motion would be in these terms:—"That the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor of the City of Dublin be admitted to present a petition from the Lord Mayor and Corporation of the said City at the Bar of Dáil Eireann."

Mr. JOHNSON: In the course of your answers, a Chinn Chomhairle, to Deputy Byrne, you said that a Deputy himself would have the right to present a petition. I did not know that that matter had been considered any more than the other, and I would think, and suggest to the Dáil, that that is a matter that ought to be dealt with by the Procedure and Privileges Committee, even before the right of the Deputy to present a petition is acknowledged.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The manner and the method of presentation, I think, should be considered by the Committee on Privileges, and Standing Orders drawn up in the matter. What I meant to convey was, that it might be taken for granted that, under certain conditions, and when certain arrangements had been made, the right would be accorded to Deputies to present petitions, but that the question of a person not a Deputy presenting a petition would require the special sanction of the Dáil. I shall bring the matter before the Committee on Procedure and Privileges.

The PRESIDENT: Does that mean that this matter will be brought before the Committee on Procedure and Privileges before the motion will be dealt with on Friday? I take it that the basis of this claim is a claim which the late Henry Grattan secured from the British Parliament after the Act of Union had been passed. As such, it has to my mind certain unsavoury recommendations in its favour, and I do not think it has ever been suggested by anybody that this country got any real advantages out of the Act of Union. If that be the claim for urgency, I would not be inclined to give this matter very grave consideration. If, on the other hand, the subject matter of the petition itself be the claim for urgency, we ought to have that defined, because I submit that there is no claim for urgency under the second head, and, as regards the first, I suggest it is faulty. Therefore, I do not see how the question of urgency arises at all.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It may be well to get that matter cleared up. The resolution which has been sent to me is as follows:—

"That this Council, in the exercise of its ancient privilege of appearing at the Bar of the Commons, requests the Lord Mayor to make the necessary arrangements to present the petition (at present being signed in the City Hall, requesting the release of all the political prisoners) at the Bar of An Dáil, and that he be accompanied by the Town Clerk, Law Agent, His Lordship's Officers of State and the Members of the Council."

I did not think it necessary to advert to what is termed the "ancient privilege," because, as the President has stated, by resolution passed by the British House of Commons in 1813, the Corporation of Dublin was given the right of appearing, through its Lord Mayor, at the Bar of the House and of presenting petitions. Under that resolution, the Dublin Corporation has no right whatever to appear before Dáil Eireann, and that privilege, in so far as it existed, is not a privilege against Dáil Eireann, and cannot be exercised by virtue of that resolution. I think that is clear.

The PRESIDENT: Yes, quite clear.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I take it, therefore, that that matter will not be discussed or urged. The urgency which Deputy Byrne spoke of, I take it, relates to the subject matter of the petition rather than to the assertion of that claim.

The PRESIDENT: On that I would have to enter an objection, because I do not consider, as I have said before, that any useful public purpose is served by dragging the sufferings of these unfortunate hunger strikers before the notice of the public. It is done with one object alone, and that is to keep the unfortunate dupes still on hunger strike. I think it is cruel, inhuman, and unworthy of any citizen of this State to persist in such action, and as such it would have my most strenuous opposition.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The motion that Deputy Byrne proposes to place before the Dáil would have reference only to a matter of whether we will or will not accord to the Municipal Council of Dublin a certain privilege. The discussion on that motion would not involve any discussion on the question of political prisoners or on the subject matter of any petition now under consideration or to be in future considered. If objection is taken to the fact that the motion has not got sufficient notice, it must go over to next Wednesday, but the matter which would be discussed on Friday would not be the question of prisoners, but the question of privilege.

Professor THRIFT: On that point, if any Deputy moved a resolution, would it not be open to any other Deputy to move an amendment to refer the matter to the Committee on Procedure and Privileges, before the Dáil proceeded further to discuss the matter?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think it is always a bad thing to give one's ruling in advance, but at present I do not see in the proposal which Deputy Thrift has made anything which would be out of order.

The PRESIDENT: It would be my intention, if the subject did come up for consideration, to move that it be left over and sent back to the Committee on Procedure and Privileges until the subject matter of the resolution had passed away.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Perhaps the simpler way would be for the Committee on Procedure and Privileges, which meets to-morrow, to consider the matter, and have, either some definite rules governing the matter or some report or recommendation from that Committee brought before the Dáil, and then have the matter discussed on that report.

Mr. JOHNSON: May I suggest that we are rather getting away from the motion which you, a Chinn Chomhairle, read. The real question is, whether the four days' notice is to be waived? You ruled that, technically, inasmuch as the notice had been given yesterday, the motion which you have read out, is in order. Subject to your discretion, we have the right to receive any Notice of Motion, and that is the only question, I submit, that we have before us. It seems to me to be a matter for your own ruling as to whether the Standing Orders have been complied with in regard to the Notice of Motion.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Standing Orders have not been complied with in regard to the Notice of Motion, but as no objection was taken, I thought that the Dáil was agreed to waive the Standing Orders in this particular case. If objection is taken the motion is not in order and cannot be moved on Friday.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): I would suggest that the Deputy should withdraw his motion. Coming forward at this particular time, it is simply brought forward with one object. A large number of unfortunate men are on hunger strike. These men who are on hunger strike, consider, in the first place, that the hunger strike was a disaster from the point of view of their policy, and in the second place, that it should be called off. The only effect of this motion, if it is brought before the Dáil, and if it is to lie over until Friday, will be to pin down, by a sense of honour, men who are already suffering very severely, and to keep them suffering for another day or two when they themselves are perfectly convinced that they cannot achieve anything by a hunger strike, and who consider that those who were responsible for putting them on hunger strike should order them off and give them a chance of saving themselves from more suffering.

Mr. A. BYRNE: I am a member of the body that passed the resolution that has been read. That body had a certain privilege in a foreign Parliament, and I hold, and am in agreement with that body, that the same privilege ought to be extended to it in an Irish Parliament. I have put down the motion to maintain the rights of the Dublin Corporation, and am anxious to take the views of members of the Dáil on the motion. If my motion is not in time for Friday, I will give notice for next Wednesday, as I understand now that I am being ruled out for Friday. It is unfortunate that I cannot be heard here on the matter on Friday, but in view of the ruling that has been given, I will give notice of motion for next Wednesday. In my opinion, I think the Dublin Corporation is entitled—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is discussing the motion.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: The point I desire to raise is very small in comparison with the matter raised by Deputy Byrne. I suggest it has a certain minor importance of its own, and it respects the terms of the motion of which he has given notice. May I suggest that we do not use the phrase, "at the Bar of the Dáil," because we have no Bar. At least we have a bar, but not in the purely parliamentary sense. I suggest that you use instead of that phrase the words "before Dáil Eireann."

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: We will consider that.

LATE DEPUTY JAMES DERHAM.

The PRESIDENT: Before we proceed to business, it is my melancholy duty to ask the Dáil to express its sympathy with the family of the late Deputy Derham. Only last week he was with us, and now he is no more. Deputy Derham has been associated with public life for a great number of years. He entered the national movement at a meeting which was addressed by the O'Rahilly, Dr. Hayes, and the late Thomas Ashe in Balbriggan. During the struggle for independence of this country his family and himself have contributed their share of suffering and privation, and I think it is due to his memory and, I believe I am expressing the opinions of every Deputy here when I say that we should join in sending his family a tribute of respect in their great grief.

All the Deputies present then rose in their places.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT RETURN.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I desire to move the following motion:—

"To move for a return showing:—

(1) the number of Inspectors, medical and lay, respectively, employed either by the late Local Government Board of Ireland or by the Local Government Department of the Free State in the years 1914, 1920, and at the present time;

"(2) the salaries paid to such Inspectors, medical and lay, respectively, in the same years and at the present time; and

"the qualifications required of Medical Inspectors in the same years and at the present time."

I understand this is a matter that ordinarily, until this present moment, would have been put forward by way of a question, but it now takes place by way of a motion for a return. It explains itself and requires no support by way of explanation from me. There is one matter I would like to raise in that connection, and it is this—I take it that a return of this sort, to use a time honoured phrase, would be laid on the table of the House. May I suggest it would be available in a more convenient form for Deputies if the return in question were to be printed either for circulation amongst Deputies or else printed in the official debates.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. Burke): The return asked for in accordance with the present request has been prepared and will be laid on the table when printed. I will take the other matter into consideration.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The report will be made available for Deputies in the reading room. That is the twentieth century meaning of the phrase "Laid on the table."

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Could it be ordered now that it be circulated to Deputies?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Unless the Minister agrees we would have to take that matter up separately.

Mr. BURKE: I will agree to that.

The PRESIDENT: I do not know whether this motion has been seconded. Is it a matter of accommodation? Because I perceive that any comparison between a certain position, say in the years 1914, 1920 and at present, may be used, as such information has been used in the past, not in the interests of truth, and certainly not in the real interests of the country. I would welcome a return showing the position at the time of the signing of the Treaty or at the time of taking over by the Provisional Government, or at the first of April, 1922, comparing the staffs and expenditure then, with the staffs and expenditure now. I say that it does not appear to me that any useful public purpose is served by giving information for such years as 1914 and 1920. It affords opportunities for attacking the administration now on grounds that are not fair and are not just, and in the knowledge of persons making these charges they are neither just nor fair.

I read in a paper last week—I think it was the "Independent"—a statement by a member of the Dáil that this was an extravagant Government and an extravagant State. We were told that the Army in this State cost twice what the Belgian Army cost in 1914 and 1916, and half what the British Army cost in 1914. He might as well just have told us that it was costing three times the amount to run this country than it cost the old Irish Parliament to run it, or four times the amount. He might have said our national debt was greater than it was at the time of the Union. Arguments such as those used by a person who has no knowledge, or an unbalanced knowledge, of his subject certainly reflects no credit on the person who uses the argument, and does not beget any real confidence in the people of the State. In asking for a return, such as Deputy Figgis has asked for here, one should at least give us some reason for the information that is required. Some reason ought to be given as to why Departments of the State should rummage through the archives left by the British Government, and some tangible excuse ought to be given for an attempt to fill the Deputy's library other than merely moving the motion.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This is a new arrangement by which a Deputy moves for a return instead of asking a question which involves a very lengthy reply. I ascertained before putting this motion on the Paper that it would not be opposed by the Minister. I therefore took it for granted that it would be an unopposed motion, that the Deputy would simply move it, and that the Minister would promise to make the return, and that would be enough. For that reason, I put it first on the Order Paper after the questions. If it were opposed and became a subject of debate, I would put it down for the present as a motion by a private member, to be discussed in the time allotted to private members' business, pending some better arrangement, suggested by the suitable Committee. I understood the matter was to go through without debate. If it must be debated it must be debated at some other time.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is it a fact that the Minister had consented to this return?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes.

Mr. BURKE: I agreed to answering the question in this way, as a matter of course. I did not think that there was anything exceptional about it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The order made is that the report should be printed and circulated to Deputies.

MINISTERS & SECRETARIES BILL.
—SECOND STAGE.—DEBATE RESUMED.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The motion is that this Bill be now read a second time. The debate was adjourned on the last day on the motion of the Attorney-General.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: When the Dáil adjourned I was bringing the observations I had to make to a close, and I have little to add to what I then said. I would like, however, to make one comment upon the danger of superficial criticism in an Assembly of this kind. This is not an assembly in which mere chance-points of a debating society should be made on a serious topic such as this Bill undoubtedly is, chance remarks and debating points which are afterwards seized by newspapers and emblazoned as if they were gospel for the edification of the public. I have in mind two or three such criticisms in particular. Deputy Redmond, for instance, in his remarks, referred to the position of the Army and of the Commander-in-Chief. He says: "As far as I am aware, and I have a little army experience, there is only one Commander-in-Chief in this country according to our Constitution, and that is the King," and so on. Now, if Deputy Redmond, instead of depending upon the empirical knowledge acquired during his little experiences of the Army, had studied the matter, he would have discovered that what he was stating was not constitutionally accurate. It is a fact that in the early portion of the 19th century, the late Queen Victoria and her predecessors were titular commanders-in-chief of the army. In the middle of the 19th century the command-in-chief of the army was delegated, and so remained in a soldier officer until just after the Boer War. I think the last person who held that delegated command-in-chief was Lord Roberts. I do not think Deputy Redmond's little army experience was gained prior to 1904. He might have been misled if it had, but after the reorganisation of the British Army after the Boer War, the office of commander-in-chief was abolished, so far as the British Army was concerned. This really shows the danger of making those chance observations of half-baked knowledge gained, one does not know how, in an officers' mess, or so on. I would suggest to him he should now study our Constitution, and the Constitution of our co-equal Dominions upon this subject, and his knowledge would be considerably extended.

In the same way he speaks with a similar kind of empirical knowledge, gained during a little experience of Parliamentary life elsewhere, when he says that he there discovered that the Attorney-General was a mere legal officer. I would also suggest to him to correct the knowledge which he gained, whether by constant attendance within the House or in its precincts, by a study of, say, Anson's standard work on the British Constitution, and he will find a great deal indeed to learn upon the subject of the position of the Attorney-General under the British Constitution, and he can pursue his studies still further in some of the leading textbooks on Dominion Constitutions. Deputy Cooper presents his matter so agreeably that one does not at first sight see whether he, too, is guilty of these kinds of superficial points. But Deputy Cooper's standing is such that he is quoted as an authority, and I find certain observations of his made here on the last day exhibited in the manner which I believe Pressmen call "framing" in the pages of one of our leading journals. It is headed: "Inflated Cabinets: How Ireland compared with other countries. Canada, Australia, New Zealand, had all a less number of Ministers than are in our Government. The Deputy also referred to the fact that in Canada they had not an Attorney-General, but they had a Minister of Justice." These observations were entirely superficial and unsound. The Deputy totted up the Ministers of the Federal Government of Canada, entirely losing sight of the fact that there is a complete Executive Government in each of the provinces of Canada; he totted up the Ministries in Australia, entirely losing sight of the fact that each of the Australian States has its own Executive Ministers. South Africa is somewhat differently constituted, but it has administrative offices in the different provinces, and he swept into his comparison a country like New Zealand which has a wholly different plan, because it has, as distinct from the Federal Governments of Australia and Canada, a unitary Government. If he had appreciated this important distinction he would have seen the explanation of the point he made with regard to the position of the Attorney-General. In Canada they have in the Federal Government a Minister of Justice whom we all had the pleasure of meeting at Geneva, and a Solicitor-General, who advises the Federal Government, but each province of Canada has its own Attorney-General, and any of us familiar with Law Reports, particularly Reports of Privy Council cases, knows that frequently contests arise as regards certain rights or privileges and whether they are vested in a province or in the Federal Government, and these cases are always fought out as between the Federal Solicitor-General and, say, the Attorney-General of Manitoba. I refer to this as showing the great danger, because this thing has been seized upon, has been made into a headline in the newspapers. For the purpose of making these superficial points Deputies just dip into the pages of Whittaker's Almanac, or some book of the kind, and I suggest that when a Bill of this kind is under consideration it should really receive much deeper consideration than is indicated by the observations—

Major COOPER: On a point of personal explanation, may I point out to the Attorney-General that it is impossible to make a complete investigation when we only receive a Bill on Tuesday and have the Second Reading on Friday, and that one is forced to rely on ordinary works of reference because one has no time to obtain anything else.
